The winter was an unusually severe one. The waters were frozen thickly over; the birds and the wild animals in the forests suffered great difficulty in obtaining food. The little bird, that had so recently left its dark solitude, flew about the country roads, and when it found by chance a little corn dropped in the ruts, it would eat only a single grain itself, while it called all the starving sparrows to partake of it. It would also fly to the villages and towns, and look well about; and where kind hands had strewed crumbs of bread outside the windows for the birds, it would eat only one morsel itself, and give all the rest to the others.

At the end of the winter the bird had found out given away so many crumbs of bread, that the number put together would have weighed as much as the loaf upon which little Inger had stepped in order to save her fine shoes from being soiled; and when she had found and given away the very last crumb, the grey cloak of the bird became white, and expanded wonderfully.

"It is flying over the sea!" exclaimed the children who saw it in the white bird. Now it appeared to dip into the ocean, now it arose into the clear sunshine; it glittered in the air; it disappeared high, high above; and the children said that it had flown up to the sun.

AN EXPERIENCE.

My father moved to Minnesota in the spring of 56. I was then a gay and somewhat strawny girl of thirteen years. I remember, when he decided me to climb up the wheel into the great wagon where mother, the baby, and Dave had already been enconsced, my father had to lift me, with that tone which the voice slides so easily when we are breaking away from homes,

"Up with you, Nora, before you see old Illinois again."

It was a strange subject of contemplation for such a time, when the heart was full of the old memories that cluster around the humblest home; when the eyes were full of weak brimming in tears; and the first miles of our long journey were unheeded. But still I could not help reflecting on those words of my father, "You'll be a woman, Nora."

What great change was this, upon the threshold of which I was standing, and which was so much as the life of us that father—my brown, hard-working father—used it, half-unconsciously, as the measurement of the whole date of an epoch?

I think we are apt to seek a new, though kindred, channel of thought when the last good-by has been said to the rustling of wheels around us—as that the partings are really over at last. The soul has been so long busy with this ever-approaching climax of tears and grief, that, when once the die is cast it turns willingly from under the special pressure to some untried, contemplative phase.

And so as the wagon wound along the road—while father was watching the receding home scenes, and mother was drying her eyes with very doubtful success—I sat and wondered what was before me. What would life wield, ungainly as it is, heavily girl as a woman? What untried, untreamed-of path would open before me by-and-by? Should I be forced to clumber fences? Should I love to sit and watch the lightning and listen to the thunder? Should I love lambs, and chickens, and little pigs? And would it be the height of my ambition then, as now, to jump the rope a greater number of times than any body else could, and play the leaf-and-cone hunt-the-slipper better than even Jim Lane, the boy music king? I can scarcely call to mind a friend of those days unwinding, would have led me, had not the stout voice of John, my elder brother, who was pedestrianising behind the family coach, burst out with—

"Father, you've left the saw, and the axe, and them two scythes!"

Father drew in the reins, looked thoughtful a moment, stood up on the tongue, and gazed back down the road, paused a little longer, and then said with a sigh,

"Well, I'm sorry; they're worth five dollars—but money'll be scarce in the new country; but I can't go back."

So we jogged along.

Our turn-out was of the popular pattern, for which, fortunately, no patent has been taken. A broad, roomy wagon on stout wheels, covered with white cloth stretched upon arched poles, and forming a canopy suggestive of the "milky way," filled with bags and boxes, and kegs and crates, and divers cooking utensils, the whole drawn by a pair of stout though somewhat scraggy farmhorses.

I will not attempt to give the panorama of our long, slow journey over so many hundred miles in such vicissitudes of weather, cooking our well-eaten meals in the open air, and sleeping within the half-shelter under storm as well as starlight. When night came father would drive out one side of the road, unhitch the horses, and then prepare for the cooking of supper. Mother was just as good a housewife there as in our snug kitchen at home. Every thing was as clean as it could be; the biscuits were white and feathery; and the tea-kettle swinging from the cross-stick on the crotches, sang the identical old song that I am sure in Illinois." Father always gave thanks over these out-door meals; and I used to notice, or fancy I noticed, more softness in his rugged tones than ever before.

One night—we had been out many weeks, had entered Minnesota, and were some forty miles west of the Falls of St. Anthony, in the broad belt of timber which reaches across that section of the country: John and Dave were out shooting pigeon, fox and blackbird—which were all served and eaten with the usual relish—suddenly a man on horseback pulled up before us with the words:

"For God's sake come and help us, if you know any thing about doctoring! He's bleeding to death, Carl is. Quick! Come with me!"

Father was slowly gathering himself together with the gravity which comes of years and hard work, when I, strung to unusual quickness by the man's manner and story, ran to one of the horses, scrambled to his back, and galloped away to the scene of the disaster. I found a young man bleeding to death, as the messenger had said—a cut across the arm severing the brachial artery. Thanks to my training, I knew what to do. Putting my finger in the gash from which the blood was spouting, I pressed the lips of the artery together, and the flow of blood was stayed. Better than this I knew little or nothing. Another of the party had gone in the direction of a village some five miles back, who had the reputation of being a physician. I had stopped the flow of blood. So far I was safe. Here I must remain quiet. So I sat on the ground beside him, and held my finger on the artery—holding his life there with my forefinger.

Not less than two hours elapsed before the doctor came, and all that time I sat with my finger on the crevice lovingly where the life-blood had oozed away. He was very weak and pale.

Sometimes he would lie with his eyes quite closed and the features perfectly peaceful. Again he would turn his face toward me, and, fastening his eyes on my hand, with these muscles, lips, eyes—a living power for good and virtue and truth, or was I electing the outflow of a sort of LIFE of which the artery was the scarcely less valuable than the perfect structure before me? I wondered:

Who was his father?
Who was his mother?
Had he a sister?
Had he a brother?
Or was there a dearer one
Than all the rest on earth?
Yet, than all other.

What made the man look at me so? Was it because I looked so cold and so much as child? I didn't care; I had saved his life, any way. Surely he need have little concern for the looks of the girl who was holding the heart-beat under her finger, be she never so ugly.

At length the doctor arrived. I was released, and the wound was dressed.

Life had so nearly ebbed that it was quite necessary to have gentle care for a few days; and as there were no nurses in the whole of that forest within many miles, mother would have us remain and rest, that she might care for the stranger. It was somewhat unwilling, for I was

"Tain't no use to overstrive and worry ourselves just about nothing again, it's best to say buby to help a young fellow like him to live."

We staid four days. I remember nothing remarkable about the time, save that I began to find it came lively and interesting as he grew stronger, and that mother and father both liked him. They seemed to regard him as a relative rather than as I liked him too. But then I was only a child; and mother had always taught me to be unobtrusive and quiet in the presence of strangers. I used to wait on him a great deal though, and often read to him, and answered his questions concerning the books which he found in my father's box. I thought him rather inquisitive sometimes. But then he seemed to know so much; it gave him a sort of right to be free with me, I thought. I was a girl, especially with an uncouth child like myself. I used to wonder sometimes how such a man so much—not rudely, but with a studying expression, full of good breeding, but earnest. Intuitively I knew that he was reading me. Me! I hoped he liked it.

When we left him, father gave minute description of the locality of his claim, and directions to find our future home. It was to be on such a "quarter-section," in such a "township," and on such a "range."

"I shall find you all aged," he said, as we rolled away.

Some disappointment concerning the land upon which father had intended to settle, together with rather glowing accounts of the southern sections of the country, produced an important change in my plans and in the fortunes of the family.

If there were time to give them, the rough vicissitudes of three years of pioneer life would be superfluous and tedious descriptions to the writer, if not the reader, would take an interest. There was hard work for father—borne stoutly and cheerily, however. Those great forest trees came crashing down one by one, spreading more and more of the sky above us, and, with their smouldering in heaps, filling the air with a perfume which became to have a touch of home in it.

Mother made the log-cabin a very comfortable place indeed—a tidy, lovable, attractive home, for we of simple tastes and habits. Mother and I had full superintendence of the garden; and not unfrequently browned our faces in keeping it free from weeds. For myself, I was given more liberty than I should have taken, perhaps; but I loved so well to roam under the trees, in search of flowers and curiosities, that I fear I sometimes forgot the house and garden work at home.

I lived rather an unrestrained, rather a wild life, in keeping with my rollicking tendencies.

While the three years were going by I used to wonder sometimes when I should be a woman—a woman in that sense of the word which implies consciousness of a different style of nature and existence. Mother would often speak of me as a young woman now; the dresses of three years ago were quite outgrown; the little broken mirror—all we could boast—gave a story of more symmetrical features and a deeper life in my face; travelers, who often came that way, treated me with a consideration more suitable, I thought, to a child; young men were shy of me; and yet it seemed to me that I was the same untamable girl I had ever been.

Laughingly, I said to father one day,

"I guess I shall see 'Illinoi' before I'm a woman after all, father. I guess I get educated suddenly."

He only looked up with an expression of honest pride in his good, fatherly face. We are not the least alike, my father and I, I know.

Mother said to me one day, as we sat sewing in the breeze by the door of the cabin,

"I've got something to tell you, child."

I saw, by the slightest possible catching of the breath and constraint of tone, that the subject was embarrassing.

I dropped my work upon my lap, folded my hands, and looked at my mother broke the ice with one of those sudden blows which her quick hand knew how to deal.

"Mr. Bruce wants to marry you."

"Me!" and darting out the door-way I ran down the path, and then walked hurriedly into the forest. I walked rapidly, breaking twigs from the bushes, bunting for bear-tracks and flowers, till I was quite warm and tired. And yet every thought took form in the ejaculation, "Me!" In two hours I returned. Mother was sitting in the same spot. I resumed my sewing work, and for a little time we worked away quietly.

"He is a likely young man."

I said nothing.

"Your father says his clearing is one of the best within ten miles, and is sure to give him a good, comfortable home, without making him wait off by-and-by, when the country gets settled."

"But he's so much older than I; and then I'm only a girl, and am so happy here at home, mother."

"You won't want to live at home always, child. You will be a woman, with a home of your own; and Mr. Brock is safe and good and substantial."

"You will, child."

We sat still a long while, and when we put aside our work to prepare for tea, mother said only,

"Think it over, my daughter."

I thought it over. He was good, and I liked him. If I should marry him, it was equally true that I loved nobody else, and was not likely to. Mother wished it, and perhaps I had better. Oh, if I could only love, so as to be free from this misery-ing! The next Sabbath morning I said:

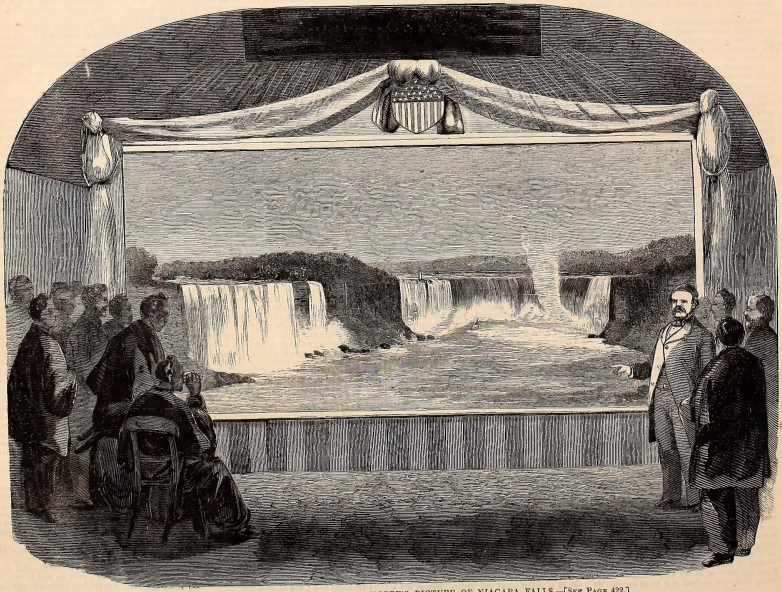
"I guess I had better, mother."

She came over and kissed me about me, and when I dropped my face on her breast, kissed my forehead very tenderly.

A month or two after this, while out in the forest—smiling, nodding, and thinking—Ponto, my spaniel, suddenly left my very from me with most vociferous barkings, and before I could control him was beyond reach of my voice. I saw one of a company of travelers level a gun at him. Another knocked the muzzle up at just the right instant, and he spent shot fell rattling through the leaves about me.

I thanked the preserver of my dog; and when they stated that it was night's resting-place, pointed to our little log-house.

While they were at the table, I sat in the fireside with a new feeling at work on my spirits. The frame of mind was new to me, indescribably vague and yet positive. It seemed as though a new life were opening before me, with the old life—though the chrysalis of childhood were being broken. I think it was; for when I rose to remove the tables from the midst of calm, clear eyes I went with me round the room, were visible whichever way I moved. Mother was busy using until my face flushed and my temples throbbed.



The face was very different. [illegible] bearing firm and commanding expression, with [illegible] lines.

I would give no sign of reception on—not I.

When the others retired he [illegible] to talk with father, [illegible] he [illegible] retired. father and mother as well as Dave and John by making himself known. Gave as all a hearty grasp of the hand. I never remember to have seen him before marine officer know that the Commodore is going to leave the ship. There, no lurking on the quarter-deck, Mr. Mouse!"

This last command was addressed to a tiny youngster who was hardly big enough to go without pantalets, much less to wear a jacket and order half a hundred huge sailors about who were old enough to be his great-grandfathers. But yet that small lad did it, and could steer a boat, too, or fly about like a ribbon in a high wind up there in the mizzen-top, while the men on the yard were taking the last reef in the topsail.

"Go down to the cabin, Sir, and let the Commodore and his friend know the boat is ready!"

Down the ladder shipped Mr. Mouse, and while he was gone the guard, in their white summer uniform and cross-belts, stood at ease resting on their muskets on the quarter-deck, eight side-boys and the boatswain at the starboard gangway, with the first lieutenant and the officer of the watch standing near.

Presently there came up from the after-cabin hatchway a fine, handsome man in the very prime of life, in cocked hat, full-dress coat, a pair of gleaming epaulets, sword by his hip, and his nether limbs cased in white knee breeches, silk stockings, and pumps. The one who followed him was apparently a much older man, with grizzled locks, a dark stern face, and without epaulets. The first raised his hat as he stepped on the quarter-deck—not a thread of silver was seen in his dark hair—and then both bowed to the officers, who saluted them as they moved toward the gangway. The boatswain piped, the marines presented arms, the drum gave three quick rolls, and the Commodore went over the gangway preceded by his companion.

CHAPTER XXX.

OLD FRIENDS.

The barge left the side of the frigate, a broad blue pennant with white stars on a staff at her bow, with fourteen handsome picked sailors to man her, all in clean white frocks and trowsers, with straw-hats and flowing black ribbons around them, on which was stamped in gold letters Mosquyhata.

The double bank of white ash oars flashed in the rippling waves of the harbor as the barge was urged over the water, the current scething and hissing under her bows, and bubbling from her wake as she flew on toward the town. In a mahogany box at the stern sat a burly whiskered coxswain, who, as he swayed to the stroke of the oars while his hand grasped the brass tiller as he steered amidst the shipping. The Commodore had settled himself down under the boat's awning on the snow-white covered cushions in the stern sheets, and, with one foot resting on the elegant ash grating beneath, he began to talk to the grave gentleman who sat opposite to him.

"It is many a long year since I last visited this superb harbor, but I remember it as if it were yesterday. You never were here before, I think? No? Well, if any of the old set I once knew, when I was first lieutenant of the old Scourge, are yet alive, we shall have a pleasant time!

"One fine fellow," went on the Commodore, "I know is; his name is Piron. I had a note from him as soon as the frigate anchored yesterday, and I shall ask him to dine sociably with me on board this evening. I hope you will join us."

The grave gentleman said that he had business which would detain him on shore all night.

The barge swept up to the mole, the oars were thrown up at a wave of the coxswain's hand, and came into the boat on either side like shutting up a pair of fans, while the boat-hooks checked her way, and she remained stationary at the steps of the landing. The awning was canted, the Commodore and his friend got out and mounted the stairway, while the boat's crew stood up with their hats off. On the mole were four or five people in light West India rig of brown and white and broad Guayaquil sombreros.

"Cleveland!" exclaimed a tall handsome man, as he seized the Commodore by both hands, "how glad we are to see you! Here is Tom Stewart, and Paddy Burns, and little Don Stingo, attorneys, factors, and sugar boilers; all of us delighted to welcome you back once more to Jamaica!"

Crowding about the Commodore, shaking hands and slapping one another on the back, standing off a step or two to see the effect of time on each other's appearance, laughing heartily with many a happy allusion to days gone by, those old friends and former companions, unmindful of the hot sun, stood there with their faces lighted up and talking all together.

"And you are a Commodore, eh! Cleveland, with a broad pennant and a squadron? Ah! we have kept the run of you, though. Read all about that action you were in in the Experier and Provident, and that bloody battle in the Essex at Valparaiso with Porter. And here you are again, safe and sound and hearty!"

"And you too, Piron! The same as ever! Not tired of cane-planting yet? But how is Madame?"

"Lovely a girl as ever, Cleveland, but never entirely got over that sad loss of the little boy, you know. However, she will be overjoyed to see you. She's been talking of you ever since we saw your appointment to the station fifteen months ago. Apropos, we have her widowed sister with us, whose husband was killed at Waterloo, and our little niece who came from France. All out there at the old place of Escondido, where you must come and pass a week with us. Nay, man, no excuse! The thing is arranged, and it would be the death of Stingo, Tom Stewart, and Paddy Burns if you disappoint us."

"Well, Piron, I am your man, but not for a day or two, until I have made some official calls here on the authorities. Meanwhile, gentlemen, you all dine with me this evening on board the frigate; every mother's son of you! Coxswain, go on board and tell my steward to have dinner for six. Stay you in the schooner as you go off, and say to Mr. Davenant that I shall expect him to join us. Now, my friends, that matter is arranged, and we will all go off in the barge at sunset."

"Dry talking, isn't it, Stingo?" said Piron; "so Commodore, come, and we'll have a sip of sangaree and a deviled biscuit to keep our mouths in order. But, hallo! where is your friend, Cleveland? that tall man in black? Parson or chaplain, eh?"

"No," replied the officer, "an old friend of mine, my brother-in-law, who takes a cruise with me occasionally; but he never goes in society, and has taken himself off, as he always does, when we get in port. He is a glorious fellow though, and I hope to present him to you yet! Never mind him now."

Arm in arm went the blue coat and bullion, locked in white grass sleeves, along the busy quays, crowded with mule-carts and drays for stores or shipping. Spanish Dons, dapper Frenchmen, burly John Bulls, standing at warehouse and posadas, all with cigars in their teeth, which they puffed so lazily that the smoke scarcely found its way beyond the brims of their wide sombreros. Negroes, too, with scanty leg gear, and still scantier gingham shirts, having bales or boxes or baskets of fruit on their heads, never any thing in their hands, chattering and laughing one with another, as they danced and jostled along the busy mart. Then through the hot, sandy ruts of streets, pausing now and then to shake hands with some old acquaintance beneath the overhanging piazzas; sedan-chairs moving about with a negro in a glazed hat and red cockade at either end of the poles, in a long easy trot, as they bore their burdens of Spanish matron or English damsel, or maybe a portly old Judge or gouty Admiral, on a shopping or business excursion to the port. So on to the upper town, where the dwellings stand in detachments by themselves—single or in pairs, with spacious balconies and bright green Venetian blinds, all screened by gardens and vines; with noble tamarind-trees and cocoa-nuts swaying their lofty trunks and rattling their branches and leaves over the negro huts and offices below. Here the party stopped, and entering a house, were ushered into a cool, lofty room where there were a lot of mahogany desks and a single old clerk, who resembled a last year's dried lemon with some few drops of acid juice for blood, perched up on a hard stem of a high stool, with four or five quill pens, like so many thorns, sticking out above his yellow leafy ears.

"All by myself here, Cleveland, as I told you. All my people are living out there at Escondido. Very little business doing just now, and Paddy Burns and Tom Stewart haven't had a suit or a fight for the last six months. Inkstands dry, and my old clerk, Clinker, there, has forgotten how to write English.

"However," went on Piron, as the party threw themselves back on the wicker arm-chairs and enjoyed the breeze which fluttered merrily through the blinds, "the cellar isn't quite dry yet; and I say, Clinker, suppose you tell Nimble Jack, or Ring Finger Bill, to spread a little luncheon here, with a bottle or two of Bordeaux, or something of that sort?" The dried, fruity old gentleman dropped off his branch at the desk like a withered nut, and then, with a husky kind of shriek, hereon himself off.

"Queer old stick that!" said the Commodore, as he unbuckled his sword and laid it on the table.

"Ah! he grew here, and will blow away one of these days. My father used to tell me that he looked just the same when he first arrived as he does now. But he is a dear, faithful old stump; and you must remember hearing, Cleveland, of that frightful earthquake here in seventeen hundred and eighty-three, which killed so many people? Well, it was Clinker's mother who saved my sweet wife—that is now—and her sister; though no was nearly squeezed—dryer, if any thing, than he is now—in doing it. He lay, you know, Stingo, supporting the whole second story of the house for seven hours, pressed as flat as a tamarind-leaf while they were getting those twin babies out of their cradle. Yes, God bless him! But what is more, he threw himself precisely where he did, as he saw the walls giving way, so that not a hair of those children should be injured when the beams came down. My father has told me since, that when they got a lever under the timber and wedged old Clinker out, he gave a kind of crackle; but in my opinion he has not drawn a breath from that day to this. And, generally, he is a very taciturn old coot, and rarely opens his rind; but latterly he talks a good deal about the earthquake; says he's sure there'll be another awful one before an interval of forty years has passed, and wants us to go away. No objection, however, to coming back when the thing is over, and then waiting forty years for another. Don't laugh, you Paddy Burns, for if ever the Trombler gives you one little shake, you'll jump higher than you did when that ugly Frenchman ran you through your waistcoat-pocket, and you thought it was your midriff. Now, Tom Stewart and Don Stingo, what are you grinning about? Your teeth will chatter so that the next quake that you won't, either of you, be able to deliver a charge to the jury over a false invoice, or such another drop of old Anigua rum."

"But really, Piron," broke in the Commodore upon this voluble harangue, "do you give heed to these backings of that old clerk?"

"Why, yes, Cleveland," replied Piron, with rather a grave manner, "I do; and, moreover, my sweet wife Rosalie out yonder, who has never got over her grief for the loss of our boy, regards every word old Clinker says as so much prophecy; and the upshot of the business is, I have made up my mind to leave the island."

"For where, my friend?—back to France?"

"No. Since the war and the peace, with Bonaparte at St. Helena, France is no place for an Englishman, even with a French father, and I am going to try America."

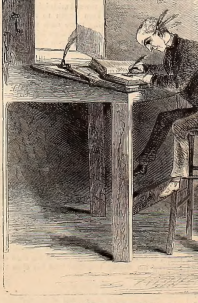
"Truly, Piron, I am charmed to hear it. But what part of America?"

"Why, I've bought a fine sugar estate at a bargain in Louisiana, and there we shall pass the remainder of our days."

"He! he!" sniggled Tom Stewart, while Don Stingo and Paddy Burns cackled incredulously; but at the same moment Ring Finger Bill and Nimble Jack, two jet-black persons, in loose striped gingham shirts and bare feet, with an attempt at a grave expression of well-lighted coffee coolers, the whites of their eyes turned up with becoming decorum, and preceded by the old stump of a clerk, who seemed to exhale in the sea-breeze as he again hung himself, stern on, to his stool of a trunk, entered the cool counting-house, bearing trays, fruits, and bottles, which they methodically arranged on the large table.

"Massa! him want small, red, plump snapper, make mizzible brile?" said Nimble Jack.

"Sposee Massa Ossifa him pick shell of land crab, wid cripy pepper for salad?"



"No, no! Put those cool water monkeys on the table and begone! Come, Clinker, take a bite with us!"

Leaving this pleasant party to sip their claret and water, and nibble their mid-day food, while they rambled back to the past or schemed into the future, we will return to the frigate.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE COMMANDER OF THE "ROSALIE."

"THE Rosalie's gig coming alongside, Sir," reported the quarter-master to the officer of the watch.

"QUEER OLD STICK THAT!" SAID THE COMMODORE.

"Very well. A boatswain's mate and two side-lights, Mr. Bat, have the barge manned and send her on shore for the Commodore. Mr. Martin, tell the boatswain to call all hands furl awnings."

While these orders were being executed, the whistles ringing through the ship, the sailors lining the white hammocks, stowed in a double line, fore and aft, around the nettings of the frigate, in readiness to cast off the stops and lacings and let fall the awnings, the officer on deck stood near the gangway. At the same time three striped jackets appeared alongside, lightly touching the snowy main-ropes, a young fellow of about one-and-twenty, dressed in undress frock-coat, one spangle, smooth white trousers, and shoes. Catching up his sword in his left hand as he reached the upper grating of the ladder, he took off his blue, gold-banded cap, and half bounded, with a springy step, on to the frigate's deck.

Observe him well, young ladies, as he stands there; for of all the scarlet or blue jackets, on whose arm you have leaned and looked up at with your soft violet, blue, or dark eyes, and never saw a young fellow that you would sooner give those eyes, or those warm hearts too, than bring under your bodices, or who would drive you wilder to possess him, than that gallant young sailor-officer of the Mosquito's deck.

Ay, observe him well, that tall, graceful youth, with a waist you might span with one of your short plump arms; those slim patrician hands that might wear your own little satin slippers; then that swelling chest and those elegantly-turned shoulders — which will take both arms, each one of these days, to entwine and clasp around them! Ah, but the round throat and chin, the smiling mouth, and hiding a double row of pearl teeth, with the merest moonshine of a mustache darkening the short upper lip, and then those large, fearless blue eyes, sparkling with health and fun, shaded by a mass of chestnut curls and clusters about his clear, open forehead. Ay, there he stands, "a king and a kingdom" for the girl who wins him!

"Well, Harry, give us your fist, my boy! How do you get on aboard your prize? Not so roomy as the old frigate, eh? And a little more work than you were playing lord-and-master-ant, eh? Well, glad to see you, but can't stop to talk. So jump down below there in the gunroom, change your pea jud through a dinner, and yours won't be ready for an hour yet. Come, bear a hand, or I'll let these awnings fall on your new gold jacket!"

The new-comer tripped as lightly down the ladder to the gun-deck as Mr. Mousse, and making another dive down to the berth-deck, exchanging a rapid volley of pleasantry with the midshipmen in the steerage, he opened the wardroom door and entered. There, in a large open space transversely dividing the stern of the ship, with rows of lattice-domed state-rooms on either side, lighted by open sky-lights from above, with a barrel of a wind-sail coming down between the sashes, and every thing, from beam to bulkheads, painted a glistening white, and the deck so clean that you might have rubbed your handkerchief on it without leaving a stain on the sambrie, around a large extension mahogany table stretching from side to side, the cloth removed, decanters and wine-glasses here and there, and water monkeys in flannel jackets hanging like criminals from a gallows from the beams under the gun-room mess of the frigate.

"By all that's handsome, here's Darcenteil! Why, Harry, we are delighted to see you!" exclaimed half a dozen voices; "come, sit down here and take a glass of wine with us!"

As the handsome young fellow entered the ward-room all faces lighted up as they saw him. The old sailing-master, who seldom indulged in more than a scowl since he lost his right ear by the stroke of a cutlass in capturing the tender to the Flamingo, seventy-four, off the Hills of Navesink; the rigid old major of marines, who pipe-clayed his very knuckles and wore a stiff sheet-cording for his stock to expose every dip-cipline in the guard; the dear, kind old surgeon, who swallowed calomel pills by the pint, out of pure principle, and who lopped off a leg and had felt yellow-fever pulses all through the still watches of the night, with as much ease as your look of encouragement; and the staid old chaplain, who had often assisted the surgeon and helped to fill bandages, cautiously into own cotton hose for the purpose when those governments stores gave out in battle, and who never smiled, even when committing a murder to the briny deep; the purser, too, prim and businesslike, looking, as if he were a complicated key with an immense lock of his own strong chest, calculating perpetually the amount of dollars deposited to charge, the total of pay to be deducted therefrom, and never making a mistake save when he overcharged the dead men for chewing tobacco; and the gay, young, carrying Lieutenants, who never did any thing else but laugh, unmindful of navigation, pipe-clay, pills, purses, or pursers, though standing momentarily in awe of the sharpish, exacting executive officer at the head of the table, all welcomed, each in his private way, the bright, generous, young blade who dawned upon them. And not only the mess were cheered by his presence, but also a troop of clean-trousered sable attendants, whose wide jaws stretched wider, while the whites of their eyes seemed painfully like splashes of whitewash on the outside of the galley coppers, as they nudged one another and saw-yaw'd quietly away aft there in the region of the pantry.

"Here, my salt-water pet, come and sit down by me where all those old fellows can see you," Stewart, a wing officer for Mr. Darcenteil. "What you won't take a sip of Tinta, and you can only stop a minute because you are to dine with your uncle the Commodore, eh? Well, I'll drink your uncle's health even if you don't!" said the first lieutenant, as he familiarly laid his hand on the young fellow's shoulder and drained his glass.

"Why, Harry, what the deuce did you come down here for?" squeaked out the purser, as he unscrewed his lips into a pleasant smile. "You've put an end to that interesting account the master was giving us of how he lay inside Sandy Hook for six months with a glass to his—"

"Mouth"—loud in the applause.

"It was Sam Jones the fisherman,
Who was bound to Sandy Hook:
But, alas! he missed the Annex,
A solemn oath he took—
That he would catch a load of clams!"

"Silence there, you roarer!" said the surgeon, as he popped a filbert into the wide mouth of the rubicund first lieutenant, while he cut his song short off. "Yes, Harry, that's what you have done in coming here for a minute. But stay a week with us and the master will tell it you again. We've heard it once or twice before."

The old grizzled sea veteran scratched the remains of his ear, and growled jocosely while nodding to young Darcenteil.

"Ah, my dear boy! and I'll tell you how the surgeon and nip-cheese there were entertained in a one-eyed Spaniard at Sandy Hook.

"Let's hear it!" roared every body, except the medico and purser. "Out with it, master!"

"Well, mess-mates, when we were in the old Scourge, a long time ago, one day we anchored in St. Jago de Cuba."

Here the surgeon and purser smiled horribly, and implored the grizzled old navigator not to go on; every body had heard that old story; he had told it with the monkey and rope until it require pills; or else there might be found a mistake in his pay account, and he would like, perhaps, to draw for the imaginary balance he due him, and to drink his grog and scratch the remains of his wide old ear, or pay attention to the load of clams waiting for him at Sandy Hook! But, for mercy's sake, don't repeat that silly, long, old yarn!

"Well, mess-mates, in less than an hour after we had anchored in St. Jago they went on shore to the governor's mansion to dine with the Spanish villain, with one eye, who invited them to make him a visit, and pass the evening on a fine estate he owned in the country, at the foot-hills. Hills, some distance—about four leagues, I believe—from the town. He was a most respectable person to look at, very rich, and remarried a Cuban guarda costa to boot. The Capitano Don Ignacio Sanchez—wasn't that his name, Doctor? Oh! you forget—he—all right! they started with a guide, on hired mules; but when they pulled up at their destination they found the bird had flown there, though they were handsomely entertained by the Señora—a comely, fat, and sprightly Indian lady, whose husband was also cursed her Don for sending people to see her, and the visitors too for coming. However, as her guests had not been invited, they behaved handfully on a supper of the smutiest jerked beef and garlic they had ever smelled. You told me so, Purser."

Both Pills and Purser had forgotten all about it, and thought it would be better to talk of something else; that there was plenty of good wine to drink, in place of drying his lips on such dusty old rubbish.

"Well, mess-mates, after the supper the old lady demanded a little game of monté, and she insisted, too, on making herself banker, though she had no money on the table to back her bets in case she lost—which she had no intention of doing. So she won every ounce, dollar, real, and centavo they had in their pockets! The Doctor and Purser told me they saw her cheat boldly; but what she not only begged off every, but she won their mules into the bargain!"

Here those individuals confessed roundly—standing on the defensive—that the old Señora had a false pack of cards always ready in her ample bosom, and had cheated them in the barest manner conceivable; but as they had no appeal, and were inclined, out of gallantry for the sex, to behave like gentlemen, nobly and like good soldiers.

"Well, mess-mates, toward midnight that hospitable old Señora—"

Here the surgeon began to abuse our friends for not bringing more cash with them when they visited ladies—and then fairly kicked them out of the house! The mules were left, so when I lent you the money to pay the boatmen, after being obliged to tramp all the way back to the ship, nearly missing their billets in the old Scourge."

"Go on, master! Tell us all about it; don't stop!"

"Well, mess-mates, I was on deck while beating out of the channel, and just abreast the Star Castle I heard with a long gentleman in the stern, stripped to a girt line, and howling at rather than hailing the ship. Bear in mind, Doctor, the men refused to take either of your boats, and gave them your coats and trowsers before shoving off. And now you remember, Hardy, how they yelled at us, and we thought they were desirters from that English gun-boat in St. Jago? And here the captain produced the pair of them, when they got on board for going out of signal distance? This is the first time I ever told this yarn," continued the old navigator, tugging away at the lobe of his lost ear.

The young lieutenants shouted, and the old major of marines, forgetful of his iron-stuffed stock, laughed till he nearly sawed his chin off, rubbing his chalky knuckles into his eyes the while.

"But first upon the Almanac
A solemn oath he took—
That he would catch a load of clams—"

"The barge is coming off, Mr. Hardy, with the pennant flying, Sir!" reported a reefer, in the midst of the conversation, to the first lieutenant, as he shoved his bright face through the ward-room door.

"Very good, Mr. Beaver; but hark ye, Sir! the next time you go ashore in the market-boat look sharp that the men don't suck the monkey. Three of them came off drunk this morning. And inform Mr. Est and Mr. Beaver that if I see their heels on the stern sheets of the cutter's cushions again I'll take a better look at them from the top-gallant cross-trees. You understand, Sir? Steward, a glass of wine for Mr. Beaver!" Saying this, the executive officer, with Harry Darcenteil, arose and went on deck to receive the Commodore.

Sylvanus Cobb, Jr., writes as follows of Barney's Coco-Cuticurine and Opera Perfumes.

The perfumes are certainly all that a lover of sweet scents could wish. Mrs. C. is delighted with, and flown to the "Opera Bouquet."

I find, regarding the "Coco-Cuticurine" with the most favorable feelings, that it is working wonders with my certain head of hair not a mile and a half from my house. I'm getting quite bushy. In short, I think I am safe in pronouncing it the most efficient and at the same time agreeable preparation for the hair that I ever became acquainted with. Caution.
THE PATEK WATCH.
In view of the fact that individuals are known to be preparing to impose upon the American public an inferior imitation of the

UNRIVALED LADIES' WATCH,
Messrs. Patek, Philippe & Co.,
of Geneva, Switzerland, the manufacturers of the Patek Watch, have deemed it necessary to request

Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., 550 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, their sole Agents in this city and States, to advise purchasers of this counterfeit. The spurious article is cheaply cased in the original style of ornamentation, and bears engraved upon its cap a forged trade-mark, either Patek & Co., Patek, Philippe & Co., Charles Patek, or Alexander Patek. The genuine is engraved with the name of Tiffany & Co., in addition to Patek, Philippe & Co., and is invariably accompanied by a certificate signed and authenticated. Like all other counterfeits, this attempted imposition is but an unworthy copy in externals alone of the admirable work from which it would borrow reputation; but as it is known that the parties to this fraud are even going to the extent of forging Mr. Patek's own certificate and signature, the purchaser of a Patek Watch can only be sure of its genuineness by obtaining it of the authorized and sole agents, Tiffany & Co.

TO SOUTHERNERS,

DRINKERS OF

Congress Water.

MUCH spurious Mineral Water is sold as "CONGRESS WATER" by unprincipled persons or counterfeiters, who, when they dare not use that name, call it "Saratoga" Water; "Saratoga" being only the name of the town where the Spring is situated.

To protect the public from such imposition, we have put our Corks branded thus [CONGRESS C&W. WATER]

Any one buying those words and letters on the Corks, are Counterfeit; and the Purchaser should prosecute the Seller for swindling.

Orders will receive prompt attention if addressed to us at our Southern Depot of Congress Water, 95 CEDAR STREET, New York City.

CLARKE & WHITE,
PROPRIETORS CONGRESS SPRING.

Lists of dealers who procure Congress Water for their sales direct from our house, are kept at our office for distribution to those who desire to purchase genuine Congress Water in their own neighborhood. C. & W.

Saratoga

Empire Spring Water.

This natural aperient water, from the celebrated

Empire Spring,

At Saratoga Springs, N. Y., needs but a passing notice—the water will commend itself. Nature has designed it as a perfect regulator and blood purifier. It strikes directly at the foundation of all diseases—the impurities of the blood. By its alterative and cathartic virtues it expels from the system all morbid secretions without producing debility or fatigue, like many other cathartic medicines. The large amount of iodine contained in this water renders it

SUPERIOR TO ANY OTHER MINERAL WATER.

And great in the range of application.

All classes of persons, old and young, females bereaved delicate, invalids suffering from indigestion, constipation and long complaints, and persons indulging in late wine suppers, will find the EMPIRE WATER a valuable remedy.

The advertisement of the proprietors of one of the Mineral Springs at Saratoga, addressed to Southerners, drinkers of Congress Water, burdened as much about spurious mineral water, is nothing more nor less than a drive at the Empire Water, and the private character of its proprietors. We challenge comparison between the Congress and Empire Water, and appeal to physicians, druggists and chemists, and drinkers of both waters, for their decision.

The Empire water is put up at the Empire Spring at Saratoga, in pint and quart bottles, with the corks all branded thus [EMPIRE SPRING]

Orders addressed to us at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., or to our depot, 13 John Street, New York, will receive prompt attention.

Proprietors Empire Spring.

For a list of dealers who purchase Empire Water direct from us, we refer you to all the principal druggists and hotels in the city of New York and throughout the United States.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE:

Condiment or no
Condiment?

FIRST—Is a saving of $1 50 per week in the keep of a Horse, with better health, less grooming, and more work, with fourteen feeds of THORLEY'S FOOD FOR CATTLE, costing Forty-two Cents?

SECOND—Is an increase of Six Quarts of Rich Milk daily per Cow, worth two feeds of THORLEY'S FOOD FOR CATTLE, costing but Six Cents?

THIRD—Is a corresponding profit gained on Sheep, Pigs, and breeding and feeding stock generally, worth encouraging small outlays on THORLEY'S FOOD FOR CATTLE?

These are the GRAND QUESTIONS OF THE DAY, and to all of them THORLEY'S customers return him an affirmative answer with the Bell, YES! to the second.

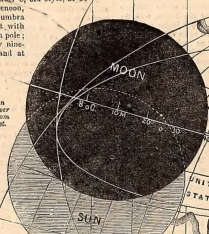
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION



VOL. IV.—NO. 185.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN ON THE EIGHTEENTH JULY.

On 18th July inst. an eclipse of the sun will take place, which will be more or less visible throughout the United States and Canada. We publish below a diagram of the eclipse. The reader must bear in mind that it represents the degree of observation at New York; hence at all places north of this parallel the eclipse will be greater, while at all places south of New York it will be less than is represented in the diagram.

It is hardly necessary to observe that an eclipse of the sun is caused by the passage of the moon between the earth and the sun. The motions of the heavenly bodies being governed by fixed mathematical laws, each eclipse can be predicted with certainty. The first appearance of the eclipse of 18th inst. since the creation of the world (according to sacred chronology) was in the year A.D. 958, December 8, old style, at 10 o'clock 34 minutes forenoon, when the moon's penumbra just came in contact with the earth at the south pole; it has appeared every nineteenth year since, and at each return the moon's shadow passed across the earth from west to east a little further to the north at each return, until the year 1644, March 8, old style, when the centre of the moon's shadow passed a little to the north of the earth's centre (the moon being 14 minutes 46 seconds from her descending node, which was its 88th periodical return). It has continued to appear every nineteenth year since 1644, until this eclipse, which is its sixty-first periodical return. Its next appearance will be in 1878, July 29, at 3 o'clock 23 minutes in the morning, invisible in the United States. It will also appear again in 1896, August 9. It will continue to appear every nineteenth year until the year 2274, April 25, when the moon's shadow will just touch the earth at the north pole, which will be its seventy-sixth periodical and last appearance, until the expiration of 12,492 years, when it will come on again at the south pole, and go through a similar course. The velocity of the moon's shadow across the earth during the eclipse will be about 1850 miles an hour, or four times the velocity of a cannon-ball.

The moon passing over the sun from west to east.

DIAGRAM OF THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN ON JULY 18, 1860.

THE PATH OF THE ECLIPSE.

The penumbra, or partial shadow of the moon, will first come in contact with the earth at the rising of the sun in the northern part of Texas, between the Indian Territory and New Mexico; it will then take a northeasterly and then a southeasterly course over the earth. The umbra, or total dark shadow of the moon, will first come in contact with the earth in the Pacific Ocean, one hundred miles west of the coast of Oregon, directly west of Oregon city, and a little to the southwest of the mouth of the Columbia River. It will then pass in a northeasterly direction over British America to Hudson's Bay, near Fort York, at the mouth of Nelson's River, crossing Hudson's Bay and Labrador to Cape Chidley, which will be the most favorable position on the Continent for observing the total eclipse. It will then enter the Atlantic Ocean, passing due east until nearly south of Cape Farewell, the southern cape of Greenland, where the sun will be totally eclipsed at noon of that place; it will then take a curved line toward the southeast, passing over the north of Spain, the Mediterranean Sea, Algiers, Tripoli, Fezzan, the southwestern corner of Egypt, into Nubia, where it will leave the earth near the Red Sea, a little before the setting of the sun at that place. The path of the umbra, in which the sun will be totally eclipsed, will be only about seventy miles in width; whereas the penumbra, in which the sun will appear more or less eclipsed, will extend from the Gulf of Mexico to 20 degrees upon the opposite side of the north pole, a distance of over six thousand miles. The umbra, in its passage over the earth, makes a curved line; this is caused by the spherical form of the earth. If the earth were a flat surface, the path of the umbra would then be a straight line from northwest to southeast, making an angle with the equator of 12 degrees. At all places south of the line of total eclipse the sun's northern limb will be eclipsed; but in Europe, England, Ireland, Greenland, Iceland, and the northern part of British America, the southern limb will be eclipsed.

HOW TO USE THE DIAGRAM.

The dark circular shade on the hemisphere represents the moon passing between the earth and sun; the shaded disk represents the sun partially eclipsed by the moon. To view this eclipse, as it will appear in the heavens, July 18, at 8 o'clock 10 minutes in the morning (New York time), face the east, take hold of the top of the diagram with your left hand, and the bottom with your right, with the back of the diagram toward the eye —incline the top of the diagram toward the north at an angle of about 45°, so that the north pole of the hemisphere will point as near as possible to the North Star; with the diagram in this position look through the back toward the sun at the time of the eclipse, and you will then have a true representation of the eclipse, and the exact position of the earth, moon, and sun at the time of the greatest obscuration, and the appearance it will present viewed through a smoked glass—as the moon is continually passing to the east, it will first come in contact with the upper limb of the sun, passing down over the sun's disk toward the horizon in the direction of the line of the moon's orbit.

HOUR AT WHICH THE ECLIPSE WILL BE VISIBLE.

The following table will show the hour at which the eclipse will be visible at the various cities on this continent:

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1860.

THE PEACE OF EUROPE SECURED AGAIN.

ACCORDING to the German and French papers, the peace of Europe is once more secured. The interview between Napoleon and a number of German princes at Baden on 16th June settled the matter. Henceforth, armies may be disbanded, ships of war dismantled, and swords exchanged for pruning-hooks; for the Moniteur and the Prussian Gazette both aver that war is impossible, and fraternal amity a fixed fact.

If all this be true—if, by dining with the Prince of Prussia, taking tea with the Grand-Duchess of Baden, and spending a thousand francs in the carved wood-work for which the Baden mechanics are so justly famed, the Emperor Napoleon can prescribe Europe from the horrors of war, it is amazing that the expedient has not been tried before, and Napoleon's responsibility for having neglected it is enormous and appalling. He must be as great a wretch as that Satan in the Arabic tale who, having the power to stay the pestilence by raising his little finger, refused to raise it from pure laziness and indolence.

It may, however, be fairly doubted whether the German and French politicians are not expecting too much from the Baden meeting. Civil speeches between rival sovereigns are pleasant things to hear on 'Change and to read of in history; but have they ever averted wars? No potentate was so fond of royal conferences as Napoleon the First; but the most loving conversations between him and his brother sovereigns always led him to stay his arrival. Nor will it now be different. If a cause of war arises between France and Germany, all the tender interviews between them will float down the wind with other idle words.

The problem of the peace of Europe involves questions which no royal Conferences can determine. It is the fashion in England and in Germany to regard Napoleon as the natural distributer of the world's peace, and to assume that wars will last so long as he is on the throne of France. The same opinion prevailed with regard to his uncle, and, sure enough, there was no peace while he reigned; though whether he or his handed foes were the real promoters of the strife is still an open question. By-and-by, when the history of the Napoleonic era comes to be written philosophically, it will probably be discovered that the wars of the first, as the wars of the second Napoleon, were undertaken more from necessity than from choice: that uncle and nephew were mere Providential instruments in the great rebellion of democracy against established thrones and divine-right dispotisms. So long as the great cause of Europe can be maintained, it is the interest of Napoleon to maintain it; but when war becomes inevitable, it is vital to him to take a part in it. If the people of Europe were one and all satisfied with their governments; if no ridiculous wrongs were being perpetrated; if no Inquisitions; if secret consistory societies were obsolete, and the art of raising barricades lost, we may rest assured that Napoleon would prevent national prejudices from breeding wars, and would counsel his dynasty, strengthen his throne, enrich his people, develop his country, and ennoble his fame. But as the people of Europe are not satisfied with their governments; as atrocious despotisms still flourish, and revolutionary clubs still smoulder, it is necessary to believe that Napoleon will not break out sooner or later, and it would be fatal to Napoleon to remain a passive spectator of the broil.

It is quite probable that Napoleon may have touched upon this point in his conference with the German Princes, as he did in his communications with the Austrian Court before Solferino. If he did, and if these Princes have sense enough to act upon his advice, the final conflict may be postponed indefinitely. The constitutional experience of the hereditary sovereigns are rarely willing to relinquish peaceably that which they are educated to consider their own by divine right. It is highly improbable that these German Kings and Princes and Grand-Dukes will be self-sacrificing enough to avert the peril which threatens them. They will not consider revolution their natural enemy, which they are bound to crush out; and in parts of Germany revolution means freedom of speech and the right of general gatherings of individuals—any thing, in fact, which the Prince don't like.

When the hour comes for an uprising in Germany similar to that which we are now witnessing in Italy, the Baden Conference will no more save the German Princes than Napoleon's loving meeting with the Emperor Nicholas saved at the time of the Crimean war saved Austria in Northern Italy.

THE JUDGMENT IN THE NEW HAVEN RAILROAD CASE.

SEVEN years ago this summer Robert Schuyler absconded from New York, leaving behind him a record of 18,000 shares of New York and New Haven Railroad stock, for which he had obtained the money from innocent parties. He was Transfer Agent of the Company, and could create stock by merely affixing his name to the foot of a certificate. Shortly after the fraud became known the Company, which, of course, would have been vastly depreciated by the recognition of nearly $2,000,000 of additional stock) adopted some system of classification, by which it could say they could not recognize as valid from the spurious stock, and refused to recognize the latter in any way. The holders of the genuine stock, of course, maintained that it was stock they held, and who had no means of distinguishing it from the old stock, took the matter into Court, and last week Judge Ingraham rendered a decision, declaring the Company liable in damages for the overissue.

If this decision should be confirmed by the Courts of Appeal, it will be important, and valuable to all American securities. Whatever may be said about the hardship of making the widows and orphans who have invested through the New York and New Haven Company responsible for the frauds of Schuyler, there is no safety for the public outside of the doctrine that the acts of a properly-constituted agent bind his principal. Once establish the doctrine that the acts of a properly-constituted agent may be repudiated by the principal, and all faith in stocks and confidence will be at an end, and trade and enterprise will die out. On the other hand, establish the doctrine that constituted agents do principals and irrevocably bound by the acts of their properly-constituted agents, and confidence will be general and trade and enterprise thrive.

There is something applicable to the case in capitalist in the word repudiation. There are so many ways of cheating a creditor that, if even the dishonest debtor is not punished, every man will give him a chance. In Mississippi, the State pleaded that she had never received the money for the bonds it issued; Pennsylvania pleaded that their farm mortgages were illegal, the railroads having no power to take mortgages; in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, towns and counties pleaded that they had no legal right to borrow the money they had raised and spent; in Indiana, the plea was more poverty. But whatever the plea was, the result was the same—the creditor lost his money, at least for a time. Tenacious, persevering men, in such cases, sue their debtor, and patiently await the result. But how long? Seven years have elapsed since Schuyler's flight, and we are only at the first stage in the lawsuit! With such a prospect, what sensible man would think of lending any more money to such localities? And how are the people who live there to have their railroads and their other great public works built without public credit?

There are parts of this country where, it seems, nothing but a double-run and-run agitation will satisfy the people that honesty is the best policy.

THE LOUNGER.

VICTOR HUGO UPON SICILY.

In Disraeli's novel of "Henrietta Temple," when Ferdinand Armine meets Henrietta in the conservatory, the conversation falls upon Sicily, and gaily they talk. Armine falls into such expressive complimenting that Miss Temple is obliged to tell him that the strain of his conversation is excessively Sicilian.

We may all say the same of Victor Hugo's late speech at Jersey. It flows like Etna. It shows that he has Sicilian vineyards. It is sweet and stimulating like the wine of Marsala. It is a lyric of liberty; and it is the more difficult to imagine the effect of such an oration upon such a subject, by such a speaker, upon such an audience. No Fourth of July speech ever delivered could have equal surprise set it in fervor. It is even doubtful whether the presentation of the doctrine of liberty to an American audience would be as startling as the reports of the European patriots inflame the republicans. In fact, this speech of Victor Hugo's, and the tone and quality of the feeling with which we here, know most profoundly the differences of "peoples"—a word of which Victor Hugo is very fond, and which seems to be gradually supplanting the word nations.

The fundamental doctrine of this speech at Guernsey is the same as that of the Declaration of Independence—as the struggle of the Sicilians for independence, or the late Revolution, with the exception that it was incited by a leader not a native of the island, but of the same national blood. It is in Italian hands. It is an Italian revolt. If our Revolution was justified, how doubly, how infinitely so is this Sicilian insurrection! Victor Hugo stands the indictment against the Neapolitan tyrant.

"No words: here are the facts. Pay attention. Sicily—that is to say, slavery—bleeding history. The kingdom of Naples—that kingdom which now occupies our thoughts—has but a single instrument, the police. The police has but its undying commission. Two sbirri, Ajossa and Maniscalco, reign under the name of Ministers. Near Naples Maniscalco cudgels Sicily. But the cudgel is merely a Turkish weapon. This Government has, in addition, a Sicilian weapon, the Neapolitan torture. Yes, torture. Listen. A sbirro, Bruno, binds the accused with the head between the legs until he confesses. Another sbirro, Pontillo, fixes him upon an iron grating, beneath which he lights a fire. This is called the burning chair. Another sbirro, Luigi Romeo, is chairman of the chief, has invented an instrument into which the arms or the leg of the victim is introduced; a screw is turned, and the limb is crushed. This is called the 'Angelic Instrument.' Another suspends a man by the hands and feet between two walls, and then jumps on the wall and dislocates his body. There are also thumb-screws for crushing the fingers; a tourniquet for squeezing the head—an iron ring to be screwed, which almost forces the eyes out of its head. Sometimes a victim escapes. A man, named Cardinale, escaped one day, was one of them. His wife, his sons, and his daughters were seized and placed upon the burning chair. The Cape Zafferano touches an African coast. There are three sbirri living sacks. Each sack contains a man; it is plunged into the water, and kept there till the man no longer struggles. He is then taken out, and he is commanded to confess. If he refuses he is plunged in again. Giovanni Vienna, of Messina, expired in this manner. At Monreale an old man and his daughter were suspected of patriotism. The father died beneath the rack; the daughter, Angela Romano, was stripped naked and flogged to death!"

These are the things that drive men and nations mad, and that justify the terrible penalties they exact. Are there people who think the Sicilians are visionary enthusiasts? Let them remember that, making allowance for the imperfections of all government, Bomba's does pretty well—that the Sicilians are not in misery? Are there Americans who have made a leg at Bomba's court, and who relish this dreary twaddle in Mr. Jay's mail to the Earl of Clarendon? Let them turn, and heard them? Hear, then, what the wise Alexander Hamilton said, eighty-six years ago, and learn that patriots and bosoms, thoughtful men, always and every where, are of one mind on questions of humanity. The nations of Europe, England, France, Spain, and all other despotic kingdoms in the world, have an inherent right, whenever they please, to shake off the yoke of servitude (though sanctioned by the immemorial usage of their ancestors), and to model their governments upon the principles of civil liberty.

THE DOLLAR ADMISSION.

It is a very high price, certainly; but any one who saw the Great Eastern coming up the harbor will not grudge it, if for no other reason than that his imagination will not deceived him. That grove of masts in the mists of the lower bay, was that the ship? Those peaks so towering above that they seemed unlike other masts in kind as well as degree? She looked vast and phantom-like in the hazy air. Did the Santa Maria of Columbus appall those other natives with the same silent majesty? Where was Mr. Whitman as we stood staring at the Great Eastern? Was he "inviting his soul" in that multitude of faces that paved the Battery in air?

There was something sublime in the necessary silence of the reception of the Great Eastern. Ten thousand people crying hurrah on the Battery, what was the use? Any distance and the feast of Nothing less than vast knowledges could make an adequate sound. The city bells would have been too weak a music. To be sure Trinity chimes pealed "God save the King"—faint as a strain of memory to those Englishmen. But when the tugs and steamers of every kind were playing about the great ship rang bells and whistled and shrieked, and the stately mass moved by with a few swift taps upon the bell, as in a midnight watch it was, then the spectator felt the thrill which marked the moment for an epoch in his experience.

Mr. Barnum, an experienced showman, thinks that curiosity will be lulled unless the price of admission is soon lowered; and he is of opinion that "no spring shall e'er visit the mouldering urn" of a dead curiosity. But the high price is understood to be the wish of the English management of the ship, which thought that more money could be made with less trouble in that way. And we have supposed the price was to be changed to a cheaper one, of course, by-and-by. The truth is, that there are a great many people who really wish to see the ship, and to see her comfortably. Such persons would willingly pay a dollar and enjoy the greater space. To stream about the ship with thousands of others would be doubtless exciting, but not very pleasant. In this country we wish for comfort as much as any people, and we don't very well know what comfort is. And there can be no more serious objection to charging a high admission, or different rates of admission upon different days, than in charging different prices for passage in the same ship. If there be one thing that our system has demonstrated, it is that it is purely democratic to get the highest price you can.

ABOUT GENIUS.

If a man have great physical strength, does it make no difference whether he use it to help other men to learn how to live? If he be supremely and straight from the shoulder as to crush another man's skull, as a trip-hammer smashes an eggshell, are we to make no other distinction than that of delight in the tremendous power? Is it all the same whether steam drives the splendid ship safe across the waters, or explodes and kills the ship and all its passengers are lost? Is the making of a thumb-screw or a "boot," however exquisitely wrought and cunningly chased in May 'n, as the less criminal because it is Benvenuto Cellini who makes it?

Why is the same judgment not true of genius, of any kind of intellectual power? However symmetrically it may body forth a noble idea, or work in art or literature—however taste may enjoy and admiration contemplate, yet if its influence be baneful or demoralizing, what is the genius but power utterly misapplied—a power without which the world would be really richer? If a man die who has had great intellect, great sportsmanship, and great pecuniary rewards, and he has been only glittering, accomplished, eloquent, and learned, and has neglected no moral life, has purified no young man's ideal, has confused and tortured the simple law of right until the sunbeam become only a luminous and dazzling style of fine genius? Is his genius an excuse? Does it not make his failure as a man all the more glaring? If this is the result of genius, a dreadful personal renown, and not a warm place in the heart of youth and age and a purifying touch upon their lives, who would say pray that the race might be spared any more men of genius?

FEDERAL ART.

THE end of a session of Congress is like the sinking of a great ship, which sends down with it crews, small boats, people, spars, chips, and all kinds of light floating material. The late adjournment was not effected without many such pieces drifting, drowning the treasures lost in the final disappearance to be counted the Art Commission. The taste which makes this Commission a kind of monster cafe or restaurant in the style of its decoration, and which tilts General Jackson's bronze horse upon his hind legs—makes the dog, and Bancroft, Everett, Brown, and Lambden are sent about their business, and, as we learn, without compensation at their own and cruel fulfillment of every duty implied in the Commission.

Their report was admirable. It showed what ought to be done, and what they said commended itself to the good sense of every body who understands and enjoys art. In Washington it is a great nuisance and a great deal of money for purposes of art. The results, hitherto, are dreary. The Capitol exhibits nothing so bad, was it not possible to do something at least tolerably good? That was the inevitable question of every gentleman in whose mind the taste for what is excellent in art was even slightly developed.

Congress has dismissed the Commission unpaid; and paid and stucco will continue to be purchased at extravagant rates, and daubed all over the public buildings. Why should the Commission paint? Why should we require of a Congress, changing every year and composed of a multitude gathered from all over the land, that it should have esthetic taste? A bronze horse that stands balanced on his hind legs—does it not add a touch of wonder to the thrill of delight? How many private gentlemen who have the desire of collecting a gallery of pictures have also the taste to guide them correctly in the choice? How many such galleries are not full of wretched works?

Do you say that, at any rate, such gentlemen have the great sense to rely upon the judgment of friends who do know, and that the Art Commission was to stand for those friends to the Government? Yes—but how seldom it is, after all, that you find a sailor who is not sure that he can ride a horse perfectly; or a clown who is not confident that he would make a consummate statesman.

The difficulty is not that the Government pays us enormously for atrocious "works of art," but that it does not quietly renounce having any. Should we, the people, not save money?

Perhaps—but what would become of the jobbers?

VICTORIA UPON VIRTUE.

THE Queen has issued a special proclamation exhorting all and sundry English subjects to refrain from swinging—not least in an open and scandalous manner. There is something in the solemn document not unlike the throned Canute bidding the sea to retire. Or the idea of "vice and virtue" is less sure than those of the ocean, and the restraints which are efficacious are not of the official and ceremonious kind.

Queen Victoria, whose oldest son we shall soon have among us, is a woman above reproach. She is also the chief personage in the English system of government, and in that capacity has a great many things to do which must be personally profoundly distasteful. For instance, it could hardly be supposed pleasant for her to salute Louis Napoleon upon the grand staircase at Windsor Castle. Her Queen has been somewhat celebrated for her deference to propriety. It was not very long after her accession that Lady Flora Hastings was exiled from the royal presence under circumstances which apparently involved her character, and the hapless, innocent lady soon after died. That Queen was dead it appeared that she had been ill—nothing worse. But "twas pity that a queen's lady of honor should have been made to retire.

Now the Queen, having issued this exhortation, having commanded "all our judges, mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all other our officers and ministers, both ecclesiastical and civil, and all other our subjects whom it may concern, to be very vigilant and strict in the discovery and effectual prosecution and punishment of all persons who shall be guilty of disorder, profaneness, or unorderly practices," the question is, whether such gentlemen as the geyer noblemen, well known to common fame, are still to be admitted to the royal presence?

And there is another question for whose solution we may look within a very few months. When the young Bomba is hurled out of Naples by the hatred of his people and the execrations of humanity—and it is only to be pleaded that he is not personally responsible for the iniquities of which we gave some illustrations last week, for he must know them, and that he could stop them—when he comes to London, will he be received at Court? And if he be, will the fashionable papers have words to profoundly excited by the presentation of certain Americans to trouble? And if he be, will the "Proclamation for the encouragement of piety and virtue" hang upon the wall of the reception room?

CHURCH'S NEW PICTURE.

MR. CHURCH has just completed another picture of about the size of the "Niagara," representing "Twilight in the Wilderness of Mexico." In this composition is very simple and impressive. A lake, one of a series, such as are common in Maine, stretches back between wooded hilly ridges to the primeval forest—hemlock, oak, and larch—to another lake, beyond which rise the lofty purple mountains of Mexico, and seems to walk like them. The evening sky—of low-hanging, thick-drifting vapors, ribbed with gorgeous light from the sun, which has set behind, but upon the west and the shores, leaving a calm brightness along the horizon—is full of solemn splendor. Indeed the sentiment of the scene is perfect. It is a work of absolute solitude, with the stern aspect of the northern climate with no forms of cruelty or ferocity, but a few birds winging away, dropping hurried homeward notes, if you could hear as well as see; and an alligator, with open a two-ton jaw of fun. It is a scene entirely unhistoric, with no other interest than that of a wilderness, without human association of any kind, and without that picturesque charm which belongs to the Tropics and the Equator. But the almost oppressive gloom of gathering evening in such a scene is rendered with profound skill in the picture, while all the details are elaborated with rare fidelity.

This latest work of Mr. Church has been exhibited at a room in Gospell's building. Every artist ought to be grateful to this man who is doing very important picture he paints. His capital, like an author's, is his reputation; but it the picture passes from his easel into the private gallery or room of the purchaser, nobody but the personal friends of the owner is the wiser. Moreover, works of this character should be seen alone, and not in the paralysing and perplexing contrast with a multitude of others. Some of the artists have undoubtedly felt that any new picture of their number was a rebuke his works separately convicted himself of conceit. But, on the contrary, he merely proves his common-sense. For if the picture be good, the separate exhibition reveals its value most adequately; and if it be bad, the unlucky painter pays the penalty of inviting the public to see what is not worth seeing. He properly takes the risk and the result. And the New York artists, by this perfect respect to attention and criticism of the separate exhibition, have really served the cause dear to them, and have helped to place their individual reputations upon an intelligible basis.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ANECDOTE OF SCHWARTZ.—Sinerant relates the following anecdote of Christopher Schwartz, a famous German painter, which, if true, redounds more to his ingenuity than credit. Having been engaged to paint the ceiling of the Town Hall at Munich by the day, his love of dissipation induced him to neglect his work, so that the magistrates and overseers of the work were frequently obliged to hunt him out at his haunts. At last, one no longer drunk in quiet he studied an image of himself, with the upper part hanging over the ledge where he was accustomed to work, and sent one of his boys to the magistrates, to make inquiry for him in the tavern for that, and to desire it to say at once that the painter of this description he should find in a very distressed, or whole fortune he forfeited. The boy executed the order of the plot. The officers came round to a day to look after him, and were greatly surprised at finding that he was accustomed to wear, suspected nothing wrong, and went their way as they supposed, to search out some of the most industrious and conscientious painter in the world.

A lady was told, the other day, by a traveling gentleman that everybody who had a small mouth was provided with a husband by Government. "My dear," she said to said the lady, making her mouth as little as she could. "the gentleman added, "that I had a large mouth, and she was provided with two husbands. "My gracious!" exclaimed the lady, as her mouth was as large as it could open to its full extent. The gentleman became alarmed, made his escape, and has not been heard of since.

"Why do you always beat me down in my prices?" —"Because you always ask more than you intend to get, and a vulgar fraction should be reduced to its lowest terms."

Sydney Smith.—Sydney Smith, in one of his sermons, remarks, in his many spicy "table"—"Country life is very good—I like it—for cattle; but as for me, I must have society."

A witty man can make a jest; a wise man can take one.

The Bishop of Rio thanked the Bishop of Lisieux for having consecrated him. "It is for me," said the latter, "to thank you." "It was the ugliest Bishop in France until you were elected."

AN INDIAN'S CHOICE.—The Indian sage Ahyra, a great authority in matrimonial matters, being asked by some fellow for the choice of a wife. The girl, he tells us, must not be a child of the same family, nor a friend, nor any fellow-countrywoman, not vicious, nor unhealthy, nor of low origin—above all, not a girl with a mother-in-law who speaks with propriety. She must not inherit a family malady, nor possess a name of evil omen, must neither speak thick nor thin, nor crook like a raven; must not keep her eyes shut, but have large open eyes; must not have dimples in her cheeks, nor gooze skin, nor red hair, nor be too tall, nor too short, nor too like fleet. She must neither be short nor tall, nor fat nor thin, but middling. She must also have fine shoulders, and her eyebrows wide apart. Finally, and most important of all, her gait must resemble that of a young elephant!

The late Judge Peete was a noted wag. A young lawyer one term had a case before him, which he had read brown himself on the verge of imagination into the several propositions of the law of the case. Having heard the Judge struck his rule on the desk two or three times, and reminded the counsel that the court could not, all day, my dear Sir; don't go my higher, for you are already up of the Justices of the Supreme Court."

Moliere was asked the reason why, in certain countries, the king may assume the crown at fourteen years of age, and, in others, not before eighteen? "It is," said Moliere, "because it is more difficult to rule a wife than a kingdom."

The poorest are not unfrequently the happiest. A Sultan, who, as a cure for low spirits, was directed by his physician to dine off the shirt of a happy man, had a diligent search made for the object of his prescription, but in vain. At length, after many fruitless inquiries, he found a beggar who declared he was quite happy. "Then," said the Sultan, "you shall have my shirt." The beggar replied, with tears in his eyes, "Alas! I have no shirt!"

A gentleman, a day or two since, was sitting in a barber's shop, undergoing some tonsorial operation, when the patient in the next chair to him, who was addressed as Brown, our place is on fire."—"Well, let it burn, it's insured."—"But, Brown, the fire is coming in this direction, and I thought I'd just drop in and tell you about it; I don't know how you are for the old proverb, Brown."—"Well, wait a minute or two, till my other whisker's lathered, and I'll be with you."

A celebrated Parisian dandy was ordered by his physicians to follow a course of sea-bathing at Dieppe. Arrived at that fashionable resort, he plunged into the machine and stemmed, and went boldly into the water. He remained there for a few minutes, and returned, shivering and blowing. "Francis," said he, "the sea smells decidedly ill to-day." "Monsieur is right, the Cafe de Paloque into the water, or I shall be suffocated!"

THE PANTOMIME OF LIFE.

BY RICHARD HARRIS.

With steps firm and light, a heart full of care,
Man trudges along, for the scene is a fair;
Life! 'tis a fair, and the world is the show,
And the shortness of manhood forbids him to play.

The shortness of manhood, its long enough yet,
When he's grown to a man, to be called to his pay;
The buying and selling, an innocent strife,
Will keep the scene in the market of Life.

All the fairies are there, though perhaps here and there
Love prays in her beauty fall blown on the fair;
The maid has changed dresses, and now plays the wife,
And if she plays fast, cheers the market of Life!

But how often, alas! the pantomime's love is a cloth,
And the fairy of youth to a tormenting witch!
Yet we follow perhaps too hasty the wand and Life's queen,
Till the pantomime's destroyeth the scene.

The vision of childhood and youth's a gone past,
But a mirror reflects all these scenes to the last;
Where the fairies, the clowns, the bustle and strife,
Little actors are entering the market of life.

But be careful, ye actors on Life's busy stage,
Weigh your parts well, and study your lines as you go;
Learn to prize the sweet fairy you're suffered to wed,
And the winds, and leave you a witch in her stead.

Disgrace not the scene, nor the actions to play,
To the best of your skill, for Life giveth away,
The fairy you've wed, and the scene you're in,
You bless or you curse for the rest of her life!

THE SALONS OF PARIS.

UNDER the present empire the Parisian salons are one of the chief centres of opposition. Of all the institutions which the genius of the coup d'etat has created, there have least wavered in the antipathy to the "Nerons de Couche," as Louis Napoleon has been prevalently called. All the leaders in Paris, from the Hôtel Pozzo to the Hôtel Ducastel, are inhabited by masters and mistresses whose business it is, if they open their doors at all, to open them only to people who repudiate and declaim against the present state of government. And if you believe that honesty is better than fraud, and freedom preferable to oppression, you are obliged to the salons of Paris for a sight of a France that these centres of opposition still exist. They, at all events, keep alive a certain abstract sentiment in the midst of it.

For instance, just take the following as a slight example of the "manners of the day." We are at a magnificent hotel—splendid apartment, upon whose plain white (very soberly gilded) panelings hang a few pictures by masters of the old French school (most probably copies), a few busts in sculpture every where, and some comfort (except that the doors stunt badly). Quiet is the presiding deity—the quiet of money. Night is subdued and quiet; the dresses of the ladies and the manners of the men are subdued and quiet—all quiet except the voices of the talkers; these are harsh in the male, shrill in the female, occupants of the saloon. Twenty or thirty visitors drop in; and there is a viscomte, or a marquis, or simply Gaston de Tbis, or Roger de That, from either the Jockey or the Bal de l'Opera. Nice young men are they of what has just happened to one of their own friends, and they tell the following story:

Mr. de Grand-Cheval, a very fine horse, for which he does not particularly care, sells him one fine day to the administration of the Imperial stables. He sells him for a price he bought him for two hundred guineas. A fortnight after the sale his chib-mates greet him laughingly, and say he has known how to "make a good thing of" himself out of his nag." He looks surprised, and the interest in the transaction of which he was paid for by the Emperor four hundred pounds.

"Oh! only doubled, old fellow; which was no bad trick!" says one of the young men to the other. M. de N——, sold the horse for two hundred guineas, but his Majesty paid four hundred; and he committed his grave into the pockets of a very high-placed, star-and-cross-bespangled personage. To M. de N——'s very natural indignation his Majesty's equerry replied, with a shrug:

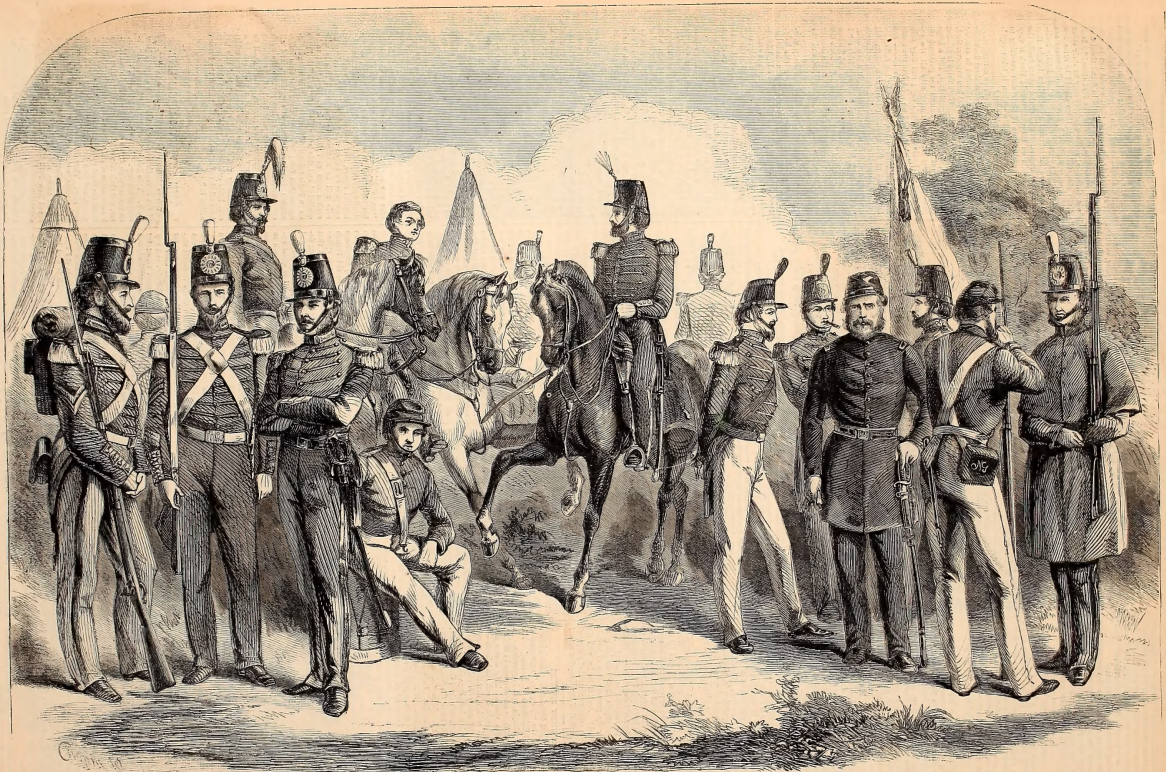
"Well, I have an excellent stud-master—perhaps you have too. Mine cheats me—perhaps yours does too. But what remedy is there?"

Now in the salon we are in this whole proceeding is spoken of indignantly; and is it not well that it should be so? In Imperialist circles, alas! if allowed to be spoken of, it would not be condemned, because where would be found those who could venture to "throw the first stone?" As it not, therefore, well—whatever may be their other little absurdities—that there should be some few social circles where honesty and honor seem to be still called by their names?—where family traditions have for several generations taught that fraud was ungentlemanlike, and where even the very portraits on the walls would blush if they saw the degeneracy even of their race resorting to practices to which the law—in which it is ignorance of them—uses hard terms?

Here, then, the salon is useful as a corrective.

We will now step into another of these drawing-rooms; but this one shall be situated in another quarter, and shall be somewhat less aristocratical. It shall be less quiet too. Here there is gilding in profusion, and great magnificence, and a large assortment of men and women are gathered together, among whom you may note all the celebrities of Louis Philippe's day; and they talk loudly of all that is going on. At last somebody says: "But is it true that Madame M—— has been taken back to her husband by her father-in-law?" and at this question there is a slight lull in the conversation. People look round, and scent a mystery; and a few years ago, in a low tone, "Of course it is true;" and some one adds: "I was at O——" (naming a provincial town) "when it happened, and I know all about it." Then the speaker steps forth, and comes near to the master of the house, and they whisper together, and the story is told.

The son of a great Imperialist dignitary marries a large fortune, represented by a young lady. They go honey-mooning to Vienna. While the bridegroom is nursed (by his own father) to a high financial post, the bridegroom's numerous creditors, however, who, now he is married and rich, will be paid. He charges a friend of his to settle all these unpleasant affairs; but this friend is not settled, and no money is forthcoming. So at last the young husband flies to his young wife, and says: "I am ruined—50,000 francs to-morrow, and the young wife says: "I won't;" besides which she adds, "I can't; for papa tied up my money, you know, upon my marriage, by the marriage deed." Then the young lord and master flies into a rage, and ends by horsewhipping his fair spouse, who runs away to her mamma, and tells her case in the town of ——. Scandal, therefore, is terrible in two provincial cities, and soon in Paris, and "every body" who is "any body" knows the whole story in a week, and this creates fierce anger in high quarters.



Well, then, here are our salon-full of people occupied about this anecdote, when a lady, addressing an elderly man of dignified and solemn countenance, but whose whole attitude is one of the bitterest contempt that can be incarnate in a human form, says: "Why, M. Villemain! (and she names our ex-Minister of State), "you must know all about this." The man thus addressed nods his head. "I do, madame." "Is it true, I do beseech you," "and so do many others, but I request you will not quote me."

And now why does a man so illustrious as Villemain—a man who was one of his sovereign's ministers, and who tried to reform the Jesuit schools with pride—why does he hang back, and about a mere piece of drawing-room scandal "request" not to be quoted on any authority for what he avows he "well knows?" Why? Why, because two nights before a lesser man, an obscurer citizen, had been sent to the very order of the Ministry of the Interior, and transported from his home to the prison of Mazas, where it was thought advisable he should reflect on the folly of talking too freely. Here was his crime: he had "talked." This citizen was but a "friend" who had been charged to "settle" M. M——'s affairs with his creditors, and his testimony to the truth of the whole, imprudently given, had brought down upon him the ministerial rigors, and probably several months will now pass by before this helpless victim of despotic rule will be restored to freedom. And he is why such a man as Villemain is desirous "not to be quoted;" and this is the kind of "talk" that goes on in Paris salons. In some there is more indignation than fear; in others, more fear than indignation: but in all there is opposition, and all attendant, in greater or less degree, to the work of "correcting" the despotic form of government under which France now groans. Who shall be prepared to say that such action is as useless or as useless one? Shall we, who live in the very midst of publicity and daylight, assert that in this one only little evidence of public opinion that escapes from all the silent obscurity that hems the French nation in?

THE SEVENTH REGIMENT.

WE publish on the following page the uniforms of the Seventh Regiment, the crack corps of New York. This fine body of men are famous throughout the country. Their visit to Richmond, Virginia, on the occasion of the obsequies of President Monroe, and their trip to Washington at the time of the inauguration of the statue of Washington, rendered them the most conspicuous of all our militia regiments, and won for them the applause of all military men. They deserved still higher praise some years since, when, on the occasion of the Astor Place riot, they were called out to preserve the public peace, and, by their coolness and nerve, saved New York from dangers of the most terrible character.

The Seventh, commanded by Colonel Marshal Lefferts, have gone to Staten Island to encamp on the grounds of the Richmond Club. They will remain in camp ten days.

THE LONDON FIRE-ESCAPE.

THE recent terrible accidents in tenement houses have directed public attention to the want of fire-escapes in this city; and we now engrave a fire-escape just imported from London. The machine is thus described:

"When not in use it has very much the appearance of a hook and ladder apparatus, two pair of supporting hooks and ladder apparatus, two pair of supporting wheels and horizontal ladders being the prominent re-movable features. Only one pair of wheels is attached to these used in London, the body of the escape assuming a perpendicular position when drawn through the streets. The presence of telegraph wires in this city has compelled the adding of the extra wheels, so as to put it in a horizontal position when not in use. The length of the present apparatus, as it stands on the ground, is thirty-five feet. It can, however, on the table-extension principle, and is capable of being elongated seventy-four feet, or less, as occasion requires. On the end of the ladder designed to go uppermost are small pulleys to aid in adjusting it in place. Underneath the ladder is a canvas bag, with a wire guard covering, to prevent it from taking fire. Through this bag invalids, decrepit persons, nervous women and children, can be let down with safety to the pavement from the upper stories of any dwelling, while others can walk down the ladder. Its entire weight is 750 pounds, and cost about $100."

IX.

ONCE out of sight of the church I pressed forward briskly on my way to Knowlesbury.

The road was for the most part straight and level. Whenever I looked back over it I saw the two figures steadily following me. For the greater part of the way they kept at a safe distance behind. But once or twice they quickened their pace, as if with the purpose of overtaking me—then stopped—consulted together—and fell back again to their former position. They had some special object evidently in view, and they seemed to be hesitating or differing about the best means of accomplishing it. I could not guess exactly what their design might be; but I felt serious doubts of reaching Knowlesbury without some mischance happening to me on the way. Those doubts were realized.

I had just entered on a lonely part of the road, with a sharp turn at some distance ahead, and had just concluded (calculating by time) that I must now be getting near to the town, when I suddenly heard the steps of the men close behind me.

Before I could look round one of them (the man by whom I had been followed in London) passed rapidly on my left side, and hustled me with his shoulder. I had been unprepared for the manner in which he and his companion had dogged my steps all the way from Old Welmingham than I was myself aware of, and I unfortunately pushed the fellow away smartly with my open hand. He instantly shouted for help. His companion—the tall man in Sawkeeper's clothes—sprang to my right side, and the next moment the two scoundrels held me pinioned between them in the middle of the road.

The conviction that a trap had been laid for me, and the vexation of knowing that I had fallen into it, fortunately restrained me from making my position still worse by an unavailing struggle with two men—one of whom would in all probability have been more than a match for me single-handed. I repressed the first natural movement by which I had attempted to shake them off, and looked about to see if there was any person near to whom I could appeal.

A laborer at work in an adjoining field who must have witnessed all that had passed. I called to him to follow us to the town. He shook his head with stolid obstinacy, and bent his head away in the direction of a cottage which stood back from the high road. At the same time the man who held me between them declared their intention of charging me with an assault. I was cool enough and wise enough now to make no opposition. "Drop your hold of my arms," I said, "and I will go with you to the town." The man in the gamekeeper's dress roughly refused. But the shorter man—who sharp enough to look to consequences, and not to let his companion commit himself by unnecessary violence. He made a sign to the other, and I walked on between them with my arms free.

We reached the turning in the road, and there, close before us, were the suburbs of Knowlesbury. One of the local policemen was walking along the path by the roadside. The men at once appealed to him. He replied that the magistrate was then sitting at the town-hall, and recommended that we should appear before him immediately.

We went on to the town-hall. The clerk made out a formal summons, and the charge was preferred against me with the customary exaggeration and the customary perversion of the truth on such occasions. The magistrate (an ill-tempered man, with a sour enjoyment in the exercise of his own power) inquired if any one on or near the road had witnessed the assault; and, greatly to my surprise, the complainant admitted the presence of the laborer in the field. I was enlightened, however, as to the object of the admission by the magistrate's next words. He remanded me at once for the production of the witness, expressing at the same time his willingness to take bail for my reappearance if I could produce one responsible surety to offer it. If I had been known in the town he would have liberated me on my own recognizances; but, as I was a total stranger, it was necessary that I should find responsible bail.

The whole object of the stratagem was now disclosed to me. It had been so managed as to make a remand necessary in a town where I was a perfect stranger, and where I could not hope to get my liberty on bail. The remand merely extended over three days until the next sitting of the magistrate. But in that time, while I was in confinement, Sir Percival might use any means he pleased to secure my future proceedings—perhaps to screen himself from detection altogether—without the slightest fear of any hindrance on my part. At the end of the three days the charge would, no doubt, be withdrawn, and the attendance of the witness would be perfectly useless.

My indignation, I may almost say my despair, at this mischievous check to all further progress—at the trifling in itself, and yet so disheartening and so serious in its probable results—quite unfitted me at first to reflect on the best means of extricating myself from the dilemma in which I now stood. I had the folly to call for writing materials, and to think of privately communicating my real position to the magistrate. The hopelessness and the impudence of this proceeding failed to strike me before I had actually written the opening lines of the letter. I was not till I had pushed the paper away—not till, I am ashamed to say, I had almost allowed the vexation of my helpless position to conquer me—that a course of action suddenly occurred to my mind, which Sir Percival had probably not anticipated, and which might set me free again in a few hours. I determined to communicate the situation in which I was placed to Mr. Dawson, of Oak Lodge.

I had visited this gentleman's house, it may be remembered, at the time of my first inquiries in the Blackwater Park neighborhood; and I had presented to him a letter of introduction from Miss Halcombe, in which she recommended me to his friendly attention in the strongest terms. I now wrote, referring to this letter, and to what I had previously told Mr. Dawson of the delicate and dangerous nature of my inquiries. I had not revealed to him the truth about Laura, having merely described my errand as being of the utmost importance to private family interests with which Miss Halcombe was concerned. Using the same caution still, I now accounted for my presence at Knowlesbury in the same manner—and I put it to the doctor to say whether the trust reposed in me by a lady whom he well knew, and the hospitality I had myself received in his house, justified me or not in asking him to come to my assistance in a place where I was quite friendless.

I obtained permission to hire a messenger to drive away at once with my letter in a conveyance which might be used to bring the doctor back immediately. Oak Lodge was on the Knowlesbury side of Blackwater. The man declared he could drive there in forty minutes, and could bring Mr. Dawson back in forty more. I directed him to follow the doctor wherever he might happen to be, if he was not at home—and then sat down to wait for the result with all the patience and all the hope that I could summon to help me.

It was not quite half past one when the messenger departed. Before half past three he returned and brought the doctor with him. Mr. Dawson's kindness, and the delicacy with which he treated his prompt assistance quite as a matter of course, almost overpowered me. The bail required was offered and accepted immediately. Before four o'clock, on that afternoon, I was shaking hands warmly with the good old doctor—a free man again—in the streets of Knowlesbury.

Mr. Dawson hospitably invited me to go back with him to Oak Lodge and take my quarters there for the night. I could only reply that my time was not my own; I could only ask him to let me pay my visit in a few days, when I might repeat my thanks, and offer to him all the explanations which I felt to be only his due, but which I was not then in a position to make.

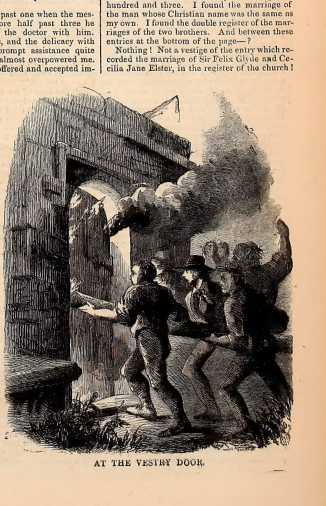
We parted with friendly assurances on both sides; and I turned my steps at once to Mr. Wansborough's office in the High Street.

Time was now of the last importance. The news of my being free on bail would reach Sir Percival to an absolute certainty before night. If the next few hours did not put me in a position to justify his worst fears, and to hold him helpless at my mercy, I might lose every inch of the ground I had gained never to recover it again. The unscrupulous nature of the man, the local influence he possessed, the desperate peril of exposure with which my blindfold inquiries threatened him—all warned me to press on to positive discovery without the useless waste of a single minute. I had fixed time to think while I was waiting for Mr. Dawson's arrival; and I had well employed it. Certain portions of the conversation of the talkative old clerk, which had wearied me at the time, now recurred to my memory with a new significance; and a suspicion crossed my mind darkly, which had not occurred to me while I was in the vestry. On my way to Knowlesbury I had only proposed to apply to Mr. Wansborough for information on the subject of Sir Percival's mother. My object now was to examine the duplicate register of Old Welmingham Church.

Mr. Wansborough was in his office when I inquired for him.

He was a jovial, red-faced, easy-looking man—more like a country squire than a lawyer—and he seemed to be both surprised and amused by my application. He had heard of his father's copy of the register; but had not even seen it himself. It had never been inquired for before—and it was no doubt in the strong-room among other old papers that had not been disturbed since his father's death. It was a pity (Mr. Wansborough said) that the old gentleman was not alive to hear his precious copy asked for at last. He would have ridden his favorite bobby hunter than ever now. How had I come to hear of the copy? was it through any body in the town?

I parried the question as well as I could. It was impossible at this stage of the investigation to be too cautious; and it was just as well not to let Mr. Wansborough know prematurely that I had already examined the original register. I described myself, therefore, as pursuing a family inquiry, to the object of which every possible saving of time was of great importance. I was anxious to send certain particulars to London by that day's post; and one look at the duplicate register (paying, of course, the necessary fees) might supply what I required, and save me a further journey to Old Welmingham. I added, that in the event of my subsequently requiring a copy of the original register I should make application to Mr. Wansborough's office to furnish me with the document.



After this explanation no objection was made to producing the copy. A clerk was sent to the strong-room; and after some delay returned with the volume. It was of exactly the same size as the volume in the vestry; the only difference being that the cover was more smartly bound. I took it with me to an unoccupied desk. My hands were trembling—my head was burning now—I felt the necessity of concealing my agitation as well as I could from the persons about me in the room before I ventured on opening the book.

On the blank page at the beginning, to which I first turned, were traced some lines in faded ink. They contained these words:

"Copy of the Marriage Register of Welmingham Parish Church. Executed under my orders; and afterward compared, entry by entry, with the original by myself. (Signed) Robert Wansborough, Vestry-clerk." Below this note there was a line added in another handwriting, as follows: "Extending from the first of January, 1800, to the thirtieth of June, 1815."

I turned to the month of September, eighteen hundred and three. I found the marriage of the man whose Christian name was the same as my own. I found the double register of the marriages of the two brothers. And between these entries at the bottom of the page—?

Nothing! Not a vestige of the entry which recorded the marriage of Sir Felix Glyde and Cecilia Jane Elster, in the register of the church!

AT THE VESTRY DOOR.

My heart gave a great bound, and throbbed as if it would stifle me. I looked again—I was afraid to believe the evidence of my own eyes. No! not a doubt. The marriage was not there. The entries on the copy occupied exactly the same places on the page as the entries in the original. The last entry on one page recorded the marriage of the man with my Christian name. Below it there was a blank space—a space evidently left because it was too narrow to contain the name of the marriage of the two brothers, which in the copy, as in the original, occupied the top of the next page. That space told the whole story! There it must have remained, in the church register, from eighteen hundred and three (when the marriages had been solemnized and the copy had been made) to eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, when Sir Percival appeared at Old Welmingham. Here, at Knowlesbury, was the chance of committing the forgery, shown to me in the copy—and there, at Old Welmingham, was the forgery committed, in the register of the church!

My head turned giddy; I held by the desk to keep myself from falling. Of all the circumstances which had struck me, in relation to that desperate man, not one had been near the truth. The idea that he was not Sir Percival's friend, but that he had no more claim to the baronetcy and to Blackwater Park than the poorest laborer who worked on the estate, had never once occurred to my mind. At one time I had thought he might be Anne Catherick's father; at another time, I had thought he might have been, himself, Mrs. Catherick's husband—of the offence of which he was really guilty had been, from first to last, beyond the widest range of my imagination. And by what means by which the fraud had been effected, the magnificent daring of the conception that represented, the horror of the consequences involved in its discovery, overwhelmed me. Who could wonder at the home-remembrance of the wretch's life; at his desperate alternations between abject duplicity and reckless violence; at the undisguised gaiety with which he had made his imprison Anne Catherick in the Asylum, and had given him over to the vile conspiracy against her, when he bore suspicion of not one and the other knew his terrible secret? The disclosure of that secret might, in past years, have ruined him—might now destroy him for life. The disclosure of that secret, even if the sufferers by his deception spared him the penalties of the law, would deprive him of the last blow of the name, the rank, the estate, the whole social existence which he had usurped. He knew the Secret, and it was mine! A word from me, and house, lands, honorers, were gone from him forever—and from me, my self-interest driven out into the world a nameless, penniless, friendless outcast! The man's whole future hung on my breath—and he knew it by this time as certainly as I did!

That last thought steadied me. Interests far more precious than my own desperately call for caution which must now guide my slightest action. There was no possible treachery which Sir Percival might not attempt against me, in the danger and desperation of his position he would be staggered by no risks, he would recoil at no crime—he would literally hesitate at nothing to save himself.

I considered for a minute. My first necessity was to secure positive evidence, in writing, of the discovery that I had just made, and, in the event of my personal misadventure happening to me, to place that evidence beyond Sir Percival's reach. The copy of the register was sure to be safe in Mr. Vanborough's strong-box. But the position of the original, in the vestry, was, as I had seen with my own eyes, my thing but secure.

In this emergency I resolved to return to the church, to apply again to the clerk, and to take his assistance extract from the register which I slept that night. I was not then aware that a legally-certified copy was necessary, and that no document merely drawn out by myself could claim the proper importance, as a proof. I was not aware of it, and my determination to keep my present proceedings a secret prevented me from asking my questions which might have procured the necessary information. My only anxiety was the anxiety to get back to Old Welmingham. I made the best excuses I could for the discomposure in my face and manner, which Mr. Wansborough had already noticed; laid the necessary fee on his table; arranged that I should write to him in a day or two to the office, with my hand in a whirl, and my blood throbbing through my veins at fever heat.

It was pitch dark. The idea occurred to me that I might be followed again, and attracted no attention.

My walking-stick was a light one, of little or no use for purposes of defence. I stopped, before leaving Knowlesbury, and bought a stout country cudgel, short, and heavy at the head. With this homely weapon, if any one man tried to stop me, I was a match for him. If more than one attacked me, I could trust to my heels. In my school-days I had been a noted runner—and I had not wasted for practice since—as the later time of my experience in Central America.

I started from the town at a brisk pace, and kept the middle of the road. A small cross rain was falling; and it was impossible, for the first half of the way, to make sure whether I was followed or not. But at the last half of my journey, when I supposed myself to be about two miles from the church, I saw a man run by me in the rain, and then heard the gate of a field by the roadside shut, so sharply. I kept straight on, with my cudgel ready in my hand, my ears on the alert, and my eyes straining to see through the mist and the darkness. Before I had advanced a hundred yards more, I saw a resting in the hedge on my right hand, and three men sprang out into the road.

I drew aside on the instant to the foot-path. The two foremost men were on me—I struck out before they could check themselves. The third was as quick as lightning. He stepped—half turned—and struck at me with his stick. The blow was aimed at hazard, and was not a severe one. It fell on my left shoulder. I returned it heavily on his head. He staggered back, and jostled his two companions, just as they were both rushing at me. This circumstance gave me a moment's time to defend them, and took to the middle of the road again, at the top of my speed.

The two unhurt men pursued me. They were both good runners, the road was smooth and level, and for the first five minutes or more I was conscious that I did not gain on them. It was perilous work to run for long in the darkness—I was certain to fall, or to dash my head against the hedges on either side; and any chance obstacle in the road would have thrown me down as a certainty. Soon I felt the ground changing: it descended from the level, at a turn, and then rose again beyond. Down hill the men rather gained on me; but, up hill, I began to distance them. The rapid, regular thump of their feet grew fainter on my ear, and I calculated by the sound that I was far enough in advance to take to the fields, with a good chance of their passing me in the darkness. Diverging to the left-hand, I made for the first gate that I could guess at, rather than see, in the hedge. It proved to be a closed gate. I vaulted over, and finding myself in a field, kept across it steadily, with my back to the road. I heard the men pass at the gate, still running—then, in a minute more, heard one of them—after him another—come back. It was no matter what they did now! I was out of the road, out of their hearing. I kept straight across the field, and, when I had reached the further extremity of it, waited for the sound of pursuit to come near me.

It was impossible to venture back to the road; but I was determined, nevertheless, to get to Old Welmingham that night.

Neither moon nor stars appeared to guide me. I only knew that I had kept the wind and rain at my back, and that I knew nothing—and if I now kept them at my back still, I might at least be certain of not advancing altogether in the wrong direction. Accordingly, as soon as I crossed the country—meeting with no worse obstacles than hedges, ditches, and thickets, which every now and then obliged me to change my course for a little while—until I found myself on a broad road, which I resolved to keep away steadily before me. I descended to the bottom of the hollow, squeezed my way through a hedge, and got into the road. Then, having turned to the right on leaving the road, I now turned to the left on the chance of returning to the line from which I had originally started, following the muddy windings of the lane for ten minutes or more, I saw a cottage with a light in one of the windows. The door of it was open to the lane, and I went in at once to inquire my way.

Before I could knock at the door it was suddenly opened, and a man came running out with a lighted lantern in his hand. He stopped and held it up to the light of me. We both started as we saw each other. My wanderings had led me round to Knowlesbury, by the village, and had brought me out at the lower end of it. I was back at Old Welmingham; and the man with the lantern was my first friendly acquaintance of the morning, the parish clerk.

His manner appeared to have altered strangely in the interval since we had parted at the church. He looked suspicious and confused; his ruddy cheeks were deeply flushed; and his first words, when he spoke, were almost unintelligible to me.

"Where are the keys?" he said. "Have you taken them?"

"What keys?" I asked. "I have only this moment come from Knowlesbury. What keys do you mean?"

"The keys of the vestry. Lord save us and help us! what shall I do? The keys are gone! The keys are gone!" cried the old man, shaking the lantern at me in his agitation; "and the book is gone!"

I flew? When? Who can have taken them?"

"I don't know," said the clerk, staring about him wildly in the darkness. "I've only just got back. I've been at the 'Three Jolly Boatmen' this morning—I locked the door and shut the window down—it's open now, the window's open. Look! somebody has got in there and taken the keys."

He turned to the casement-window to show me that it was open. The door of the lantern came loose from its fastening as he swayed it to and fro, and the wind blew the candle out instantly.

"Get another light," I said, "and let us both go to the vestry together. Quick! quick!"

I hurried him into the cottage. The fear struck that I had every reason to expect, the treachery that might deprive me of every advantage I had gained, was at that moment perhaps in process of accomplishment. My impatience to reach the church was now almost as great as my certain inactive in the cottage while the clerk lit the lantern again. I walked out, down the garden path, after him.

Before I had advanced ten paces a man approached me from the direction leading to the church. He spoke respectfully as we met. I could not see his face; but judging by his voice only, he was a perfect stranger to me.

"I beg your pardon, Sir Percival—" he began.

I stopped him before he could say more.

"The darkness misleads you," I said. "I am not Sir Percival."

He went back directly.

"I thought it was my master," he muttered, in a confused, doubtful way.

"You expected to meet your master here?"

"I was told to wait in the lane."

With that answer he entered his steps. I looked back at the cottage and saw the clerk coming out with the lantern lighted once more. I took the old man's arm to help him on the rest of the way, and we hurried on together more quickly. We hastened along the lane and passed the person who had accosted me. As well as I could see by the light of the lantern he was a servant out of livery.

"Who's that?" inquired the clerk. "Does he know any thing about the keys?"

"We won't wait to ask him," I replied. "We will get to the church first."

The church was not visible, even by daytime, until the end of the lane was reached. As we mounted the rising ground which led to the building from that point, one of the village children—a boy—came to meet us, attracted by the light we carried, and recognized the clerk.

"I say, measter," said the boy, pulling officiously at the clerk's coat, "there be summun up yander in the church. I heerd un look the door on hisself—I heerd un strike a loight wi' a match."

The clerk trembled and leaned against me heavily.

"Come! come!" I said, encouragingly. "We are not too late. We will catch the man, whoever he is. Keep the lantern and follow me as fast as you can."

I mounted the hill myself. The dark mass of the church was now the first object I discerned dimly against the sky. As I turned aside to get round to the vestry I heard heavy footsteps behind me. They came from the second to the church after us.

"I don't mean any harm," he said, when I turned round on him; "I'm only looking for the master." He stopped, in which he spoke betrayed unmistakable fear. I took no notice of him, and went on.

The instant I turned the corner and came in view of the vestry I saw the lantern-skylight on the roof lighted up from within. A stone fell out with dazzling brightness against the murky, starless sky.

I hurried through the church-yard to the door.

As I came to it there arose a strange smell stealing out on the damp night air. I heard a snapping noise inside—I saw the light above grow brighter and brighter—a pane of the glass cracked—fell in—and the heat and smoke met us.

The vestry was on fire!

I paused for a moment—before I could draw breath after that discovery. I was horror-struck by a heavy thump against the door from the inside. I heard it shaken and worked violently in the lock—I heard a man's voice, behind the door, raised to a dreadful shrieking, screaming for help.

The servant, who had followed me, staggered back shuddering, and dropped on his knees. "Oh, my God in heaven!" he cried, "it's Sir Percival!"

As the words passed his lips the clerk joined us, and at the same moment there was another loud, a last, grating turn of the key in the lock.

"The Lord have mercy on his soul!" said the old man. "He's suffocated and dead. He has hampered the lock."

I rushed to the door. The one absorbing purpose that filled all my thoughts, that had controlled all my actions, for weeks and weeks past, vanished in an instant from my mind. All remembrance of the foul conspiracy the man's crimes had inflicted; of the love, the innocence, the happiness he had pitilessly laid waste; of the oath I had sworn in my own heart to summon him to the terrible reckoning that he deserved—all fled from my memory like a dream. I remembered nothing but the horror of his situation. I felt nothing but the natural human impulse to save him from a frightful death.

"Try the other door!" I shouted. "Try the door into the church! The lock's hampered. You're a dead man if you waste another moment on it!"

There had been no renewed cry for help when the key was turned for the last time. There was no sound now of any kind to give token that he was still alive. I heard nothing but the quickening crackle of the flames and the sharp rap of the fire against the skylight glass.

I looked round at my two companions. The servant had risen to his feet: he had taken the lantern and was standing by, vacantly at the door. Terror seemed to have struck him with downright idiocy—he waited at my heels, he followed me as I moved like a dog. The clerk sat crouched up on one of the tombstones, shivering and moaning to himself. The one moment in which I looked at them was enough to show me that they were both helpless.

Hardly knowing what I did, acting desperately on the first impulse that occurred to me, I seized the servant and pushed him against the vestry wall. "Hold up," said I, "and hold by the stones. I am going to climb over you to the roof—I am going to break the skylight and give him some air!" The man trembled from head to foot, but he held firm. I got on his back with my cudgel in my hand, seized the gutter-ledge with my hands, and was instantly on the roof. In the frantic hurry and agitation of the moment I never struck me that I might let out the flame instead of letting in the air. I struck at the skylight, and battered in the cracked, loosened glass at a blow. The fire leaped out like a wild beast from its lair. If the wind had not chanced, in the position I occupied, to set it away from me, my exertions might have ended then and there. I crouched on the roof as the smoke poured out, and then I looked down.

The flames and flashes of the light showed me the servant's face staring up vacantly under the wall; the clerk risen to his feet on the tombstone, wringing his hands in despair; and the dreary prospect of the village, haggard men and terrified women, clustered beyond in the church-yard—all appearing and disappearing, in the red of the dreadful glare, in the black of the choking smoke. And the man beneath my feet!—the man, suffocating, burning, dying so near us all, so utterly beyond our reach!

The thought half maddened me. I lowered myself from the roof by my hands and dropped to the ground.

"The key of the church!" I shouted to the clerk. "We must try it from the outside—I will save him if we can burst open the inner door."

"No, no, no!" cried the old man. "No hope! the church key and the vestry key are on the same ring—both inside there! Oh, Sir, let's past saving—he's dead and asleep by this time!"

"They'll see the fire from the town," said a voice from among the men behind me. "There's a engine in the town. They'll save the church."

I called to that man—he had his wits about him—I called to him to come and speak to me. It would be a quarter of an hour at least before the town engine could reach us. The horror of remaining inactive all that time was more than I could face. In defiance of my own reason, I persuaded myself that the doomed and lost wretch in the vestry might still be in a condition on the floor, might not be dead yet. If we broke open the door might we save him? I knew the strength of the heavy locks—I knew the thickness of the nailed oak—I knew the hopelessness of assailing the one and the other by ordinary means. But surely there were tools still left in the dismantled cottages near the church? What if we got one and used it as a battering-ram against the door?

The thought leaped through me like the fire leaping out of the shattered skylight. I appealed to the man who had spoken first of the fire-engine in the town. "Have you got your tools handy?" I said. "Yes, they are. And a hatchet, and a saw, and a bit of rope?" Yes! yes! yes! I ran down among the villagers with the lantern in my hand. "Follow me—follow me to every man who helps me!" They started into life at the words. That ravenous second hunger of all passions—the hunger for revenge—roused them into tumult and activity in a moment. "Two of you for more lanterns if you have them—two of you for the hatchets and the tools! The rest after me to find the beam!" They cheered—with shrill screeching voices they cheered. The women and the children fled back on either side. We rushed in a body down the church-yard path to the first empty cottage. As a man was I believe the last the clerk—the poor old clerk standing on the flat tombstone alone and wailing over the church. The servant was still at my heels, his white, helpless, panic-stricken face was close over my shoulder as we plunged into the cottage. There were rafters from the torn-down floor above lying loose on the ground, but they were too light. At least ten across our bodies, but not out of reach of our arms and our pickaxes —a beam fast at each end in the ruined wall, with cattle-stalls fencing off ripped away, and a great gap in the roof above open to the sky. We attacked the beam at both ends at once. God! how it bulked now how the whole fabric of the wall resisted us! We struck, and tugged, and tore. The beam gave at one end—it came down in a heap of brickwork and dust. There was a scream from the women all huddled in the doorway—a cry of horror and despair from the men—two of them down, but not hurt. Another tug all together, and the beam was loosened in both ends. We raised it, and gave the word to clear the door-way. Now for the work! now for the rush at the door! There is the fire streaming into the church—how brightened even to light us! Steady along the church-yard path —steady with the beam for a rush at the door. Now, then, all together! Off—and the cheering again, irrepressible. We have shaken it already; the hinges must give if the lock won't. Another run with the beam—off—back—then —and off. It's loose! The stealthy fire darts at us through the crevices all round it. Another and a last run! The door falls in with a crash. A great hush of awe, a stillness of breathless attention succeeds the furious hubbub of us. We look for the body. The scorching heat on our faces drives us back: we see nothing—only below, all through the room, we see nothing but a sheet of living fire.

"Where is he?" whispered the servant, starting vacantly at the flames.

"He's dust and ashes," said the clerk. "And the book as our dust and ashes—and do, Sirs, the church will be dust and ashes soon!"

Those were the only two who spoke. When they were silent again nothing stirred in the stillness but the bubble and the crackle of the flames.

Awful.

A harsh rattling sound in the distance—then the boiler burst—the horses' hoofs—full upon—then the low roar, the all-predominant tumult of hundreds of human voices clamoring and shouting round us. The engine at last!

The people about me all turned from the fire and ran eagerly to the brow of the hill. The old clerk tried to go with the rest; but his strength was exhausted. I saw him holding by one of the tombstones. "Save the church!" he cried out, faintly, as if the firemen could hear him already. "Save the church!"

The only man who never moved was the servant. There he stood, his eyes still fastened on the flames, in a changeless, vacant stare. I looked at him, I shook him by the arm—he was past rousing. He only whispered once more, "Where is he?"

In ten minutes the engine was in position; the well at the back of the church was feeding it, and the hose was carried to the door-way of the vestry. If help had been wanted from me I could not have afforded it now. My energy of will was gone—my strength was exhausted—the turmoil of my thoughts was fearfully and suddenly stilled, now I knew that he was dead. I stood useless and helpless—looking, looking, looking into the dark room.

I saw the fire slowly conquered. The bright-ness of the glare faded—the steam rose in white clouds, and the smouldering heaps of embers showed red and black through it on the floor. There was a pause—then an advance altogether of the firemen and the police, which knocked up the door-way—then a consultation in low voices—and then two men were detached from the rest, and went out of the churchyard through the crowd. The crowd drew back on either side, in dead silence, to let them pass.

After a while a great shudder ran through the people, and the living law widened slowly. The same two men were doing it, with a door from one of the empty houses. They carried it to the vestry, and went in. The police closed again round the door-way; and then stole out to me among the crowd by twos and threes, and stood behind them, to be the first to see. Others waited close to me to be the first to hear. Women were among these last—women with children in their arms.

The talking from the vestry began to flow out among the crowd—they dropped slowly from mouth to mouth, till they reached the place where I was standing. I heard the questions and answers repeated again and again, in low, eager tones, all round me. "Have they found him?" "Yes."—"Where?" "Against the door: on his face."—"Which door?" "The door that opens into the church. His head was against it. He was down on his face."—"Is his face burned?" "No." "Yes, it is." "No," scrouched, the whole crowd. "He has his face, I tell you."—"Who was he? A lord, they say."—"No, not a lord. No Something; Sir means Knight." "Knight, indeed, too."—"Is he dead?" "Yes, it does."—"What did he want in there?" "No good, you may depend on it."—"Did he die in no purpose, or burn himself on purpose?" "I don't mean himself; I mean the vestry."—"Is he dreadful to look at?" "Dreadful!" "Not about the face, though."—"No, no, not so much about the face."—"Don't say body about the face." "Is it a man or a woman?" "Who?" "A servant, they say. But he's struck stupid-like, and the police don't believe him."—"Don't say body else know who it is?" "Hush—!"

The loud, clear voice of a man in authority silenced the low hum of talking all round me in an instant.

"Where is the gentleman who tried to save him?" said the voice.

"Here, Sir—here he is!" Dozens of eager faces pressed about me—dozens of eager arms parted the crowd to get room in authority came up to me with a lantern in his hand.

"This way, Sir, if you please," he said, quietly.

I was unable to speak to him; I was unable to resist him, when he took my arm. I tried to say that I had never seen the dead man in his lifetime—that there was no hope of identifying him by means of anything I knew like me. But the words failed on my lips. I was faint and silent and helpless.

"Do you know him, Sir?"

I was standing inside a circle of men. Three of them, opposite to me, were holding lanterns low down to the ground. Their eyes, and the eyes of all the rest, were fixed silently and expectantly on my face. I knew what was at my feet—I knew it by my knees holding the lantern so low to the ground.

"Can you identify him, Sir?"

My eyes dropped. At first I saw nothing under them but a coarse canvas cloth. The clothes lay on it—on the floor—on part of the dreadful silence. I looked up, along the cloth, and there, at the end, stark and grim and black, in the yellow light—there was his dead face.

So, for the first and last time, I saw him. So the Visitation of God ruled it that he and I should meet.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE FOURTH.

The eighty-fourth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence was duly celebrated, and, but for a very severe rain-storm which occurred in the afternoon, exceptionally pleasant and agreeable. At an early hour the busy marchings and countermarchings there were the only indications that the streets were occupied. Shops were shut on pleasure; and only one or two drinking-saloons were open for the sale of liquor to the thirsty people. The order of the day was one of the features of celebration; being nothing less than a period of abstinence, and more generally observed than could have been expected during the day surveyed her huge bulk from the pinnacle fronting the Tombs, and, with the voice of a trumpet, announcing of the reading of the "Declaration," followed by the usual oration and poem. Experience proved that, as usual in the Park, the various orations, and at other places about the city, were the most tiresome incidents to the use of gunpowder there were a large number reported, but no serious accidents occurred on these public occasions. The sufferers mostly are boys, and in every instance where a boy has lost fingers and powder in his hand because necessary. A party of riotous characters broke into a drinking saloon kept by William J. Gillespie, at the corner of Fourteenth Street and Tenth Avenue; and in defending himself from a threatened assault, Gillespie fired upon the crowd, and shot a youth named Daniel McKeever, who was wounded quite seriously. Several men happened from the explosion of pyrotechnics, but none of a serious character.

RECEPTION OF THE NEW FRENCH MINISTER.

The new French Minister, M. Mercier, was on Thursday presented to the President by acting Secretary of State, Mr. Trescott.

The Minister, in offering his credentials, took occasion to express his satisfaction in being accredited to this Government, and closed his brief address by announcing the sincere sympathy of his august master, the Emperor, for the Government and people of this country.

The President, in reply, stated the pleasure it afforded him in receiving the new envoy; and in the course of his remarks made felicitous use of the fact that the French Minister would present his credentials on the anniversary of American independence, which could not fail to remind the people of the United States of the debt the people of this country owed to France in their struggle for existence as a nation, which no people could recall without the liveliest sentiments of gratitude.

The interview passed off with mutual assurances of the most complimentary character.

THE TREATY WITH CHINA.

S. W. Williams, the missionary long resident in China, has arrived at Washington, direct from Pekin, bearing the ratified treaty between China and the United States, and presenting the documents to the Department of State last week. He brings no political news of importance. The state of affairs was not altogether encouraging. Considerable depredations had been committed by the Taeping rebels, growing out of the troubles with England and France.

EXECUTION OF HARDEN.

Jacob S. Harden, who murdered his wife by poison, was executed at Bellefonte, New Jersey, on 6th inst. Great crowds were in attendance. Harden, with his children vied with each other in the vain attempt to catch a glimpse of the unfortunate man. The religious services conducted himself with great coolness, manifesting little feeling and nothing like remorse on account. His partings with his father, his spiritual advisers, his attendants, and his children, were all marked with strong feeling, and a disregard of even conventional decency. He died without a struggle, and was cut down by those who consigned them to their final resting place, on his father's farm at Harden's Run, Pennsy, on Sunday last.

ARREST OF A SLAVER.

The United States steam revenue cutter Harriet Lane, Captain Faunce, arrived on Tuesday afternoon, outside of Sandy Hook, bringing in the bark Storm King, on suspicion of being about to engage in the slave-trade. The King was seized at the Quarantine Ground by Marshal Watts, bound to Cape Palmas, West Coast of Africa, and sailed on Tuesday, 22d inst., from Key West. She had been cleared of the Butlers. Her crew are composed principally of Portuguese and Spaniards, and no American citizen could be gained. Her cargo is such as slavers generally carry to the coast of Africa, and her crew have been observed some curious movements of a steam-tug, but when discovered, all, and the vessel was brought to New York in the Mercedita, having on board a number of men of whom no reliable account could be given. There is no room for doubt but that they were to be put on board the Kate, as appears more than probable from papers found on her, and brought her to the city, and detained her passengers for examination.

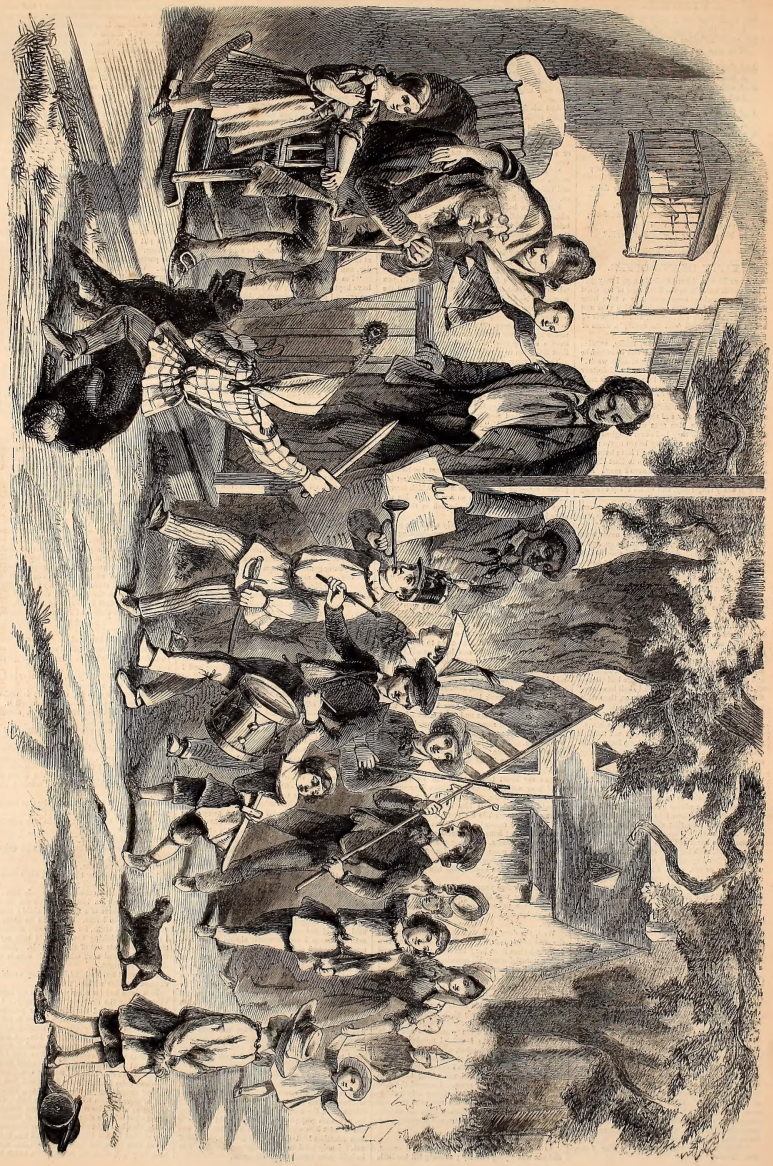
THE MURDERS IN THE EIGHTEENTH WARD.

The mystery attendant on the double murder in the Eighteenth ward, on the night of the 4th inst., still continues to increase in interest. On Monday night, after the brother had been buried, and the funeral services over, by the advice of a friend, proceeded to the house of Justice Dodge for the purpose of making an affidavit to the effect of the law for examination, but that magistrate told him to go away, and that he would attend to the matter on the following morning. Accordingly, on Tuesday, at the opening of the court, Affleck appeared, but was not permitted to prison to await the result of the coroner's inquest. Subsequently he was examined, and stated all the knowledge whatever of the murders, protesting that he can prove any of the parties charged with the crime in the case, but nothing has yet been discovered which tends to the implication of Affleck.

RACE AT PHILADELPHIA.

A dispatch from Philadelphia, July 5, says: "Flora Temple won the race over the Point Breeze track this afternoon in three straight heats. Time, 2:24, 2:24, 2:25. Lantern was second in the last heat. The betting was one hundred to ninety on Patchen. Over four thousand persons were present."

PERSONAL.



Charles Goodyear, the inventor of the art of vulcanizing India-rubber, died on the 1st inst., at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, on the 1st inst., after an illness of four weeks. Mr. Goodyear was born in New Haven, Connecticut, in 1800. The disease which terminated his life had its origin in the severe and long-continued labors of the discovery with which he suffered. Some of the most important uses and applications of vulcanized India-rubber, such as those made by Mr. Goodyear only very recently. He has thus been enabled to reap in the midst of his labors the fruit.

Some German, taking breakfast in their house at Philadelphia, found their steward hanging a noose in the entry. Going thither, they found their mother hanging by the neck to the door. She was quite unmistakably suicide. Instead of cutting her down at once, and thus merely saving her life, all the men ran for a police-man. When they returned with one, of course the old lady was dead.

At Oxford University, England, on the 26th ult., the degree of D.C.L. was conferred on Mr. Motley and on Mr. J. Lothrop Motley, the historian. Among those to be similarly honored were Lord Stanley of Alderley, Lord Lyveden, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Edward Sugden, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Edward Sugden, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Edward Sug

THE FOURTH OF JULY—EIGHTY YEARS AGO.

THE FOURTH OF JULY—NOWADAYS.

WITHERED

On, there was one I used to know,
A tiny babe, whose witching smiles
Set sweet affection all a-glow;
Who won me with her simple wiles.

And there was one I used to know,
A little maid with sunny hair;
And with a brow as white as snow,
And with a heart as light as air.

And there was one I used to know,
A damsel, full of life and grace;
Who walk'd the great world to and fro
With angel-light upon her face.

And there was one I used to know,
Who lived to bless the old and poor;
And once I saw with bitter woe
That Death was standing at her door.

There is a tomb that now I know,
'Tis dark with flow'rets fair and frail;
And to that tomb in vain I go,
In hope to peer "behind the vail."

KITTY DEAN'S OFFER.

"AUNT LIZZIE, Aunt Lizzie, he says I may go!" These words burst in at the front door of my quiet house one morning, accompanied by a trim little figure, a pretty face with laughing blue eyes and cheeks flushed with excitement, and a shower of brown curls escaped from the comb," a dress of pink and white lawn, etc.

"I didn't mean to shock you, really, auntie, but it's no use to look sour, and I was afraid he would never let me; and just think, next week!" And this exceedingly intelligible and satisfactory speech closed with a vigorous hug, which was nearly all I understood of the matter.

"Now stop, Kitty Dean!" I said. "Look me in the face for a whole minute without speaking, and then tell me soberly and slowly all about it."

In ten minutes the blue eyes were looking into mine as gravely as if they had never laughed; but before the minute was up Kitty began again:

"Why, that's it, Aunt Lizzie: I have been begging father for a week to let me go to East Hampton with Mrs. Wood, and now he says I may. And we are going to stay a month, and I shall bathe in the surf every single day, and spend every evening on the beach in the moonlight."

"But East Hampton is not a remarkable place, is it, Kitty? Mrs. Wood told me it was very stupid, but a good place to fatten babies."

"Now stop, Aunt Lizzie. I never went to the sea-side in my life, and I want to go, and it won't be stupid—no!" And the spoiled child looked pettingly into my face. Then laughing again, she said, "And I'll tell you a secret: I have set my heart upon one thing. Now won't you laugh if I tell you what it is?"

"Perhaps not," I said, musingly, my mind reverting to the sewing Kitty's advent had interrupted.

"Well, I must tell you, at all events. I am going to have a lover."

"What are you talking about, child?" I said, impatiently.

"I am going to have an offer I am, auntie. Helen Packer had one at the sea-side last summer, and she says almost all the girls there had them—all the pretty ones. And I think I shall have one. Kitty gave a sly glance at the mirror, then withdrawing her eyes quickly, said,

"But you must not tell father, and I'll give you an account of the whole affair when I come home."

I will spare the reader what I did not think it my duty to spare Kitty, viz.: a long lecture on coquistion, or homily on the sins of flirting, vanity and levity.

The morning of Kitty's departure for East Hampton at length arrived, and I went to the depôt with her to see her safely off and whisper a few more words of sage advice to be thought of in the cars. She needed all the advice I could give her, for she had so absorbed the notion into her silly little head the idea of that offer that she would talk of little else. And the child's amusement at my horror of the idea was such as to dwell upon it all the time.

Mrs. Wood, with her three children, was keeping watch over her luggage and wondering if the cars would never stop, when Kitty and I appeared in appearance. "I'm afraid you will be disappointed, Miss Kitty," she said, as she saw the happy face of my blissful niece; "for East Hampton is very quiet place."

"Disappointed! Oh, I don't expect any thing remarkable, Mrs. Wood."

And Kitty tried to look as if she had been to the sea-side every year of her existence instead of considered it somewhat of a bore to go through the annual performance. Then, having concealed her rapturous delight as long as was needful, she went to them again by snatching Mrs. Wood's youngest from the arms of its nurse, and transforming herself into a baby-jumper, for its amusement and edification. As she danced lightly along the platform, tossing the baby aloft, and laughing her low, musical laugh at the consternation mingled of bewilderment and delight on its tiny features, her graceful figure, thrown back, and with brown hair blown back from her bright face, I thought my Kitty very pleasant to look upon; and as I was thinking so the cars came crashing by, and from their windows I saw many a pleasant look cast at my little niece, and among the faces turned toward her was one I recognized at once as that of a dear friend. He saw me, and, leaving his seat, was soon grasping my hand and speaking warm words of greeting. Kitty danced by us, scarcely deigning a glance at the grave, quiet man; and he said, looking after her,

"What a pretty little creature! Who is she, Mrs. H——?"

"My niece, Kitty Dean," I said, with a little pardonable pride, adding, "The child is very happy to-day, for she is going, for the first time in her life, to the sea-side. Mrs. Wood (you remember Mrs. Wood?) is to take her under her wing to East Hampton, down on Long Island."

"To East Hampton! Why I, too, am on my way to that quaint little village. It is so long since I indulged in a vacation and the sea-side that I feel almost like joining your pretty niece in that very original dance of hers. I do long so for the sea."

And his face lighted up with almost the same boyish smile peculiar to it years before, when he was not the pale, sad man of the present.

"Let me introduce you to Kitty," I said.

"Stay one instant, Mrs. H——. Is she a child or a young lady? Excuse me, but she looks so very childlike just now; and yet—"

"Oh, you must treat her as a young lady, John, or she will never smile on you. She is eighteen, and fully conscious of her weight of years. Kitty, this is my friend, Mr. Burnley."

Kitty drew herself up, and honored Mr. Murray with an exceedingly stately bow—the stateliness being assisted to much extent by her dance with the baby, which she knew he must have witnessed.

"Mr. Murray is going to East Hampton, Kitty; and as he has been there before, he can tell you whether it is 'all your fancy painted' is."

"Oh, how very good of him!" and will you tell me all about the surf, and the beach, and the moonlight, Mr. Murray? Mrs. Wood does not seem to care for any thing about them, except that the bathing cures Johnny's whooping-cough."

"Yes, Miss Dean, all my knowledge and experience are at your service; and if you will let me have a seat by your side in the cars, I will point out Hampton in glowing colors to your mind's eye."

The bell rang, and all hurried to their seats in the cars. Kitty finding time, however, to whisper, as she kissed me, "Now, don't forget to look after her;" thinking thus to destroy my peace of mind for the next hour.

And I was thinking too busily of her sent-mate; and as I walked slowly homeward, I said, again and again, to myself, "Is he happy? Will he ever be happy?"

John Murray had always been a favorite of mine. His mother and I were cousins, and I had interested myself in her boy, at first for her sake, then for his own. From his earliest boyhood he was true and honorable, and his face and his expression—the high sense of honor which seemed natural to him, and which so few have. He was very handsome, and I loved—boylish in this, even after he was a man in years.

He used to talk to me so freely of all his plans, his ambitions, his joys, his disappointments, that in my face with his clear gray eyes, through which I could look right down into his true heart. And it was the loss of that heart's companionship he grieved me so now, since his disappointment.

For John Murray was a "disappointed man," as the world has it. He had loved, and, alas! he had received, bitterly-wronged man.

He had loved, as such true earnest men alone can love, a young Southern beauty, a belle and a belle. Others thought her weak and vain, but he loved her with a life-long, unceasing love. He shall never forget the day he came to me with his face glowing radiantly, and his eyes all full of tears, and told me that she had promised to be betrothed to be his; and how his voice trembled as he said in low, reverent tones:

"To think God has given Mrs. H—— I am not good enough to thank Him, but I will be now."

Ah, how happy he was, poor boy! He went away with his lady-love to the north, and they did travel through the summer. A few weeks passed, and I heard a vague rumor that his engagement was broken. Then I saw him, and found that he did not come home. In two months I read in a newspaper the notice of the lady's marriage to a wealthy foreigner.

How my heart bled for my boy then! but I could hear nothing of him. I was for four months before he came home, and he was then so changed. I could no longer call him a boy. He looked years older than I, and his face had a look about him bitter and cynical as such troubles often do, he had lost that honest frankness which was once his peculiar charm. His heart was sore and reserved, though more kindly and gentle than ever before, even to women—unlike those men who condemn the whole sex because one has proved faithless.

It was now five years since this happened, and John Murray was a middle-aged man. He was an advanced age, yet every one looked upon him as an old bachelor, and few dreamed that he would ever marry.

Well, the days of Kitty's absence went by, and at the time of her return drew near. I had had two or three letters from her; but they were short and rather unsatisfactory, all agreeing upon one point, and that Jack Hampton was coming. I knew the little damsel sadly, and was very glad when, one afternoon, a note was brought me from her, saying, "Dear Auntie, I've come home, and as my Father is going out this evening, and I shall be alone. Please come over right after tea, for I want to see you dreadfully."

Of course I went, for I wanted to see Kitty "dreadfully" too. As I walked up the pleasant road, I met with several friends, who, as I passed aside, I looked up toward the house, thinking she would come to meet me, but I saw nothing of her. Going into the house, and not seeing her down stairs, I went up to her room. I opened the door softly, and came upon Kitty sitting idly looking out of the window. She did not hear the door open, and, as her face was turned from me, did not see me till I came close to her, and drawing back her head said, laughingly:

"Well, Kitty, where's the offer?"

In a minute she had hidden me in my bosom, and she was crying bitterly; sobbing till her little form shook convulsively, and I was fairly frightened. "Kitty, pet, what is it?" I asked, anxiously. "Look up, dear one and speak."

Then she lifted her head and looked into my face. Instead of the bright, plump, rosy face she had worn a month before, she was pale, heavy-eyed, and thin. Sitting down I drew her into my lap and said, while the tears trembled in my own eyes,

"Why, Kitty, you have been ill! Why did you not let me know? I would have gone and nursed you if you had only sent for me. But you never mind now, dear. I have you safe, and you will soon be well and strong. So don't cry." And I smiled faintly at the child.

"Do I look so very thin, auntie? Father thinks so, too, and has gone to see Mrs. Wood about me, just now. I have not been ill."

"Not been sick! Why, what then is the matter? Not been sick!"

"No, auntie, I have not been sick an hour. Wish I were sick; I wish I were dead!" And with another passionate burst of tears, Kitty laid her head down on my bosom. I soothed and quieted her, stroking her hair, kissing her forehead, and singing scraps of lullaby music, just as I had comforted her when her doll had twelve very bad fevers, and she, a little sobbing child, lay in my arms as now.

Presently she grew calmer, the sobs ceased, and at last she lifted the little wet face from my shoulder, and said,

"I'm sorry to frighten you so, auntie; but I have kept it in so long, and I knew you would let me cry; and you always do, Aunt Lizzie, dear."

This she said so mournfully, and with such a piteous look on her pale face, that I broke through my resolution not to question her as to her trouble, and said, quickly:

"What is it, Kitty? That has happened?"

Drawing a long, quivering sigh, she said,

"I think I had better tell you all about it, auntie, though I could not tell any one else in the world; and you promised to say yes to me, and I have quite finished the story, or I shall break down, and I want you to know it all."

Then, with her head on my again, hiding her eyes on my shoulder, and began:

"You know, Aunt Lizzie, the silly speeches I made before I went away about having an offer. Well, though I knew it was silly, I could not help hoping that I should be able to tell the girls about when I came back. I thought it would be so nice to be knelt to on the beach in the moonlight, and have some one say that he could not live if I was cruel, and that; and then I had made up what I thought the prettiest speech in reply, telling him kindly and sweetly, but I could not love him; would always think of him as a friend, and closing by asking if I had ever led him to think I would answer him in a different way. I thought of this so much, that, when I reached East Hampton, I looked eagerly around the table when I sat down to tea at the hotel, to see if Jack was there, and was very much disappointed when he was not one—not a single one. So at last I began to think of—of Mr. Murray."

"John Murray, child! Why—"

"Auntie, please wait. I can't bear it now. I did not think of Mr. Murray till he began to be with me a good deal, to walk with me, and get out into the surf with me, and sit with me. But he was so pleasant and agreeable, and there wasn't any one else, and I liked him; so it was very easy to think of him, and I liked him better than I did. So I never declined any of his attentions; and I used to talk and sing and walk with him till at last we were inseparable all the time. I was so sure so pleasant to have him like me so much, prefer me to all the other ladies, that I really forgot all about Jack Hampton at last, and did not care to see him or to make it. But at last it came. Oh, Aunt Lizzie, I had never dreamed it would be like that. We had been for a walk, and the moon had been before he went we made up a party to drive down to the beach and see the moon rise. There was quite a large party—Mr. and Mrs. J's, Parsons, and the other houses. When we reached the beach we separated and went off in different parties—some sat on the branches under 'the bower,' some outside on the sand, while others walked off up the beach. Mr. Murray and I wandered away from the rest, and soon found ourselves quite out of sight of all the others. Then he spread his shawl on the sand, and we sat down to wait for the moon. I knew what he was going to say; I felt it was coming; and I was a little frightened, but still somewhat vain and very much foolish, foolish child that I was! It seems so long ago, as if I had grown old since then. He began in such a low, solemn voice, and told me exactly what he loved years ago; how she tried with and deceived him; how through all the long years since then he had never breathed her name or thought of her till to me. Then he said he did not believe with those who think a man who once loved could ever love again. He had given all his love to a mere dream—a boy's vision—and it had all come back into his heart, ever since I had been a young girl, a worthier object. And then he told me how he loved me. Oh, Aunt Lizzie, such words as he used! He did love me, for in the short time since we had been together, this love had come up in his heart, growing every day and hour as he saw my simple, girlish nature developing. Love is a terrible, guileless!' when I had been so artful and wicked.

"Then he stopped a minute, and, bending forward to look into my face, he took both my hands in his and said,

"'Will you be my wife?'

"There was my offer. Oh, how I wished in that minute that I had never met him—that I had never gone to East Hampton! I was trembling and frightened; the story of that other love had made me cry with pity; and now, how could I be the one to hurt him again, to make him think all women heartless? I did not say a word. I could not. I only drew my hands away from his. But he held them tightly and said again,

"'Will you be my wife?'

"Then I tried to remember what I had meant to say, and I stammered out something about feeling sorry I could not love him, and hoping he had never thought I meant to encourage his attentions, and—oh! I don't know what I said; it was all trifling nonsense. Shall I ever forget his grieved look when I had done? He looked into my eyes a minute, and then said, in a low, sad voice,

"'Kitty Dean, if you do not love me, if you will not be my wife, say so at once. I am no boy, to waste my love played with. In mercy say it quickly, if at all.'

"Then I said, as firmly as I could,

"'I do not love you, Mr. Murray. I can not be your wife.'

"He turned away then, covered his face in his hands, and sat so a long time, still and silent. I thought my heart would break, to see that strong, noble man, whom I am not worthy to think of, so bent down with what I had made him do. I could not bear it. I crept to him and knelt before him. I clasped my hands and said,

"'Oh, Mr. Murray, I am so sorry!'

"He uncovered his face, put his arms around me, and drew me close to his breast; and as he there, one little minute, whispered 'Good-by, my child!' then put me away and rose up. That was our parting. We walked together to join the rest of the party; but all the time I felt miles away from him. We had parted, and I shall never be near him again. He is more cold to me than just as he put me out of his arms. That is the story. Now you know all, Aunt Lizzie—now you may say all the harsh, bitter things you think of—nothing can be too bad for me."

And the child fell to crying again.

"I can not scold you to-night, Kitty," I said. "You are miserable enough as it is; and you must not cry another hour, or we shall have you really sick."

So I smoothed the poor little thing and put her to bed, like the child she is, and then sought my brother-in-law, anxiously waiting to hear my opinion of his pet. I quieted his fears, assuring him that Kitty was quite seriously ill, only suffering from the effects of the sea air, to which she was not accustomed.

Then I went home, thinking very hard.

Notwithstanding Kitty's grief, my heart turned away from her now to John Murray—my poor John. I was then as one in the world for whom I could wish to play her school-girl's pranks with but my boy I had always loved with a mother's love, and now my niece in my heart. To be sure she was wretched at first it now; but it was mere childish wretchedness, which would soon wear away, while John would suffer on.

But days passed by, and Kitty only looked sadder and paler, and showed no more interest in any one or any thing. But every day she would steal quietly into my room as I sat at work, sit down on a stool at my feet, and lay her head in my lap, scarcely ever speaking unless in reply to some question of mine. And so she would sit by the hour. I could see that such an expression of patient sorrow on the little face, which had always been so bright, that I grew sadly troubled. I had not thought it would be so hard on a child, and now she was really pining away from pity for John Murray.

"You must not be so sad, Kitty," I said one day, as she sat in her usual place at my feet. "It makes me ever father feel so badly. Try to be brighter and happier."

"Happier! Aunt Lizzie, I can never be happy again," said the child, mournfully.

"You must try to be, dear. It is useless to mourn so for the past. You can not recall it. You can not restore the sorrow you have caused by sorrowing so yourself."

"If I could only die for him!" she cried, passionately.

A new light dawned upon me. Perhaps the girl loved John Murray. If so, I felt sure she was not to know it. But I thought it was best she should make the discovery; otherwise she might possibly reject John again, if he ever vowed a second time.

"Kitty," said I, "what was the true reason for your refusal of Mr. Murray's offer?"

"Reason! Why, I was not in love with him."

"Not then?"

"Never, Aunt Lizzie!"

"Yet you would die for him?" I said, quietly. She started up.

"What do you mean, aunt?"

"That you care for him, Kitty, more than you have owned to yourself yet."

A sudden flush crimsoned her pale face; she stood before me an instant, her bosom heaving, her eyes like those of a frightened child; then she crushed from the room. She must be alone with this new-found truth, for truth I knew it was now. I sat alone, thinking how I should have set two troublesome pets out of their trouble. Now that they really loved each other, I felt sure it would all come out right.

But I must have a hand in it; they would never come together without me.

Now John had for some years been my legal adviser, having the charge of my property. I now determined to send for him, under pretense of wishing him to examine some papers in my possession, and thus to contrive a meeting between him and Kitty. I did not tell him. I did not tell Kitty what I had done. Indeed, I scarcely saw her at all for several days. Now that I knew her secret she avoided me, and absorbed through her paleness every time she met my eye.

When John Murray came he seemed just what he had seemed for years—quiet, grave, reserved; but no more so than when I saw him last. He attended to my business with the same thoughtful care he had always shown. I spoke of Kitty carelessly, that he might not think by my avoiding the subject that I knew his secret; asked him if he cared East Hampton, and said my niece had not been very well since her return. To which he replied, absently, that he saw Miss Dean frequently in East Hanover, and that she seemed in good health while there. His manner, while saying this, was not at all lover-like; but then I did not expect it to be. John Murray was no boy, to blush and stammer when in love.

The day that his sister, John went out to walk, I was sitting in my little sewing-room at my work when Kitty came in. She was pale, and quiet as usual, and, after kissing me, "Good-morning," she sat down silently at the open window. Suddenly I was startled by her exclaiming,

"Aunt Lucy!"

I turned, and seeing our crimsoned face, her half-frightened, half-reproachful look, I knew she had seen Aunt Murray coming. She also started toward the door, but I laid my hand on her arm.

"You shall not hide, Kitty," I said, decidedly. "You shall not trifle with him again. Stay!"

She stood, timid, irresolute, and on entered the room. In his face there can be strength, and a faint color tinged his cheek, but he moved courteously, and held out his hand to her that was for my benefit, who was supposed to be ignorant of the affair). Kitty took his offered hand without looking at him. But now the shadows had left her face, and it was very white. As John glanced at her he exclaimed, involuntarily,

"You have been ill, Miss Dean!

She looked up at him, not his anxious gaze, and, covering her face with her hands, burst into tears. Poor child, she had become a perfect Niobe of late. John Murray looked annoyed. His pride would not let him submit to be slighted by the woman who had refused his hand. His face flushed, and holding his head high, looking as proud and handsome, he said,

"I am sorry my presence distresses you, Miss Dean. Let me assure you, in these tears are shed from compassion for me, I do not require them. I need no one's pity!" and he moved from the room.

Here was a situation! What should I do? I was in despair. Every thing seemed desperate as opened the door, I whispered hastily unseen by Kitty, "John, come here—she loves you."

He hesitated, looked irresolute at me, then glanced at Kitty, whose face was still covered with the little hands which had thrown a veil between him and the woman she had once loved. His expression softened, and I rushed from the room, leaving them to be happy or miserable together. was I now of a happy termination to my manœuvring that I went coolly off to market, and staid away an hour. When I came home Kitty's little straw-hat still hung in the hall, and from my sewing room I heard low murmurs issue, which convinced me that they were there as yet there. Before opening the door I thoughtfully made a great deal of unnecessary noise with the handle till the time singing in the parlor had become silence.

But when I did open it! There was John—the grave, sad old bachelor—sitting on the sofa with his arm encircling the waist of my sweet, pretty Dean, who, as I entered, looked up with a beaming, blushing face, and looking at that audacious arm, said, apologetically,

"He won't take it away."

I wrung his hand, and cried I, as, like a silly old woman, I put my arms about both of them, and fell to crying and laughing.

"Kitty has given me a 2, Mrs. R——, to make up for that first one which was so unlike what she expected," said John, laughing

"Oh! that piece of folly I only please. Mr.—tell—John!" murmured Kitty

And "John," delighted with the sound of his name from those lips, repeated solemnly and fervently after her; and as he had no Bible to kiss, to prove the sincerity of his vow, he had to substitute for the volume what happened to be nearest. So he did!

THE LOTS UPON THE RAFT.

SOME years ago I happened to be wind-bound in the port of L——. A furious westerly gale had set in at the full of the moon, and raged like the violence which can be appreciated only by those "who go down to the sea in ships," and "behold the wonders of the deep."

The hurricane whistled wildly through the rigging; great sheets of spray, beaten into foam-froth under the rough breaks-crest of each surge whose shelter we lay, were whirled aloft through the spars, showering down on the deck that narrowed above, like clouds of snow-drift driving through the pines on a dark mountain side.

"Sail ho!" cried Murtagh Moriarty. A sail, Murtagh jewel!" exclaimed two or three fishermen to our weather-beaten pilot.

We peered through the seaward, and in the intervals of the drift and mist, just under the lofty cliffs, and almost within the broad belt of snowy breakers that lashed the shore, I saw a gallant ship under close-reefed topsails and courses, staggering under the pressure of the latter as if carried on with a terrific impetus, and in a direction in order to extricate her from the fearful position she was in—the lee-shore of the thick haze of rain and surge had betrayed her.

"God be merciful! Hud by the living—"

Whatever the rest of the words would have said died upon his lips; a mighty wall of waters came rolling down upon the hapless bark just as she was about to double the point of the headland corner. At the moment she wavered to her course, as though her helmsman was paralyzed at the appalling peril. It was, however, for a moment only. Again she bore over to the hurricane squall, until all her broad decks were visible. Then was a great sheet of blinding surge boiling out from under her lee bow, which showed the tremendous velocity with which her desperate crew were forcing her through the broken water; gallantly, coolly, and with stern resolve she was held on that fearful course, amid gathering by her people, and her strength for the last struggle to escape destruction. Already was the towering mass upon her; another moment, and she would be rolled upon the rocks—that seething caldron, a mass of riven planks and timbers—the chaos of despair, of death! We held our breaths in torturing anticipation of what was to follow. Already the cry of the strong swimmers in their agony seemed resounding in our ears; no mortal hand could help, no human aid could reach them. Suddenly her helm was put down: as she came up in the wind the thunder of her shivering canvas sounded like the knell of doom; she lifted buoyantly to the giant sea, rose upon its advancing crest, as if with the last desperate effort of exhausted strength, burst through the curling ridge of white foam, and, falling off on the other tack, disappeared from our fevered gaze in a column of spray, smoke and rain-mist.

"Bravely done! Bravely and well done!" shouted old Murtagh Moriarty, in encouragement.

"Ay—ay—by my soul, the child that sails her is no chicken!" cried a known every shtick in her timber too, or he'd never thry such a thrick as that, I'm well wid her. If a rope yarn failed him, his spirit is in the mast to glory now. The Lord be praised for his marcy in sparin' them! Ids down on their knees they ought to be this blessed minute!"

"Their are sitting on their tails, Murtagh!"

"Throe for you, Billy Duncan, alanna, ay, indeed, that th'er not; here she comes now, squared away before the wind, and scudding as mild as a widowed wid the say drift, that I can't make out what she is at all!"

"Whisht, Murtagh! Spake aisy, can't you? I'll know what she is now. Don't ye see who's comin' along the pier?"

All eyes were directed upon the rapidly approaching vessel in the direction indicated by the speaker. A tall and stately looking female was striding along the rugged causeway, heedless of the fierce furious tempest or the pitiless pellings of rain and spray. She was clothed in mourning of the deepest dye, but barely sufficed to cover her poor weak frame, much less to protect her from the inclemency of the elements. In her features the traces of deep and severe woe-worn features could be traced the vestiges of early and wondrous beauty—the wreck of one of earth's fairest forms. Her eyes were unnaturally and strangely contrasted with the expression of her bright dark eyes, from which a baleful, almost insidious, fire was darting. Her hair, black as jet, escaped with feverish energy, as if in earnest, ceaseless supplication: her gaze wandered not: it was fixed upon the approaching bark. Through and through pointed rocks, and across yawning chasms, she took a long and rapid circuit. Ever and anon her lips moved, as if in prayer, yet she herself appeared not seemed to be aware of the presence of a human being. She gained at length the highest rocky platform she knelt at its margin, lonely, sad, and weird-looking, swaying her body backward and forward, her arms folded on her breast. Her voice now rose in incoherent murmurings, and anon died away; but the same interested vengeful light beamed ever in her eyes.

"Letty Blair, God help her!" exclaimed old Murtagh. "If I was Black Will Gardiner, I'd answer my name to the devil himself, sooner than face such a welkim as this either every day!"

"Ye'ge!"

"For Heaven's sake, Murtagh! what is the meaning of all this? Surely the poor creature must be mad to attempt such an arch exposure. Let us remove her to shelter and warmth."

"Hist, yer honour, hist! it's poor Letty Blair. She's glad to see Black Will Gardiner, the skipper of the Gipsy Bride."

Meanwhile the vessel which had caused all this excitement, with her crew, anxiously eager spirit now appeared as she rounded the pier end in such close proximity that a man might have stepped on to the deck from the rocks. Having several returns to her port after a voyage, there are those at hand to give the tempest-tossed mariners a cheery welcome, and to help them moor their vessel in safe berth. Such were the old cry of recognition, her rigging and startled-looking crew were grouped forward in sullen silence: a tall, dark-featured man conned the wanderers of the deep; no triumphant cheer echoed from the gallant bark, for that she had been fought and won. No: a deep and ominous gloom appeared to hang over the ship and her crew. At last the anchor was dropped, and the arrangements of the captain of the Gipsy Bride arrested my attention. He was a man in the prime of life, of colossal stature, and of a most herculean frame. His withal of a stern, gloomy, and forbidding aspect; and if ever the face of man gave index of the mind, his might be read without effort. The dark, stern features were convulsed in a manner fearful to behold: hatred, rage, fear, despair, all the evil passions which can convulse the human heart, appeared ed in turn: the veins upon his forehead stood out like knotted cord-yarns; his powerful grasp clutched at every thing within his reach. The struggle for contest to grapple with a deadly foe. The struggle for mastery over the tempest within. The shout, the quick walk along the quarter-deck ceased as the moment he caught sight of that kneeling woman. He stood glaring upon her unconscious form in the spring upon his prey. A howl of torture—the pent-up cry of racking mental agony—burst from his lips. It increased into a hurricane shriek. His hand shook like a man's with ague, as, pointing to the form which bent over him from the rocky platform, like that of an accusing spirit, in the hurt of fearful impressions, he thundered forth:

"Eternal fiend! will no one strike that old hag from my sight!"

It was a solemn sight, accompanied by fearful sounds! The ship and her crew were gliding into the safe and sheltered haven, escaped as by a marvel of Providence from a horrible death, and instead of voices uprised in glad thanksgiving for mercy vouchsafed, to hear that awful shout of ribald blasphemy rising high above the roaring of the sea, and the howling of the storm, and the wild weird-looking, kneeling woman, wrapped in her grave-yard garments of woe, muttering forth incoherent ejaculations, in which invocations of Heaven's wrath were strangely mingled with supplications for mercy! The visitation that descended on the body and the soul was prayed for in the same breath as the exemption of the innocent from the doom of the guilty! By the sight or by the day, in the calm or in the storm, by the land or by the sea, sleeping or waking, in health or in sickness, that the fiend which doth not, and the fiend which is never quenched," might prey upon the spirit, blast the hope, wither the strong frame, and dry up the life's blood of the wretch who dare to excast of God and of man!

"I'm thinkin' he's mad the pilot, "yer honour is afger to hear the story of poor Letty Lorimer's and, as I sunested, the old man commenced:

"It's now some twenty years since auld Clement Lorimer was a big man, an' a strhong ship-owner in this same port of L——. He owned ships that went to a great many places beyant the say, an' his word was as good as another man's bond. Well Clement had a daughter, the poor wake crayther that's kneelin' there, an' a fine girl I weary me! I myself that remembers poor Letty Lorimer, the purtiest Colleen Dhas that ever tossed a spindlethwo from a grandmother on a May mornin', an' no coorse all the gay young chaps about there parts used to be sneakin' their caubeens at her; but Letty id have none of them, she was grand-like in her gladyies, an' was given to readin' about great men that wint away the say, an' mad great fortins. Well, there were two appointers sint to auld Clement—the sons of marchints he used to have dalins with—one was a young gentleman, Clement, none wv yer hard-lined, skin-the-cat sort of chap, but a great, big-hearted, jovial chap; ech! shure, they said he was descinded from the great King Robert the Bruce; anyhow, no matther who was at the reckining of him, he was a rank fine, handsome, thrick-the-world sort of a man about him o'ther fellow, they said, was a side-wind from Spain; but he'd an illegant name an' vinteen years, an' was a great favourite. Auld-look-in' sentimenmorous and self-given like—nobody fancied him; but tumpy Letty Lorimer was in every body's mouth. William Gardiner was auld Lorimer's favorite at all events; whether his people had more money nor Donald Clement, I don't exactly; but people said that Letty was to be married to him when he was out on his time. That's always two vetoes to a bargain, although Letty wasn't much consulted at first, bedad she was daytermined she'd have her own way; so the very day Donald Blair was out on his time, off she set to see them sets off and gets married hird an' fast, an' maybe there wasn't the devil's own rockaun about it; however, Clement, sinsible man, he sez to the lad he gain his daughter got, an' had them home, an' daycently married, an' a powerful jollification ther' was ev'ery body got dhrunk, of course, for Donald was such a favorite that nobody envied him but one, and that one was Will Gardiner; nast or near the weddin' he never kem; he was black and sulky as a chained bear. I'm told 'twas dhreadful to hear the oaths he wore about the revenge he'd take on Donald Blair.

"Clement Lorimer, to make up wid him like, gave him the command of the Carlo Zeno, which is an' to show that there was no ill-will betwixt nor between them, he sent Donald Blair out as chief mate: she was a fine ship, as ever yer honor clapped eyes on—oh, a real beauty!—called the Carlo Zeno: that was a awful voyige for Donald, poor, light-hearted Donald Blair—he never kem back; he was logged as washed overboard in a squall off the Great Piton Rocks, near he island of Saint Lucia. I suppose you remember the story, but Will Gardiner challenged 'em all, an' as the say was down each square, an' the crew spoke up, why there the thing was.

"Not wid poor Letty, though—the poor crayther!—she never heard a word from that day to an' the poor auld mother too, wid all Donald's wild ways, was fond ur him, for who wouldn't be poor lad was an orphan, and open-hearted as the light uv day, only fond uv his joke an' his divartshun—small blame to him!—ids a sorry sowl that goes through the world without rubbing a few bright spots in id.

"In the course of time the widow Blair became a mother; and when the child came to life again the fate that child in that boy, only he had the mother's beauty an' all her winnin' ways to the back of all poor Donald's dash an' dayrey; he grew fast, an' auld Clement began to regard him as the apple uv his eye, scarcely to bear him out uv his sight for a minit; bud the dark shadow uv ev hard, thing began to go cross wid the poor auld mother—first one ship was lost without insurance, then another, at last, the only one he had left was the Carlo Zeno.

"Well, the time kem when something must be done wid yoong Donald, so he longer his grandfather to look to, so bedad he heritage uv his poor drowned father was bestowed upon him—and he was sint to command the ill Will Gardiner—oh! but that was a sorry partin', for Clement Lorimer had parted wid his last ship to him, an' in sending his darlin' grandson away he felt sensed like a last hope that he'd bring back the fortune that was gone. Many, many was the requests he made uv Donald that he'd remember the poor say, an' to let him what he had done for Will Gardiner to make him an honest and a Christian man. That same night Black Will, as we always called him, had a long talk with Mrs. Blair, an' he asked her a few questions uv her own: was the sin an' shame uv his life—he asked her to be his wife, an' to forget all she had ever loved as only a woman can love.—Letty; but he was answered that was dead an' gone, uv the man with whom he'd broken the same bread and drunk the same cup, as a ne'er-do-weel that deserved to be forgotten, little knowin'—the blackhearted villain—the woman he had to dale with. Oh, my jewel! it was Letty that up an' gev him her mind; and he left her that night wid the scowl upon his brow and the cure upon his lips.

"More nor a year passed away, and still no news uv the Carlo Zeno. The poor mother was well-nigh distracted, and as for auld Clement he was fairly bemide himself. At last, one fine day, who should come back, as if the finger uv Fate was on him, but Black Will himself, and nobody else, wid the exception uv Art Sullivan, a very auld man, who was carpenter of the ship. She had foundered at say—the crew escaped on a raft; but, after days uv awful sufferin', the only two that were picked off that fatal raft was himself and Art Sullivan.

"The measure of poor Clement Lorimer's bitterness was now full. He had seen ships, and money, and fortune pass away from him; and now the only being that bound him to existence—that his poor old wearied heart clung to—the fair, golden-haired, laughin' boy, when pressure like the sunshine to him, and whose life was wrapped up in his own, was gone, too, and all the world was black and dreary to him. He knew by the look uv rest that brown no brakin' 'til the last day comes round the sea, and broken-hearted, desolate soul was not long findin' it. We laid him in the last restin'-place, an' all that remained of the once great ship-owner was a mouldering corse and a plain little head-stone; and poor Letty was left in solitary widowhood to mourn the days that war past—too poor to be lastin', and too fewin' to be true.

"The little that was left her she spent in charity and prayerin' herself for the home where these only loved best had gone before her.

"Well, yer honer, one night Letty was tould that a dyin' man wanted to make his peace wid the world, and that he should see her.

"'Do you know me?' says he to her, when she wint into the wretched cabin where he was lyin' on the straw.

"'You're Art Sullivan!' says she, 'a faithful servant uv my poor father's.'

"'Ay, God help me, Miss Letty!' says he; 'I was once honest, an' had a clear conscience, bud for that black villain Will Gardiner.' says he.

"'What about him? What of him?' says she. 'Oh! Art Sullivan, asthore machree! if you know any thing of him, for the love lost joy, as sure now about to appear before your Judge, tell me!'

"'Listen, my poor Colleen!' says he. 'Listen —'twas the last words he said for you. 'Twas dayprived on the raft young Donald was safe and sound, and so were all the crew; but we had days and nights uv awful suffering, hunger and thirst and the killin' heat by day soon sent most of them mad, and they jumped into the say, where the sharks made short work of them, and the rest died uv sheer starvation. At last none were left but Will Gardiner, myself, and young Donald Blair. Will, but he was a brave, fine boy! He kept our spirits up by day by day, and bid us cheer up, although the poor fellow himself never peeped from the raft. That terrible man had a little store of rum and biscuit, for I kept my eye on him night an' day; and when he thought I had discovered it, he gave me a taste now and then, but never a morsel or a sup would he give the brave child that was dyin' before his face for want uv food, and I swore to the little Donald swallow some; but no, he had the spirit of a lion. "'No!" he used to whisper, and in his little voice it would fail, "'no, Art, Will Gardiner would not give to the poor men that's gone shall never taste my lips!" It was a just rebuke to myself, a big man, to hear that from the lips uv a child; but I was wake and feeble, and the great black thirst was burning through me, and was severally selishness—so what could I do? When a man is driven to death by inches he craves for life more than ever—more than manliness, more than a wife in him; but that bud was a hero, if ever there was one born. At last the day came that all was gone, another one never followed; 'twas then Will Gardiner stooped over me and whispered a horrid temptation; for, says he, "If we can only prolong life a couple uv days more, we'll be saved." Was he still some of the homeward-bounders!" My blood curdled at his words; but as the day wore on, and no sign or a sail, he spoke to me again. But I swore at him, and he swore at and cursed me, and called me a devil that I'd feel to meet about mercy to a worthless brat. I wondher now he did not throw me overboard, but the coward was afraid of his consequences when alone. At last he spoke out bold, and said the time was come we should draw lots for life; one must die to keep the others alive. I said no, no—that was not God forgive him and me! the lots were drawn falsely, and poor little Donald—oh! God shield that sight from my memory! he was laid down on the burnin' scorching raft that poor small child, I could not be able; I tried to rise and help and save him; but no, I was fender than the rest, and at last the day was struck. Ay, God forgive him, that man-devil! he murdered poor little Donald—he drank of his blood and he ate of his flesh, and he lived to repent it not, too, and bound me by fearful oaths never to reveal what I do now; but I could not be able. Oh! mercy, mercy, Miss Letty! I am good—I am—' The wild cry alone answered; the spirit of the old man had fled, and with it the secuse of poor Letty Blair."

"And is it possible, Murtagh," I exclaimed, "that such a crime has ever been done on the sea?"

"God bless yer honer!" said the old man, "what could we do? Letty told me the story herself in a fit uv delirious clamour the day after the first shock passed away, but then she got worse than ever. Our only witness was dead, and who would take a man's life on the word of a poor crazed woman? But his day will come, yer honer—mark my word for it! But for me him, sure an' fixed! He tried sollin' from other ports, but he always comes back to this. But tell me, yer honer! Letty, poor crayther, is in a dyin' way, agers, "do you believe in the appearance of spirits from the other world?"

"Why do you ask the question?"

"Because poor Letty often wandthers by the say-side, and says that she is talking to little Donald; and thin she kneels down beside old Clement's grave, and whispers to him to be of good heer—that little Donald is comin' to him, and that she is comin' too, but that she must wait for Will Gardiner; and, sure enough, when we see her do'at this, we know he is not far off; and let it be by day or by night that he comes back, there she kneels upon that platform of rock—the first that he sees when he comes, and the last when he goes away. God forgive her poor wanderin', broken sperit, it's not Christian-like, but shure she knows no better—she asks for her poor lost son—once the pride of the heart that shall never bloom again—the light of the eyes that shall never sparkle more but in madness. Terrible will be the fate of the man that wrongs the widowed and the fatherless!"

The old pilot ceased, and I shall do the same, good reader. I tell you the tale as it was told to me; and, for aught I know, the poor maniac mother may still frequent the little pier of L——, and Black Will Gardiner may still be prosperous; but, as sure as the old pilot said it, his day will come.

I need hardly say that the names I have introduced are not the real ones.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A SPLICE PARTED.

The drum rolled, the marines presented arms, the boatswain piped, the side boys and officers took off their caps; and as the colors dropped with the last ray of sunset from the peak, and the broad blue day pennant came fluttering down from the lofty main truck, Commodore Cleveland and his friends stood on the splendid deck of the flag-ship Mocongahela.

It must have been with conscious pride that that brave and loyal commander gazed around him on the noble frigate and her gallant crew. The white decks, the tiers of cannon polished like varnished leather, with the breechings and tackles laid fair and even over and around them; the bright belaying pins, holding their nevercoiling coils of running gear—the burnished brass capstan—the great boom board to the boats amidships with a gleaming star of cutlasses, reflecting a glitter on the ring of long pikes stuck around the mainmast near; all enclosed by the high and solid bulwarks; while towering above, like mighty leafless columns of forest pines, stood the lofty masts running up almost out of sight to the trucks in the fading light; supported by stays and shrouds, singly and in pairs, and braided mazes—black and straight and taut—never a thread loose on rigging or ratlin—and spreading out as they came down in a heavy hempen net, till they disappeared over the rail and were clenched and spliced, or seized and clamped to the bolts and dead-eyes of the chain-plates outside.

THE LOTS UPON THE RAFT.

"Gentlemen, let me make you acquainted with the first lieutenant, Mr. Hardy, and permit me also to present my nephew, Mr. Darcantel, captain—if you please, my friends—of the one-gun schooner Rosalie, formerly the slaver Perdita, cut out of a river on the Gold Coast by the young gentleman who stands before you."

"Rosalie! why that's the name of my niece," exclaimed Piron, "and she is prettier and whiter than your trim little craft, Sir. But you must come with the Commodore to Escondido and judge for yourself. But, bless my soul! you resemble our Rosalie, even if your schooner don't. Why, look at him, Paddy Burns!"

Don Stingo, and Tom Stewart, and the Paddy did look at him, and all shook hands with him, laughing the while at Piron, and asking when old Clinker looked for another earthquake.

"Come, Piron, come, gentlemen, don't let us keep the soup waiting! By-the-way, Mr. Hardy, will you do me the favor to take a glass of wine with us after gun-fire? Thank you. Suppose you bring little Mouse with you—I like children; and perhaps you will excuse the younker from keeping his watch to-night? A little extra sleep in his hammock won't hurt him, you know."

And so Commodore Cleveland raised his hat —followed by the eyes of respect and devotion from officer and sailor—as he passed down the ladder and entered his spacious cabin.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE BLUE PENNANT IN THE CABIN.

"Now, gentlemen, let me get off this heavy coat and epaulets. There! all right, Domino! put the sword in its case, and give me a white jacket. Choose your own places, my friends. Piron, sit here on my right; Henri, take the foot of the table."

These last words were said in French; whereupon Piron started and whispered to the Commodore, "By George, Cleveland! is that youth's name Henry, and does he speak French?"

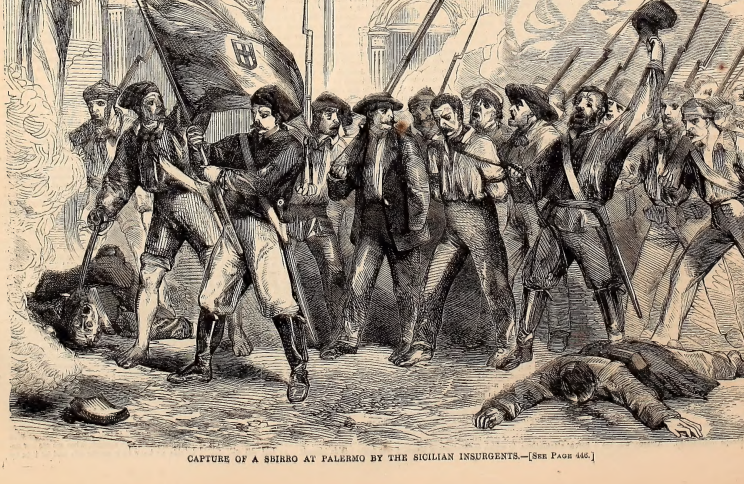
"Hush, Piron! he may hear you! His mother was French, and he speaks the language like a native. She died when he was a baby, and he doesn't like to allude to it. Come, steward, we are all ready! Serve the gumbo!"

"So, my friends," exclaimed the Commodore, "you wish to hear what became of me after I last parted with you?"

"By all means, Cleveland! we are all dying to hear, and—" Here Piron's appeal was interrupted by the heavy report of a low gun, which gave a slight, though almost imperceptible jar to the frigate.

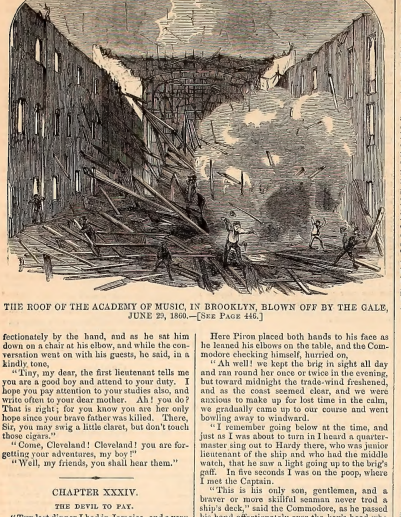
"Smithereens! Stingo! what noise is that?" exclaimed Burns.

"Only the nine o'clock gun, Sir," replied Darcantel.



"Hech, mon!" said Stewart; "ye needna upset ma glass of auld Madeira in yer mickle fright! for I've seen the time when ye ha' laughed at the music in the report of a peestol and the ping of a bullet! But your nervous seestem seems to be unstrung ever since the sma' French dancing Count untied the string o' your waistcoat with his rapier."

"You don't think, Paddy, the Commodore here is going to bang a forty-two pound shot into our stomachs after all the good prog he's filled them with?" added Stingo, sotto voce, while the rotund Milesian threw his head back and twinkled carelessly defiance at them all.



Just then the orderly swung the port cabin door open, and standing up as rigid as a pump-bolt, with a finger to the visor of his stovepipe hat, in cross-belts and bayonet, he announced "Lieutenant Hardy and Midshipman Mouse!"

"Ah, Hardy, glad to see you!" rising as he spoke; "squeeze in there between Stewart and Burns or Darcantel! Here, gentlemen, let me exhibit to you Mr. Tiny Mouse! Don't move, Piron, I'll make a place for him near me."

Saying this, the Commodore took the lad affectionately by the hand, and as he sat him down on a chair at his elbow, and while the conversation went on with his guests, he said, in a kindly tone,

"Tray, my dear, the first lieutenant tells me you are a good boy and attend to your duty. I hope you pay attention to your studies also, and write often to your dear mother. Ah! you do? That is right; for you know you are her only hope since your brave father was killed. There, Sir, you may swig a little claret, but don't touch those cigars."

"Come, Cleveland! Cleveland! you are forgetting your adventures, my boy!"

"Well, my friends, you shall hear them."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE DEVIL TO PAY.

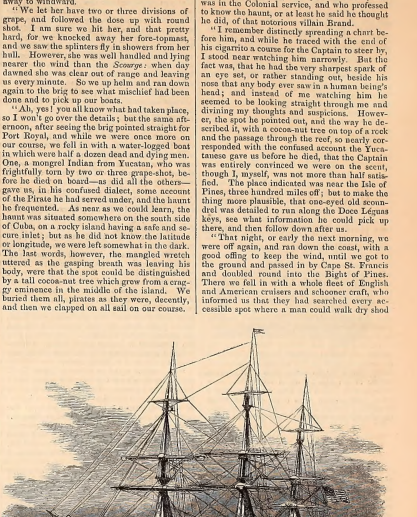
"The last dinner I had in Jamaica, and a very jolly one it was, as you all know, out at Escondido, where we kept it up so late that I only got on board the Scourge at daylight, in time to get her under way with the land wind. Well, we were bound to windward, and for a week afterward we rolled about in a calm off Morant Bay, maybe twenty leagues off the island, and one morning we discovered a sail. She was a large merchant brig, heading any way and bobbing about, as we were, in the calm. Toward noon, however, a light air sprung up and we got within hail, and I went on board to say a word or two to the skipper, for we had news before leaving Kingston that that infamous pirate Brand, in his long-legged schooner Centipede, had been seen off Guadaloupe; and, in fact, we had actually chased him off Matanzas three months before; and so I was elected to give the brig a warning, particularly as she had reported a suspicious craft in sight that same morning at sunrise. When I got on board of her I saw—"

AT THE COMMODORE'S TABLE.

Here Piron placed both hands to his face as he leaned his elbows on the table, and the Commodore checking himself, hurried on,

"Ah well! we kept the brig in sight all day and ran round her once or twice in the evening, but toward midnight the trade-wind freshened, and as the coast seemed clear, and we were anxious to make up for lost time in the calm, we gradually came up to our course and went bowling away to windward.

"I remember going below at the time, and just as I was about to turn in I heard a quartermaster sing out to Hardy there, who was junior lieutenant of the ship and who had the middle watch, that he saw a light going up to the brig's gaff. In five seconds I was on the poop, where I met the Captain.



"This is his only son, gentlemen, and a braver or more skilful seaman never trod a ship's deck," said the Commodore, as he passed his hand affectionately over the boy's head who was sitting beside him.

But he forgot, perhaps, to say that he, Cleveland, had stood by the father when he was struck dead by a cannon-shot, and that afterward he had the boy appointed a reefer, and out of his own means helped the widow to eke out her pittance of a pension. Yes, Cleveland forgot all that as he smoothed the youngster's soft hair, while, with the men around him, he drained his glass in silence to the memory of his departed friend and chief. Then resuming, he went on,

"In less than no time after the light was seen—for you must know, gentlemen, that it was an understood signal between us—the Scourge was flying off with a stiff breeze abaft the beam, the crew at quarters, and the boats ready to be lowered from the davits. Then we ranged up alongside the brig, and even before, we felt certain that our misgivings would prove true, and so they did; and merely slamming a shot over her and dropping a couple of armed boats into the water, we huffed round her bows, and there we saw that cursed schooner-venomous snake as she was—just hoisting her sails and creeping away to windward.

"We let her have two or three divisions of grape, and followed the dose up with round shot. I am sure we hit her, and that pretty hard, for we knocked away her fore-topmast, and we saw the splinters fly in showers from her hull. However, she was well handled and lying nearer the wind than the Scourge: when day dawned she was clear out of range and leaving us every minute. So we up helm and ran down again to the brig to see what mischief had been done and to pick up our boats.

"Ah, yes! you all know what had taken place, so I won't go over the details; but the same afternoon, after seeing the brig pointed straight for Port Royal, and while we were once more on our course, we fell in with a water-logged boat in which were half a dozen dead and dying men. One, a mongrel Indian from Yucatan, who was frightfully torn by two or three grape-shot, before he died on board—as did all the others—gave us, in his confused dialect, some account of the Pirate he had served under, and the haunt he frequented. As near as we could learn, the haunt was situated somewhere on the south side of Cuba, on a rocky island having a safe and secure inlet; but as he did not know the latitude or longitude, we were left somewhat in the dark. The last words, however, the mangled wretch uttered as the gasping breath was leaving his body, were that the spot could be distinguished by a tall cocoa-nut tree which grew from a craggy eminence in the middle of the island. We buried them all, pirates as they were, decently, and then we clapped on all sail on our course.

THE UNITED STATES FRIGATE "MONONGAHELA."

"Steward, another bottle of the old Southside that Mr. March sent from Madeira! Here, Domino, take Mr. Mouse up gently and lay him down on my cot in the after cabin. Dear little fellow! he is sound asleep, and mind you draw the curtains around him lest he take cold from the draft of the stern windows!"

Rather a striking contrast this to the way Captain Brand the Pirate treated the little Henri in the den there in the Dore Léguas.

"Well, gentlemen, for some weeks after these occurences we sailed about the islands, touching here and there, until at last we arrived at the Havana, took in stores and water, and then continued the cruise. The orders were to beat up the south side of Cuba, where we expected to fall in with the musquito fleet and some English vessels, especially detailed to destroy two or three nests of pirates who had for some years swarmed in those seas and infested that coast. In the course of time we beat all around the south side of Cuba, and at last dropped anchor in St. Jago, where we learned from the English Consular Agent that five or six fellows, who had been wrecked on the coast, were identified as having been part of a piratical crew who had plundered a British vessel with a free passport bound to Havana, and had been sent there in irons for trial.

"The truth was, that the Spanish Colonial authorities had so long connived, winked at, or been indifferent to what was going on during the wars of the Continent that they allowed these piratical hordes to exist and thrive at their very doors. The matter had already been brought to the notice of the Administrador of the port, and all other ports as far along the coast as Cienfuegos, and in such a threatening manner too, that the Governor at St. Jago, fearful of having his town blown down, exerted himself in the arrest of the rascals I have alluded to, and likewise in procuring information by dispatching Guarda Costas along the south side of the Island.

"Accordingly, the very morning we anchored I went ashore with the Captain of the Custom-house, where we met the Deputy Administrador and a little withered, one-eyed old rascal, who was in the Colonial service, and who professed to know the haunt, or at least he said he thought he did, of that notorious villain Brand.

"I remember distinctly spreading a chart before him, and while he traced with the end of his cigarrito a course for the Captain to steer by, I stood near watching him narrowly. But the fact was, that he had but one very sharpest spark of an eye set, or rather standing out, beside his nose that any body ever saw in a human being's head; and instead of me watching him he seemed to be looking straight through me and divining my thoughts and suspicions. However, the spot he pointed out, and the way he described it, with a cocoa-nut tree on top of a rock and the passage through the reef, so nearly corresponded with the confused account the Yucatanese gave us before he died, that the Captain was entirely convinced we were on the scent, though I, myself, was not more than half satisfied. The place indicated was near the Isle of Pines, three hundred miles off; but to make the thing more plausible, that one-eyed old scoundrel was detailed to run along the Doce Léguas keys, see what information he could pick up there, and then follow down after us.

"That night, or early the next morning, we were off again, and ran down the coast, with a good offing to keep the wind, until we got to the ground and passed in by Cape St. Francis and doubled round into the Bight of Pines. There we fell in with a whole fleet of English and American cruisers and schooner craft, who informed us that they had searched every accessible spot where a man could walk dry shod upon, from Guayabos to the Isle of Mangles: that they had destroyed several old and deserted piratical nests, and hung two or three ostensible fishermen by way of wholesome warning to their allies the pirates: but that was all; and from what they had learned, there did not seem to have been an established retreat in that maze of keys and reefs for four or five years.

"So you see we had our cruise for nothing, and then the Captain agreed with me that we had both been most egregiously deceived by the Spanish commander of the Guarda Costa. Well, we hauled our wind once more, standing well on to sea, and after a tedious beat of some days, we again edged in toward the coast, somewhere near the Boca Grande of the Twelve Leagues keys on the westernmost side. It was in the morning when we made the land, and steering close in, we got a good shot off the shore and kept the glasses going from the topmost crosstrees down, all through the day. For my part, as Hardy may perhaps remember, I scarcely took the glass from my eye for eight hours, and from the mizzen-top I feel quite sure that there were not many objects, from the size of a blade of grass to a mangrove bush, that I did not examine, from the coral reefs up to the rocky heights, let alone the cocoa-nut tree that we were in search of.

"Toward afternoon, however, the weather came up hazy, the wind began to fall off, and the barometer began to exhibit very queer spasms indeed; rising with a sort of jerk at first, and then dropping down the tenth of an inch at a clip, with the atmosphere becoming close and sultry, and the men gasping about the decks as if we were about to choke at the next breath. It was during the hurricane months, and the indications certainly should have led us as far as our legs could carry us to open water, instead of being caught cockered perhaps with half a thousand reefs around us on what might prove a lee-shore; but nevertheless the Captain decided to hold on till sunset and then make an offing. The breeze still held in the upper sails, and so we slipped on in smooth water till about five o'clock, when I heard a fellow sing out from the main royal yard.

"Oh deck there! I can see a tall cocoanut tree on an island here on the port bow!"

"Before the words were well out of his mouth I too caught the object, and I knew at the first glance that it was the spot we were looking for. At the same time a dun haze lighted up in the west, so we saw the ridge of rocks and every thing as the haunt of that pirate Brand had been described to us. So, my friends, we were all alive once more on board the Scowrge, and the Captain resolved to dash in upon the scoundrel's nest before he could have time to hear of us.

"The engine was rigged and water spurted over the sails from the trucks down, to make the canvas fire-proof. We said, and in half an hour we were within two leagues of the island, and just as the sun fell below the horizon we caught sight of the masthead of a large vessel standing up over some bluff rocks near the bold shore. Not five minutes later the hull of the craft came slowly out from the gap, under all sail, and we discovered her to be a long and rather lumbering-looking brigantine, painted black, and bearing no resemblance to the schooner we had twice chased before. Simultaneously, however, with her coming out into full view, she was rounded in her head yards and got a pull of the main sheet with the breeze abeam and heading to the southward, we beheld a great volume of white smoke spout up over the rock near the cocoa-nut tree, with a vivid sheet of flame at the base, and before the vast column turned, like the crown of a palm-tree, in its descent, we were greeted by a dull, heavy report, the concussion of which fairly made the Scowrge tremble. Then, as the white smoke partially broke away, an avalanche of rocks and timbers seemed to enter ed far and near, and nothing visible but a vail of dust and masses of heavy smoke. Nearly at the same moment of this explosion upwards of a heavy, black smoke arose from another spot nearer to the gap, lit up in the fading, hazy twilight with forked red fires, and after a great conflagration burst forth, swirling flakes of burning cinders all over the island, and casting a lurid glare upon the water around us."

CHAPTER XXXV.

AND THE PITCH HOT.

SAID the Commodore, with a knowing shake of his head, "Ah, gentlemen, if the fellow, who ever he was, that was creeping and crawling nimbly in that lazy-looking brigantine, with English colors at the peak, had written down in detail what he had been doing on that accursed rock of an island, and sent the information off to us in a letter, we could not have read it with more relish than we did the account of what we found on the island. Then, as we were rounding in her head yards and got a pull of the main sheet with the breeze abeam and heading to the southward, we beheld a great volume of white smoke spout up over the rock near the cocoa-nut tree, with a vivid sheet of flame at the base, and before the vast column turned, like the crown of a palm-tree, in its descent, we were greeted by a dull, heavy report, the concussion of which fairly made the Scowrge tremble. CHAPTER XXXV.

AND THE PITCH HOT.

SAID the Commodore, with a knowing shake of his head, "Ah, gentlemen, if the fellow, who ever he was, that was creeping and crawling nimbly in that lazy-looking brigantine, with English colors at the peak, had written down in detail what he had been doing on that accursed rock of an island, and sent the information off to us in a letter, we could not have read it with more relish than we did the account of what we found on the island. Then, as we were rounding in her head yards and getting the seal! We could have told him that that little scoundrel with one eye had purposely misled us, and that Byron him warning spoke his stronghold; and that he had hastily got his plunder and people on board his vessel, blown up and set fire to his nest, and that the explosion he was now on board of was once upon a time the notorious schooner Centipede! Yes, we knew all that instantly; and that I'll tell you how we seized upon it."

Piron sat with his eyes fixed upon the speaker, taking in every word as it fell from his lips, his teeth set close together and the hand clenched which supported his head on the table. Finally, Burns and Tom Stewart, too, looked eagerly that way, as did Harry Darcastel; while Hardy sipped his wine and puffed his cigar leisurely, as if he knew the tale by heart.

"It had fallen nearly calm. A light air perhaps like royals, though nothing even below. But as we hauled down our colors at sunset, which had been hoisted to let the fellow know who we were, down came his also! Then there we both lay looking at each other. He knew by instinctive experience that we were the American corvette Scowrge, mounting eighteen twenty-four pounder carronades and two long eighteens in the bow ports; for the brigantine had ones or twice determined their exact calibres, and that we were the fastest cruiser, with the wind a point or two free, that had been seen in the West Indies for twenty years.

"Yes, he knew all about us, but he was still a little in doubt whether we knew all about him. He lay—unfortunately, perhaps, for him—a little beyond the range of our long guns, or else he might have been spared a good deal of time and uneasiness, and we a long chase and considerable risk. All in the night came the very first breeze that we had kindled in his den on shore reversed his escape; for while the calm lasted the bright flames began to mix with the fire of hell! There they lay all that night without moving a muscle or a mile until day dawned; and such a day as it dawned!

"Meanwhile the barometer had fallen an inch and a half, until the master began to believe the bulb leaked and the mercury was dropping into the case. Then through the murky gloom of twilight, with the sea one flat greasy surface with never the splash of a fish to disturb it, while the lowest whisper of the topmen aloft could be distinctly heard on deck—as if we were hung in the vacuum of an exhausted receiver where a feather would drop like a bullet—suddenly there came a sound from the eastward like the keys. Suppose, Burns, you saw a forty-two pound shot coming toward you, and without you dodged quick your head would be flying off with it in the same direction?"

"Whist, man!" said Stewart, with a groan; "dinna be calling up sic reecetera of the brain, Cleveland. Fordly there ne'er thinka of ony mortal thing when a passel bullet comes."

"Well, my friends, we ran precisely a similar risk, though the cloudy embrasures over the island and had not quite enough thunder to reach us. However, the brigantine knew what would follow as well as we did—better, perhaps—and before you could swallow that glass of wine, she was stripped as bare as a bone; and down came her yards, too, but keeping the sticks up and spreading a patch of a storm stay-sail between you might, apparently, have put in your pocket. Her decks and rigging were crowded with men while she was doing all this, but the moment it was done, and well done too, they ran into their holes below like so many rats, and we could only see a man or two left on deck near the helm.

"All hands had been called on board the Scowrge at four o'clock, and with the exception of securing the battery and lashing my vessel to make a skeleton of the ship the moment we saw the brigantine begin; for she was a very big, and we had no time to lose. Then we got a spike through the touch-hole of every gun, and with the courses and fore-sail, and in my pinnace, the yawl, and the cutter, we pulled in a body, to sweep the harbor clear of every thing that could swim, and so with the courses; prevenier breaces clapped on, rolling tackles hooked, and the spare purchases set up by the bulk-heads. Meanwhile, the divisions on deck had got hawsers over the launch amidships, the chains unbent, and the powder and shot for the carronades, and the quarter boats triced well inboard and secured with the falls. Then, when the whole light stuff from aloft was got below, the hammocks piped down, and the carpenters slopped the ship's decks and hatches with wood coals and the tarpaulins to batten them down. I never beheld a smarter piece of work done afloat—not even, Harry, in the Admiralty.

"As I turned round an instant a hoarse, howling bellow struck my ear from the island, and I just caught a glimpse of the brigantine's mast fore flying round and round in the air like an inverted umbrella with a broken stick; while at the same time the men from shore had reached the deck, and jumping to the battery, the guns were run in and loaded, the port-lids closings and extra lashings passed, and life-lines rove fore and aft. After that, gentlemen, there was no further need of a trumpet.

"You all know pretty well what sort of a thing a hurricane is, and the one I speak of must, I should have given you a touch of its quality here in Jamaica."

"Ay, by the holy Moses! we remember it well, back to it before the wind, with Burns and Piron there; for it didn't lave a stick of sugar-cane standing from Montego Bay to Cape Antonio!"

"Yes," said Stewart, "and to show ye what a spit of a thing it was, I had to cut to caught up an eighteen-foot Honduras plank and laid it crosswise, like an axe, full seven inches into an old Guinea-man trunk standing in our garden, and then twisted off the ends like a heather broom! Heeh, noo! ye may see it there now any day!"

Piron was thinking of the hard time they were driving before that hurricane, with no thought of the damage done to his own plantations.

"Well, my friends, I shall not waste any description of it; and you need only fancy a ship blown every where and every how except out of water—now with the lower yard arms cutting deep into the sea like rakes, the lee hammock nettings under water, the stern boat torn away into splinters, the main-topsail parked, but by a bolt, from the yard until there was not a thread left, and the jib and anchor twisted bodily out of its lashings and swept overboard!

"Then a lull, while the sea got up and the ship drifted stern on the other side to us; and then staggering back and making a stern-board till the water was plunged up in a deluge over the poop. Recovering herself again and almost quivering on her beam ends, the guns groaning and creaking as the terrible strain came upon the breechings, with the shot from the racks bounding about the decks, dinting holes in the solid oak waterways big enough to wash your fore in, and then hopping out of the smashed hail-ports to leeward. The spar-deck up to your arm-pits in water, and every man at his station on to the life-lines or standing rigging like grim death, while all the time the roaring, thundering yell of the hurricane was like the sea-serpents we were, by hard on voice, to cope with the winds when they were let loose in all their might and fury.

"Nor need I relate to you the scene presented below: mess-chests, bags, tables, crockery, flying from deck and beam to stanchion, and striking about in the most dangerous way, pell-mell, while the worst of the tempest lasted. But, gentlemen, the Scowrge had a frame of live-oak, to say nothing of two or three acres of tough yellow-pine deck in her, a good deal of fibred hemp to hold the masts up; and, moreover, she was well manned, and, though I say it myself, she had a skilful captain and experienced head officers, in whose sagacity the crew could rely, to manage that old Scowrge."

"That she had!" exclaimed Hardy; "and the most skillful and the coolest of them all was the first lieutenant!" The Monongahela's executive officer pronounced off his chair as if he was prepared to fight any man breathing who did not subscribe to that opinion.

"Well, my friends, that awful hurricane continued for about twenty hours, from late one morning till the beginning of the next. As for the day, there was none; for the sun and black clouds made one long night of it. Fortunately, too, we had been driven off shore, and when the murky gloom broke away and we were able to look around, our first anxiety was to see what had become of the brigantine.

"Yes, and I truly believe, in all that turmoil of the elements, while we were on the brink of foundering and going down to old Davy's locker, that there was not an officer or man, from the Captain to the cook, who was not thinking of that Pirate and hoping that he might go down first. I myself, however, felt a sort of confidence, as I was full indemnified for the poop to the mizen rigging, that the brigantine might be caught and whirled about—so long as she was above water —by the same blows of the hurricane that beat upon the Scowrge; and when the tornado broke and some one sang out, 'Sail ho!' I knew by instinct it must be the Centipede."

CAPTURE OF A SHIRRO AT PALERMO.

EVERY one has heard of the shirri—the spies of Italy—who are hired by the governments to betray their political enemies, and who are the chief instruments in the horrible tortures and cruelties of the Bombas and the Popes. For centuries the shirro has been an Italian institution, and for just as long have the people hated him with a hatred and less blood-thirsty than his own feelings. Our engraving will show how the people of Palermo are dealing with the loathsome creature of this class who have the mischance to fall into their hands. Their ex pe. ll the Neapolitan soldiers may be spared but that the shirri must die. The artist who drew the picture which we publish herewith, saw the poor wretch whose capture it depicted dragged from his hiding-place, hustled through the streets, and hung with as little ceremony as if he had been a dog.

UNROOFING OF THE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

We publish on page 445 a picture of the unroofing of the Academy of Music in Brooklyn by a sudden gust of wind on 29th June last. The accident took place at 5.30 P.M., when about fifty men were at work on the building. Of these about twenty were injured by the accident, two or three, it is feared, mortally.

The portion of the roof which fell was all that covering the main part of the building, immediately over the auditorium—132 feet long by 92 feet wide, and nearly 80 feet from the ground. The main cross-pieces, made of timbers 8 by 12 inches, bolted and bar rafters and girders, about 4 by 6 inches, were up, and workmen were engaged in putting up the walls at the time of the accident. The rafters, with girder or base piece attached, at the westerly end of the building, toward Clinton and Lafayette streets, commenced the work, and so on in turn the whole fell "like a row of bricks," as described by a man who witnessed the accident. The timbers, resting only upon the girders, of which there were eight, caused them to break and fall.

THE PATEK WATCH.

In view of the fact that individuals are known to be preparing to palm off upon the American public an inferior imitation of the

UNRIVALED LADIES' WATCH,

Manufactured by Messrs. Patek, Philippe & Co, of Geneva, Switzerland, the manufacturers of the Patek Watch have recently required

Messrs. TYLER, McADAM & CO., 209 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, their sole Agents in this city and State, to advertise their assurance of its incorrectness. The accurate article is closely copied in the original style of ornamentation, and the movements are also in close imitation. Trade-mark, either Patek & Co., Patek, Philippe & Co., Charles Patek, or Alexandre Patek. Each movement is also engraved with the name of Tiffany & Co., to addition to Patek, Philippe & Co., and is inscribed with a certificate of the original signed and numbered. Like all other counterfeits, this attempt at imitation will be found to rest only in externals alone of the admirable work from which it would borrow reputation; for the Patek Watch is unique, and due to this God are even going to the extent of forging Mr. Patek's own certificate and signature, the genuine watch of a Patek Watch can only be sure of its genuineness by obtaining it of the authorized and sole agents, TIFFANY & Co.

Watson's Neuralgia King

Never Fails to Cure

Neuralgia and Rheumatism.

THIS

GREAT INTERNAL REMEDY

Is curing Thousands of cases where all other remedies have entirely failed. It is no mere "Anodyne," temporizing for the moment, but is a perfect SPECIFIC and CURE for these painful diseases. The vast number of Liniments, Embrocations, and External medicines, which are a continuance of the torture only, are mere mockery in their effects and of doubtful virtue. The NEURALGIA KING reaches the source of all trouble, and effectually banishes the diseases from the system. We advise one and all to give it a trial, and become satisfied of its wonderful power.

Read the astonishing cures of well-known citizens of Jacksonville, Florida.

☞ ONE BOTTLE cured Mr. Elias Weed, Commercial Merchant, of severe Neuralgia of the head and face, after all other remedies failed.

☞ Mr. T. G. CRAWFORD, of Perry Street, who was confined to the house, and entirely unable to attend to business, is now well from the use of Watson's Neuralgia King.

DANESBURY HOUSE.

BY MRS. HENRY WOOD.

12mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

"Danesbury House" is a novel of English middle-class home life. The scenes is laid among the factories, and the fortunes of the manufacturing and trading industry house—and of his "hands"—make the subject of the story. As a mere novel, it is a book of uncommon ability: the characters are sketched with singular truthfulness and vigor, and the interest does not flag from beginning to end. The moral purpose of the book, besides, is excellent, and will win for it a grateful welcome in many thousand American homes, as it has already gained for it a sale of 50,000 copies in England.

MR. CHENERY'S STABLES AT BELMONT, MASSACHUSETTS, WHERE THE CATTLE DISEASE—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA—FIRST APPEARED.

THE CATTLE DISEASE.

We publish on the preceding page an engraving of the stables of Mr. Chenery, of Massachusetts, the gentleman among whose stock the pleuro-pneumonia—the new cattle disease—first broke out; also an engraving of some of Mr. Chenery's cattle both from sketches furnished by Mr. Theodore Marsden, of Boston.

It seems that the first deaths from pleuro-pneumonia occurred among some Dutch cattle of Mr. Chenery's, at Belmont, Massachusetts, in June, 1859. The disease spread, and Mr. Chenery lost half his herd, one animal dying after another, until the 4th of July last, when the last death took place on his estate. Meanwhile the disease spread to North Brookfield, and one or two other places, and proved destructive in some half-dozen herds. A panic ensued: the Cattle Commissioners and Board of Agriculture took the matter up, and a wholesale massacre of cattle was the result under contemplation. Legislative interference was loudly called for, and all New England was in a state of frantic alarm. During the past few weeks this feverish state of mind has given way to a calmer disposition. It proves, on inquiry, that not more than half a dozen herds have been attacked; and though the mortality among them has been large, it has not been as general as is supposed.

Opinions differ as to the origin of the disease. Mr. Chenery, and others hold that it is contagious, and was imported in Mr. C.'s Dutch cattle from Holland, in May, 1859; that every herd which has since been attacked caught it from Belmont stock, or from others to which it had been communicated by them. On the other hand, some authorities deny the contagious nature altogether, and assert that the disease arose from bad ventilation and unsuitable feeding. Mr. Chenery now held this opinion; but now reverts to that of contagion, as better sustained by the facts.

A scientific writer thus describes the disease:

"Pleuro-pneumonia is defined as an inflammatory disease of the pleura and the lungs. The pleura is a thin membrane which covers the inside of the thorax, or chest, and invests the lungs. Pneumonia signifies the inflammation of the lungs. Hence it will be observed that the difference between pneumonia and pleuro-pneumonia is, that the former relates to the lungs alone, and the latter to both the lungs and the pleura. Pleuro-pneumonous is divided ep-i-zoo-tic—is a term applied to diseases that are prevalent among animals, corresponding to epidemic among men. Secondly, a pestilential or infectious disease—a term that may be applied to epidemic or other contagious diseases."

It seems that the disease is well known in Europe. It is said to have been introduced into England, twenty years ago, from Holland, by some Irish cattle. It is not much dreaded there. In Holland it formerly prevailed very generally, and was extensively destructive.

The dates of its appearance in various European countries are thus given by Dr. Willems, of Hasselt: In Holland in 1839, in Hollstein in 1842, in England in 1840, in Sweden in 1847, in Denmark in 1848, in Ireland in 1850, and since then in Russia and Germany. The average mortality among the herds attacked is said to have been from 30 to 50 per cent. Dr. Willems, who is a scientific man, bethought himself of inoculating the cattle for the disease. He made various experiments, and states, as their final conclusion, that by inoculating the animal with the virus at the extremity of the tail it can, in 29 cases out of 100, be saved. Of 100 animals so inoculated but one was attacked; while out of 20 animals not inoculated, and subject to the same influences, 17 took it and died. Of 530 cattle he inoculated, under Government inquiries, he died from the inoculation, and 478 were injured, but only 6 took the disease, and all recovered.

As may be imagined, the progress of the disease is a subject of much anxiety to our farmers. The Philadelphia Agricultural Society sent a deputation of medical men to Massachusetts to see what they could make of it: they do not seem to have shed much light on the subject. The Massachusetts cattle-breeders are equally at fault. In New York it is reported that several cattle have lately died very suddenly in the Central Park, and at Yorkville. The City Inspectors are holding an inquiry on the subject, and will shortly report.

Mr. Chenery has written an interesting letter on the subject, which we subjoin:

"DEAR SIR,—In compliance with your request, I take pleasure in furnishing you with a succinct account of the last importation of cattle from Holland, and, also, of the disease that recently prevailed to my ruin in the Highland Farm in Belmont, as is now generally supposed, in consequence of that importation.

"It may be remembered that I had previously made two importations of cattle from Holland, and the extraordinary quality of the milk and wonderful results from them, in comparison either with our native or any of the foreign breeds then common imported, induced me to make my stock of Dutch cattle by frequent additions, rather than wait the natural increase from those already imported.

"Accordingly, in December, 1858, I transmitted an order to my correspondents in Schiedam, Holland, requesting them to employ a competent person expressly to proceed to the north of Holland and make selection of the best animals that could be obtained, without regard to the cost thereof. Following my instructions, forty cows were procured from Purmerend and the Beemster mid-way between Amsterdam and Rotterdam, on the Zuyder Zee, by J. C. Bumphreys, which several were sailed from that port early in April, and arrived here on the 23d of May, 1859.

"Upon examination the cows were found to be in extremely bad condition—very much bruised and emaciated—some from the long mate of the voyage, and not having been on low feed during the twenty days preceding her arrival; another one was totally unable to rise, and these two animals were accordingly carried to the farm in waggons; the remainder were driven out.

"Having in my possession for the first-named cow to recover, she was, on the 31st of May, slaughtered; and on the 2d of following the second was killed, and at that time, in common with every one knowing the fact in the deal, I was fully persuaded that the bad condition of these animals was caused by neglect on the voyage, that I shielded the vessel, and went through a course of $150 worth of law in my endeavors to obtain indemnity for the loss; but the law is uncertain, and the bark went on her way. My mind, however, remains unchanged with regard to the treatment the animals received on the voyage.

"The third cow of this importation seemed to be doing well until about the 20th of June, when she became sick, and died in ten days after. Dr. Fourth Levi Bennett, has, down to this time, shown no indications of sickness, so as to authorize me in a thriving condition.

"Early in the month of August following, symptoms of disease were observable in the Dutch cow, Lady Louise (imported in 1858). She died on the 29th of the same month. Another cow died under similar symptoms, then a ck in rapid succession, and then it was that the idea was first advanced that the disease was identified with that known in Europe as 'Epizootic Pleuro-pneumonia,' which for the three years preceding had been taken by prevent the spread of the supposed distemper, strict orders having been given that no animals should be allowed to visit the farm, nor any one from the farm to go upon the premises. A temporary building was erected in a position at a considerable distance from the farm-barn, to which the animals not infected were removed, and disinfecting agents were used about the premises.

"The following extract from my letter book in answer to an application for stock during the prevalence of the disease, will serve to show my views with regard to it at that time: 'I am, at present, obliged to decline any application for stock, owing to an epidemic disease in my herd. The disease is that known as "Pleuro-pneumonia;" I have already lost seven cows and two, and have ten more very sick. I am using every precaution to prevent the disease from spreading, and you will of course see the propriety of my not wishing to allow animals to leave the farm until the infection has ceased.'

"It is manifest that the only means to prevent the spread of the distemper have so far proved eminently successful, and, as I have already stated, that I have had some thirty animals—nearly half of my whole herd—that have not been a single case of the disease elsewhere in the neighborhood as yet.

"As there seems to be an impression abroad that the disease is an exotic one contracted from the Dutch cattle stock, I would remark that such is not the fact: that on the contrary, they have, comparatively, been more exempt from it than any other breed. It is not, however, confined to any particular breed, or to any age or sex, as the fact proves, the mature cow, the bull, and the young calf have been alike prostrated by it; and of the animals that have come under my observation, the Ayrshire, the Ayrshire, one Guernsey, two Jerseys, five Devons, two Short-horns, and the Natives and their grades, all have been or were grade Dutch.

"There has been no new case of sickness in my herd since the death of the mammoth cow, Lady Washington, which occurred on the 8th of January; and I am therefore inclined to believe that, so far as my premises are concerned, the disease has run its course.

"From the foregoing premises it will be perceived that some mantle ago, when the disease was raging, I believed that it was contagious, and subsequently became more recently the conviction has forced itself upon me that it was of an entirely local character; that the lungs of the cattle had become diseased from the carbonic acid gas, generated in the cow-house in consequence of insufficient ventilation. The only remedy I can suggest in regard to the spread of the disease in North Brookfield and vicinity—as having no knowledge to the contrary—is that sent from my farm in June last—together with the information that I have just received in a letter from Holland that the subject, still in the hands of the people, is to study the disease by post-mortem examinations and otherwise, with the view to complete the information on the formation upon the subject. My own private opinion, based upon costly experience, is, that whenever an animal becomes really sick with the disease, there is no cure, treatment is to slaughter and bury forthwith. In Holland the grades are very much in the ascendant, as explained in the letter referred to above, and which has been given to the public—the treatment appears to be extremely gratifying results, for where the peasants formerly lost from 50 to 60 per cent. of their cattle, they now lose only one per cent.

"In concluding this long letter, I beg to say that if it shall prove that the disease is not to be spread by the breeds of neat cattle, I have been the means of introducing this disease into the country. I am sure no one can possibly regret it more sincerely than myself. At the same time I find some consolation in believing that I have been actuated by motives which say that like its present limits—the benefits conferred by the introduction of the Dutch cattle will much more than outweigh the losses incurred by the introduction of the disease.

"Yours truly,
"WINTHROP W. CHENERY."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1860.

THE VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

THE Prince of Wales left England, we presume, last Thursday, and is now nearing the shores of Nova Scotia. Our next number will probably contain accounts of his landing upon this continent, and in succeeding numbers he and his progress through the British Provinces will be described by a competent hand. In August he will probably cross the border, and make a hasty tour through the United States, visiting Washington, the President at Washington; and, unless Providence should interpose to prevent the calamity, will be compelled, nolens volens, to grind the political and social axe of "His Excellency" Fernando Wood at New York.

The correspondence between the Queen and the Prince is published in the London papers. It is curious. Why should a lady and a gentleman omit the usual formulas of polite society in addressing each other, because they both happen to be sovereigns? Why should the President address the Queen "To her Majesty Queen Victoria," without "Madam," or "Dear Madam," or any similar phrase? Or he wrote to a private lady would he begin his letter—

"MRS. JOHN SMITH.—Your son is on his travels," etc.?

And why should the Queen call Mr. Buchanan "My good friend?" We say "My good friend" to Pat when we want to know what he will charge for carrying our trunk; and to Hans, when we intend to purchase that he will cease charging us on our cabbages. In France a wife calls her husband "My good friend," and brother salutes brother. So other people use the phrase; but with us it is almost equivalent to "My good fellow," and implies, in the person using it, superiority of station to the person to whom it is used.

The fact is, we suppose, both the President and the Queen were puzzled what phraseology to use in addressing each other. According to court usage, sovereigns are brethren. When Louis of France wrote to Charles of Spain or George of England, he began his letter with "My dear Brother," and the reply was similarly fraternal. Mr. Buchanan apparently did not fancy calling Queen Victoria "My dear Sister," and of course his polite regard, he also may, to some extent, monarchical prejudice prevented her correcting the error.

However, that is one trifles. Both letters since kindly feeling and the proper respect which the sovereigns of Great Britain and the United States entertain for each other is shown. Both, we are sure, fairly reflect the sentiments of the people from whose chiefs they emanate. The Prince will be heartily welcomed here by all respectable people, not only because we all wish him, when sovereign of England, to have a pleasant recollection of this country, but because he is the son of an excellent mother, and himself a youth against whom even the most reckless scandal-mongers have never breathed the faintest whisper. For a young man in his rank this is high praise.

ITALIAN ASSASSINS.

YOUNG AMERICA was accustomed to regard Italian hired assassins as creatures of the half-forgotten past, when the news that Bomba, Junior, had engaged a battalion of them to rid him of Garibaldi, startled the agreeable delusion. The race thrives, it seems, and on royal pay. Some are poisoners, and deal in aromatic smell, others in "delicious confectionery, and doubly drugged liquors; others—and these are the more numerous—trust to the old-fashioned knife, point held downward, and the pistol with the percussion. They are proficients of acute perceptions, and quick in action; ready to earn their wage fairly, be it for king or subject. In judging their existence Young America proved that he was not posted.

A French gentleman, who lived much in Italy half a century ago—Paul Louis Courier—knew them quite intimately, and described their manners and customs with the gusto of a naturalist. An Italian assassin—says he, somewhat—with a certain gusto, and courtesy, strikes with courtly suavity, whether the victim is to be sent to heaven or hell? 'Tis a matter of private consequence to the party slaughtered; for fifty sendi he will dispatch the Signor to the realms above, but it will cost fifty hundred, or he hard coin, or its equivalent, to the other place. If the customer should chances to inquire how the sbirro can thus dispose of the future destiny as well as the present life of his victim, he can be readily informed:

"If the Signor has no malice against his enemy," says the business-like sbirro, "and only wishes to get rid of him after the way, I will go him in some lonely spot, bid him say a hasty prayer, and slay him while he is commending his soul to God. But if the Signor has a spite to vent it stands to reason that he goes straight to heaven. But if the Signor desires his enemy's soul to be ruined, I will watch for him till I find him in mortal sin, and slay him while in the act; then, of course, his soul is beyond redemption. But the lowest rate for this is one hundred sendi."

It need hardly be doubted, though we have no information on the point, but the corps of sbirri whom the King of Naples has set on the track of the Liberator of Italy have been instructed to earn the weightier fee. Garibaldi in the torments of hell is a spectacle which, we are assured, the Neapolitan Jesuits are fond of picturing to the mind of their amiable sovereign.

After all, how pitiable are baffled cruelty, and spite, and tyranny! As the sbirri sail from Naples for Sicily gentlemen attached to the Neapolitan Court are selling their furniture for whatever it will command; and real silver spoons, worth four to five dollars apiece, are privately disposed of at a dollar. Even the Jesuits are having lay clothes made, and packing up their treasures. Every body feels that the end is approaching, and wants to turn what he has into money. The only persons who, as soldiers, or the like, or the assassins; every thing is high-mettled—believes in Garibaldi. Any thing more humiliating than the altered tone of the official Gazette of Naples toward the sometime "bandit and robber, Garibaldi," now "his Excellency, General Commanding," etc.—the disgrace of the four generals who could not make head against the insurrection—the frantic appeal of the King to the Western Powers for protection, backed by a promise to repeal his father's concordat—is not to be found in ancient or modern history.

Young men may discover a fine moral in the distinction which now impends over the Bourbon family at Naples. The modern history of Continental Europe—as written in the stereotyped fashion of the old-fashioned annalists—is little less than a biographical history of the Bourbon race. Time was, not long since, when the three finest countries of Continental Europe were France, Spain, and Southern Italy—were ruled despotically by Bourbons. It was the aim—it was almost the boast—of the great chiefs of the House that Europe was controlled by their family. Through what floods of blood, what mazes of deceit, and what scenes of unbridled popular suffering, the House waded to attain that pre-eminence will always afford history relates. It only now remains for the coming historian to depict, with the truth and the bitterness born of wrong, how all this was to a certain extent monarchical prejudice recovered her correcting the error.

However, that is one trifles. Both letters since kindly feeling and the proper respect which the sovereigns of Great Britain and the United States entertain for each other is shown. Both, we are sure, fairly reflect the sentiments of the people from whose chiefs they emanate. The Prince will be heartily welcomed here by all respectable people, not only because we all wish him, when sovereign of England, to have a pleasant recollection of this country, but because he is the son of an excellent mother, and himself a youth against whom even the most reckless scandal-mongers have never breathed the faintest whisper. For a young man in his rank this is high praise.

THE LOUNGER.

IN THE STREET.

"PLEASE, Sir, give me a penny!"

What was I to do? I was hurrying along the street, and as I looked at the woman I saw her perfectly, although I had never seen her before. The dirty, dark dress; the dirty bonnet; the round the neck; the dirty hood upon the head; the universal dirtiness, and vague unclean odor; the dirty face, and wistful, whining look, were every where—many, yet one.—"Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

I was extremely comfortable. The day was warm, and I was coolly clad. I had risen from a delicious breakfast—it was in strawberry and cream time—and the air and all I had seen and to be met possible contrivances for happiness. Trala-la. I hummed a tune. I felt airy like Mercury. I walked rapidly, from mere exuberance of spirits. I tilted along on tip-toe. I skipped. I ran. I was—"Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

There were plenty of them in my pocket. I had just bought two or three papers, and paid two cents apiece for them. It was possible, before the day was over, that I should spend several more for a cool drink—for cigars; that I should cheerfully pay three cents for the value for a ride in a waist-coat. The thought flashed across my mind: Woman, if you were only a very fat boy, or a very thin man, we should not be asked for money! I see you. If you were only five inches high, instead of six feet, would rain dollars in your lap. But I had only copper pieces about me. Stick a penny in Heaven's name, continued my petulant mind, why don't you ask me for an egg from Hyde Park to Paul's? Why don't you paste your husband's hair on your chin, and be a celebrated bearded woman? Why don't you be a What is it, and coin money?

The hand was long and dirty, and tremblingly extended, as it was held out for the unconscious-ness that nothing would be put into it. Is that what lovers kiss and poets swear by? Has that ground stiletto-like hair upon their fingers, and smoothed the lost brow of a husband? Is that wrinkled, grimy, shapeless—"Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

Woman, take care! You are a vagrant. You are a nuisance. You are liable to be one of those pongers upon the highway? Do you see that policeman in a glazed cap, and blue coat, and bright shining buttons? He is looking suspiciously—that my duty as a citizen, my profound regard for the house, dignity, and peace of the commonwealth, compels me to call upon the officer and servant of the law, and hand you over to the sad, serene justice which sits in the City Hall that you may be instantly established as gas and lamp-lighter. Yes, woman, this is no place for sentimentality. Get you hence, old, and wrinkled. You are breaking the law. Vagrant, avaunt! Officer!

"Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

Give you a penny? Why, woman, do you operate asperse my moral character? Do I not know—do not all three, my fellow-citizens, who are hurrying about their business—know perfectly well that you will slink away to the next corner and buy gin? That you will get drunk, and lie in the gutter, where you seem to have slept last night? Do you wish to ensnare me into a participation in your horrid orgies, and buy poisoned whisky to make you a little more brutish than you are now? Why don't you go and work? Why don't you earn money honestly? Why the deuce shouldn't you give me a penny?

I had kept my grand battery in reserve. You are probably an impostor, woman. As I said it I looked at the gown and the hood and the hands touched. Yes, you are undoubtedly an impostor; and where should we be if indiscriminate charity-giving were tolerated? No, no, madame, inci-criminate street giving is the death of true charity. You are aware that there are several associations for the relief of the poor, I suppose? You have heard of the ticket-system? Exactly: where is your ticket, please? I'll trouble you for your properly authenticated credentials of poverty. (I assume her fee, hands, figures.) You can not expect me to wrong the honest poor (I looked immovable) by reckless and spasmodic lolly (severely) without proof. I repeat: of course you do not expect me to wrong them. ..Not at all, not at all. Therefore, you will call at my office any day between three and four I will give you a ticket which will entitle you to have your case looked into at once in the proper person and at the time. Between three and four. Hem!—" Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

I do not think she understood me. Her face was very gaunt and sallow. I wondered in what cellar she lived. A thought of the long, long days that dragged her through life, starving and unloving; of the slow death she died all the time; of the utter absence of hope, decency, comfort, cheerfulness in her existence. I thought how sternly she should be refused a penny lest she might get drunk upon it at the corner, and how easily we all go out to dine, and how familiarly we nod with people who only get high at black walnut tables.

Look here, I said to myself, if you mean to go with this woman and ascertain all about her, and help her, and show her how to help herself, good, and may God go with you! But if you don't mean to give her any thing, don't blarney. If you are going by, don't let her starve because she might get drunk. Pass on to her scarce because she tells lies. Don't let her starve because she won't go to you to know why you have not done so. How do you know that she can? How do you know that she is a liar and a drunkard? Did you ever see her drunk? Did you ever hear of her lying before? Do you know any thing about her except that she is entirely wretched and forlorn? You think that a mean way of doing a thing at night.

"Please, Sir, give me a penny!"

Yes, woman, yes; and all the more shame to me that I give no penny, and not a moment's time, not an effort, not a kind word or look, not a thought really to help you. Here, poor thing, you, Sir."

I hurried along and met old Solomon Gunnybags at the head of Wall Street. "It's awful hot," said he. "Come round to Delmonico's and have something to drink." As we sat smoking very choice Havanas and sipping admirably mixed juleps, Mr. Gunnybags wrote me out "Twenty Practice would look after these infernal street beggars a little. If people would only agree not to give em any thing to eat, they'd soon go on, for they'd starve fast enough. For my part, I never give a cent in the street, Sir; not a cent; upon principle, Sir, principle. Have another julep? Here, garçong!"

CONFERRING THE DEGREES.

THE best ripens Bachelors of Arts, and, in fact, candidates of every kind, as the crop is very plentiful: so abundant that it is ceasing to be valuable in the estimation of many. But why so? The whole system of degrees, as originally established, is obsolete; but it has a new and intelligible modern significance. It is very useful as a register and mark.

When, for instance, the clustering graduates, in rustling gowns, surround the venerable President, expand like a fan, and Mr. Bailey in the style of sentencing pirates to death, and receiving from him the solemn parchment is stalled with ribbon like, have henceforth the right to add to their names A.B., it does not mean only that they have achieved the alphabet, but that, after four consecutive years, they have smoked, played billiards, rowed, boxed, driven horses, gamed, drunk, and studied Latin, Greek, and mathematics. A.B. stands for a degree of those performances, and for some others not enumerated.

When the mystic A.M. is conferred, it means merely that the recipient is a friend of some member of the government of the college, who likes to offer a pretty but public compliment. Or, when it is "conferred in course," it means that the recipient graduated three years before, and pays a house claim. Every body is in danger of catching the LL.D.

When Major-General Andrew Jackson went to Cambridge College, in Massachusetts, they made him a little more than an LL.D. He received the spectator of Erasmus going into Italy and receiving the Doctorate at Turin. Only, of course, in the latter case, the bestowal of the degree meant that Erasmus was a learned man; and in the former, that General Jackson was President of the United States. But when you understand it, it is all right, for words and letters are intended to convey ideas. If you understand the words and letters clearly enough, and take care that the American people shall do the same.

And Edward Everett very far behind in the modern improvements and the luxuries of the summer season. He has just made Captain M'Clintock Doctor of Civil Law. He is one of the gallantest of English seamen, there is no doubt; and it was quite as sensible to make him a D.C.L. because he found the remains of Captain Franklin's expedition as it would be to make Lord Brougham an F.R.S. because he is a learned scholar.

To our own, our native colleges, a little heartpushed for candidates, the League would humbly suggest the eminent Mr. Herman, as properly entitled to the honorary degree of LL.D.—or will it be more in rule to wait until he shall have been made President?

IDIOTS AND CRETINS.

IN the Weekly of 23d June the Lounger described "a little Journey to the north" of a day school for idiots of Mr. Richards. A gentleman who has been long familiar with Mr. Richards and with the subject kindly sends to the Editor, and to the Lounger a letter, too long for insertion here, but full of interest.

He states that St. Vincent de Paul established the first asylum for foundlings, two centuries ago, in France; and in almost one hundred and fifty years since the Abbé de l'Epée founded the first school for the deaf and dumb at Versailles. In 1812 Dr. Guggenbuhl organized the first school for idiotic children at Abendberg, in Switzerland. In 1848 the Lounger's correspondent and Mr. Richards went together to Paris. He continues: "As he could not speak French, I went with him to Bicêtre, and introduced him to M. Valée, the principal of the institution, and to many of the asylotic lloys. We saw them in the work-room, where some did carpenter's work, others mats, shoes, and others were engaged in any labor or trade for which they evinced most disposition. We also witnessed their gymnastic exercises, visited the school-room, where they were taught to read, write, cipher, and draw. All of these exercises and studies were performed with an almost military precision. M. Valée told us that he had sent some of his pupils to houses in Paris, where they were greatly astonished at their dexterity. Seeing the enthusiasm of the young American, M. Valée consented to have Mr. Richards lount with him at Bicêtre, so as to enable him to be present at all the exercises, and become familiar with all the details of each. Now our young gentleman's post was in estasy! He staid there until he had acquired a knowledge of the management of such an institution, and returned to America. He has since established similar schools in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania; he has been the means of having them founded in Ohio and in Canada; and the day is not far off when every State in this Union will have a school for idiots."

He asks, and justly, Why should not New York, among her numerous charities, count a school for idiot children? He has "seen our idiotic children in Randall's Island apparently doing very busy and fourteen girls; they have, thus far, been kept together without any systematic instruction. There these thirty-six unfortunates are growing up but retrograde in the scale of humanity." What a libel on this goodly Island!

The Lounger does not forget his promise of another journey to Mr. Richards's school, and a further account of it.

THE HEROICS OF HANGING.

BEFORE this is read Hicks the pirate will have been hung probably; and Smith will be dead, and the event are already regarded as a festival; and there can be very little doubt that much more harm than good will ensue from the sensational way in which, in common like Hicks, to almost all murderers like him, where the crime is a malicious, and not a sudden, passionate act. The execution, with its peculiar horror, is a thousand-fold more agreeable than a hulking confinement in Auburn. Moreover, the result of prevention of crime, which is looked for in the horror of a hanging, is defeated in much as occurs rarely that the fact that a man takes place upon an island, is seen from the water, and of course at such a distance, for the most part, that the horror of a man's death is lost. It is not that a man at a great distance fall from a balloon. All experience shows, also, that a man about to be hung is invested with a dramatic interest in the minds of those who are to be especially affected by his death, so that the object is again defeated.

The certainty of adequate punishment, with no clamour of the heroic, is what should be sought by the criminal law. Let a man commit a capital crime, he knows that the instinctive repugnance to hanging felt by many persons, and arising from many causes, is a great obstacle with its press to appeal to executive clemency, under which many a kind-hearted man must give way, is another. At present, the uncertainty of hanging is the rule, not a month, and a spurious sympathy will console him.

If it were not a part of the penalty of a murder that the murderer should be hung in public—if he knew that when he was convicted his communication with the world by the shipe of newspapers ended, something, at least, of the sickly romance of great crime, which is undoubtedly alluring to a certain class of minds, would disappear. Hanging must be hanging, let it be solitary and dreadful, not a public pastime; and if by every possible means all account of it except the official report could be prevented, public morality as well as decency would be the gainer. That the culprit were to take white and others to take black, whether it be mahogany, or black walnut, or rosewood; that his name was engraved upon a silver plate, and that he took leave of his friends in a white sheet. These are facts of no value to any thing but a prurient and morbid curiosity, which is the real cause of the heroics of criminal hanging.

NORTHWARD HO!

THE expedition of Dr. Hayes has sailed from Boston, and in August the readers of Harper's, over four thousand dollars, which were subscribed for it in New York, were not paid because the Doctor did not sail from that port. There is something so supremely ludicrous in such a statement that one hopes, for the sake of genteel comedy, that it may be so. Meanwhile, let us not believe it. It is too good to be true.

If it were so, behold, the story illustrates the motive of a great deal of public subscription. When you read the long list of names appended to some enterprise, which is quite sure to reflect renown upon all who are more or less concerned, is there not a secret feeling that without the prospect of the reputation the subscription would be small? No fame, no pay. Dear Doctor, we will reverently pay a hundred dollars for your great and generous and heroic and so forth project, provided that your expedition does not turn out a bore, and that our names shall be identified with the whole affair. As for your project, it is true whether there is or is not an open polar sea. Gammon, Ancient of Doctors, pure gammon. We want New York to be the point of departure. We want to visit this charming city to have the credit of your entire prize. We want, best of medical men, to eat and drink and love here.

I do not believe the story! But if it were true, it would serve also to show the gentle jealousy which governs between the two great cities. Is it for the honor of New York or Massachusetts—that Wall Street or State Street—that this expedition goes to explore the recesses of the North Pole? Is it not first for science, then for America, and then for the world? From what port did M'Clintock sail? Who cares? From what port sailed Mungo Park? Who cares? The glory is Europe's, and all its cities share it. And if, as all honest hearts will pray, the Doctor safely and triumphantly returns after his three years' cruise, the pride will be that of the whole land, not Boston's or the country's. And due notice will be taken of it on the Fourth of July, 1864.

POPULAR PRICES.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER.—Am I to suppose, from what you say about the Academy of Music and the Italian Opera, that you approve of charging enormous sums for entrance to public exhibitions?

"Yours truly, CONSTITUENT."

Certainly not, unless you wish to. It is a simple question of economy. Grant one more be realized by an exhibition at a dollar than at twenty-five cents? For the object of the exhibition, you will understand, is not to gratify a laudable curiosity, etc., it is to try what can be done to make up the enormous loss already sustained in the construction of the ship. Now, it seems to us, it is undoubtedly true that a low price of admission to popular exhibitions is more profitable than a high one; but in this particular case, we perfectly fail to perceive that there were enough persons who wished to see and study the great ship without the inconvenience of a crowd, who would pay a dollar for the privilege. If this were an erroneous opinion, nothing was easier than to change the price.

As for the talk about "exclusiveness," and so forth, it is merely absurd. Probably it is demonstrable to all the world that the Opera can fix your wares; and as the Company wanted only dollars, they were not likely to be very fastidious in the choice of the people who should pay them. If they had supposed more money could be made by putting the price at five dollars, they would wisely have charged that sum.

There is another view, of course. Upon the supposition that the object of the exhibition was to give pleasure to the largest number of people, it was foolish to charge a dollar for admission. But that is an entirely different point; and it is a principle as applicable to every kind of business. If the object of the tailor be to clothe the largest number of men at the cheapest rate, he does very foolishly in charging a hundred per cent profit. But if he wish to realize a fortune for himself in the shortest possible time, he is probably the very wise fellow in doing it. You may view the matter, therefore, gentle Gentlelinger, either as a matter of principle or policy, but you must take care not to confound the two. As traders, people try to help themselves—as philanthropists, they try to help other people.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

What do you think of Louis Napoleon's last move? Decidedly a Baden (a bad 'un).

A NEAT QUOTATION.—When the Sicilian population refused to fire on Garibaldi's men for the use of Queen Victoria in enstarting the garrison of Palermo, Garibaldi commentated them in the following Horatian lines from Horace:

Natis in usum Lætitiæ scyphis
Pugnare, Thracum est.

That is, "Cups made to barbarous to attack the ships sent for the use of Letitia."

In addressing a jury upon one occasion, the celebrated Lord Jeffrey found a witness somewhat free with the character of a military officer who was present. Upon hearing his counsel's remarks continuously repeat, as to the soldier," the son of Mars, hoisting with indignation, interrupted him, "Don't call me soldier, Sir; I'm an officer." Lord Jeffrey immediately went on: "Well, gentleman, officer, who is no soldier, was the sole cause of all the mischief that had occurred."

The health of an agricultural laborer in one of the rural districts of England, after having consumed, as alleged, he called in a medical man, who at once put him down as dying. He was told of the fact, and he replied he liked so far improved as to warrant his taking something more substantial. Accordingly he accordingly prepared for the man's sprree to furnish her husband with a little beef-tea, and a little wine. The wife did as she was bidden, but no sooner had the doctor departed than she tasted of the beef-tea herself. "Is a neighbor," she said, "if you think they've ordered for our John to eat now? Indeed, Betty, I'll not." And she drank the wine herself the neighbor. In a passion the former exclaimed, "Why, you've drunk it all!" "Indeed! How is I to know, my John eat an' hay and straw, and such like stuff? Besides, he be dead!" "Dead!" cried the parish of parochial relief and his wife, not entertaining the high-art notions of the liberality of the rate-payers, reported that there had been some suggestion on their part, particularly as the medical gentleman was the parish surgeon.

The Homewood Booklette says, that near St. Sevier there lives an old soldier with a false leg, a false arm, a false eye, and a false conscience. He has one of each, and covered with a substance imitating flesh, and a silver watch-guard over his false heart. He was present at Napoleon, and these are his trophies. He has a splendid specimen of composite architecture.

GENTLEMAN. "Yes, I do; I take the letter H!"

A funeral had been appointed to take place at half past two o'clock, and the clergyman appointed received, in the absence of the foreman, a request from the funeral party to the effect that they hoped he would make the funeral service as short as he could possibly, as they wished to go to the circus in the afternoon.

Two newly-made justices of the peace met a Rev. Mr. Tyson, as he was riding home, and one of them said to the other, "Ah! said one of them, "you are not like your Master, for he was content to ride on an ass." "An ass!" exclaimed the minister; "there's no such a beast to be found in the Bible." "Ah! but you will find his colt," said his brother, "mentioned." Mr. Thom, "they now make them all justices of the peace."

A THRILLING SCENE.—A noise was heard on deck, the dog-watch sprang from his enhouse, seized the sig-nights, and leaping up from the recesses of his berth, made his stand upon the hen-coop, eatch hold of the sky-e creper, which he split to the very bottom, and then bounded off the hatch-er anchor, which was caught by the cat harpings, who commenced to gnaw at it with his teeth. He then sprang through the stays, cutting the topsail ties, grabbed the main-sail, and, with the assistance of a devil's eye of the block's head, caught the ship round the waist with one hand, and with the companion with the other, till the next watch, and the captain applied the leacher of the forecastle to the inflamed eye of the unmannered sailor.

A lady of fashion, upon being told one of her stay-laced friends had been married two years prior to her lady's maid at the aristocratic church near Hanover Square, was heard to exclaim, "Why, I declare, that's very fast! Her English, her placidity, and all the other proprieties of life, are not observed more latterly." "Yes, Ma'am," said she, to turn St. George's in this way into a fast-married affair."

A good story is told of Lord Bath. He owed a tradesman £300, and, having never pay him a penny, he contrived to persuade him till he did, and one morning following he met the tradesman in the street, and told him he wanted to speak with him. Lord Bath came down, and said, "Look, Sir, had do you want me for?" "Why, money!" said the man, as loud as ever he could hear!" before all the servants. He had a dun for every day in the morning, and then would not see him. The next Sunday he was walking home to church, and met his tradesman's seat: he leaned over and said, "My money! give me my money!" The man sermon was service, and the text, "Cursed are they which heap up riches." The next general was, "Lord!" and pointed to my Lord Bath. In short, he persisted so much, and drew the eyes of all the congregation, that Lord Bath went out and paid it directly.

PATCHEN.

THE deceptive form and qualities of Patchen (of whom we publish a portrait opposite) have been the theme of discussion among thousands of his admirers. His tremendous speed and undoubted bottom have placed him in an enviable position, whereon, we presume, it will be no easy matter to dislodge him. His defeat of the "Queen of the Turf," on the Union Course, Long Island, June, 1860, was as clear as it was unexpected. If we study his formation, we shall find him to be a horse possessing very rare qualities, and uniting the several points of the thorough-bred with those of the cart-horse in an extraordinary degree. While the head, neck, and body are evidently those of the well-bred, or even thorough-bred racehorse, the legs, as far as the hocks, possess the muscular dimensions of the ordinary dray-horse, which exhibit, especially in the fore-arm, a symmetry and power truly astounding. The circumference of arm of Patchen is four times that of the leg below the knee; hence the tremendous action and speed. This same peculiarity exists in the celebrated "Toronto Chief"—a horse, at first sight, appearing heavy, and even clumsy, but upon close examination of his frame it will be found that the greatest similarity exists between the form of Patchen and Toronto Chief. Both appear large; but, however at first sight, but this heavy appearance, in both cases, is the consequence of a more than ordinary development of muscular power.

Patchen possesses much kindness of disposition, a sound and hardy constitution, and a frame of more than perfect beauty.

He was sired by Cassius M. Clay, by Henry Clay, by Andrew Jackson, dam by Bashaw, etc., etc.; proving him the descendant of a race of horses of the turf.

His color is a rich, glossy bay; with legs, mane, and tail black.

The back is straight; loins strong; quarters very large and muscular; tail well put on, and falling to the ground; head and neck of faultless symmetry; legs strong, and feet good.

Our illustration, drawn from the life, will serve to show how deceptive is the form of this wonderful horse; and how perfect are his parts; and what a study do they present to the horseman!

FLORA TEMPLE.

THE portrait of this little trotter on the opposite page will be hailed with delight by our readers. Our space is too limited to admit of a lengthy description of her matchless performances. We will, therefore, notice her chief characteristics of form, and refer our readers to the portrait from life.

Flora Temple is a light bay, with black mane, tail, and legs. Her outline is peculiarly striking; particularly that of the head, neck, and ear, which bear a close resemblance to the female of the American deer in delicacy of formation and symmetry of action. The legs are remarkable for their great sinew and solidity, though clean and finely set. The neck is long, nostrils very expansive, which is much elevated, shoulder large and muscular, loin and quarters compact and very wide-facing. But that which distinguishes Flora more particularly is the prominence of her eye, which is large, fiery, and projecting; and this has given rise to the popular belief that she can see what is behind as well as before—a very great advantage to her in a race.

But though her points as a first-class trotter are perfection in themselves, she does not convey the idea of a well-bred horse; neither does she evince any striking indications of great strength, speed, or endurance; being, as they used to say at the Derby, "a ram 'un to look at, but a good 'un to go."

THE Inquest was hurried for certain local reasons which weighed with the coroner and the town authorities. It was held on the afternoon of the next day. I was, necessarily, one among the witnesses summoned to assist the objects of the inquiry.

My first proceeding in the morning was to go to the post-office and inquire for the letter which I expected from Marian. No change of circumstances, however extraordinary, could relieve the one great anxiety which weighed on my mind while I was away from London. The morning's letter, which was the only assurance I could receive that no misfortune had happened in my absence, was still the absorbing interest with which my day began.

To my relief, the letter from Marian was at the office waiting for me. Nothing had happened—they were both as safe and well as when I had left them. Laura sent her love, and begged that I would let her know of my return a day beforehand. There was added, by explanation of this message, that she had saved "nearly a sovereign" out of her own private purse, and that she had claimed the privilege of ordering the dinner and giving the dinner which was to celebrate the day of my return. I read these little domestic references in the first bright morning, with the tertible recollection of what had happened the evening before vivid in my memory. The absence of any reference in my sudden knowledge of the truth was the first consideration which the letter suggested to me. I wrote at once to Marian to tell her what I have told in these pages, presenting the details as prudently and tenderly as I could, taking warning her not to let any such thing as a newspaper fall in Laura's way while I was absent. In the case of any other woman, these precautions and less reliable, I might have hesitated before I ventured on unreservedly disclosing the whole truth. But I owed it to Marian to be faithful to my past experience of her, and to trust her as I trusted myself.

My letter was necessarily a long one. It occupied me until the time came for proceeding to the Inquest.

The objects of the legal inquiry were necessarily beset by peculiar complications and difficulties. Besides the inconclusive evidence of a nurse in which the deceased had met his death, there were serious questions to be settled relative to the cause of the fire, to the disappearance of the keys, and to the presence of a stranger in the vestry at the time when the flames broke out. But the identification of the dead person had not yet been accomplished. The helpless condition of the servant had made the police distrustful of his assertion concerning the matter. They had sent to Knowlesbury overnight to secure the attendance of witnesses who were well acquainted with the personal appearance of Sir Percival Glyde, and they had communicated, the first thing in the morning, with Blackwater Park. These precautions enabled the coroner and jury to settle the question of identity, and to confirm the correctness of the servant's assertion; the evidence offered by competent witnesses, and by the discovery of certain facts subsequently ascertained, rendering an examination of the dead man's watch. The crest and the name of Sir Percival Glyde, and those to which they were engraved inside it.

The next inquiries related to the fire.

The servant and I, and the boy who had heard the light struck in the vestry, were the first witnesses called. The boy gave his evidence clearly enough; but the servant's mind had not yet recovered, and he could inflict on it—he was plainly incapable of assisting the objects of the inquiry, and he was dismissed from the court.

To my own relief, my examination was not a long one. All I could be known the deceased; I had never seen him; I was not aware of his presence at Old Welmingham; and I had not been in the vestry from the building of the body. All I could prove was that I had stopped at the clerk's cottage to ask, by way; that I had heard from him of the loss of the keys; that I had accompanied him to the church to render what help I could; that I had seen the fire; that I had heard some person, unknown, inside the vestry, trying vainly to unlock the door; and that I had done what I could, from motives of humanity, to save the man. Other witnesses, who had been acquainted with the deceased, were asked if they could explain the mystery of his presumed abstraction of the keys, and his presence in the burning room. But the coroner seemed to take it for granted, naturally enough, that I, as a total stranger in the neighborhood, and a total stranger to Sir Percival Glyde, could not be in a position to offer any evidence on these two points.

The course I took was myself bound to take, when my formal examination had closed, seemed clear to me. I did not feel called on to volunteer my private opinion of my own private convictions; in the first place, because my doing so could serve no practical purpose, now that all proof in support of my surmises of mine was burned with the burned register; in the second place, because I could not have intelligibly stated my opinion—my unsupported opinion—without disclosing the whole story of the conspiracy, and positioning, beyond a doubt, the same unsatisfactory effect on the minds of the coroner and the jury which I had already produced on the mind of Mr. Kyrle.

In these pages, however, and after the time that has now elapsed, no such cautions and reserves as those I have described need fetter the free expression of my opinion. I will state briefly, before my pen occupies itself with other events, how my own convictions led me to account for the abstraction of the keys, for the outbreak of the fire, and for the death of the man.

The news of my being unexpectedly free on bail drove Sir Percival, as I believe, to his last resources. He contemplated attack if the real was one of those resources; and the suppression of all practical proof of his crime, by destroying the page of the register on which the forgery had been committed, was the other, and the surest of the two. If I could produce no evidence from the original book, to contradict the certified copy at Knowlesbury, I could produce no evidence whatever, and could confront him with no fatal exposure. All that was necessary to the attainment of his end was, that he should get into the vestry unobserved, that he should tear out the page in the register, and that he should leave the vestry again as privately as he had entered it.

On this supposition it is easy to understand why he waited until nightfall before he made the attempt, and how he took advantage of the clerk's absence to possess himself of the keys. Necessity would oblige him to strike a light to find his way to the vestry-register; and common caution would suggest his locking the door on the inside in case of intrusion on the part of any inquisitive villager, or any other person, if it happened to be in the neighborhood at the time.

I can not believe that it was any part of his intention to make the destruction of the register appear to be the result of accident, when he came to setting the vestry on fire. The bare chance that prompt assistance might arrive, and that the books might be saved, would probably be saved, would have been enough, on a moment's consideration, to dismiss any idea of this sort from his mind. The inflammable nature of the combustible objects in the vestry—the straw, the papers, the packing-cases, the dry wood, the old worm-eaten shelves and presses—suggested, by my estimation, point to the fire as the result of a wicked contrivance to mislead the jury.

His first impulse, under these circumstances, was doubtless to try to extinguish the flames—and failing in that, to escape (which he could do as he was of the state of the lock) had been to attempts to escape by the door which had given him entrance. But I had called to him when the flames must have extended across the door leading into the church, on either side of which the presses extended, and close to which the other combustible objects were placed. In all probability the smoke and flame (confined as they were on that side) had been too much for him when he tried to escape by the inner door. He must have dropped in his death-swoon—he must have sunk in the place where he was found—just as I got on the roof to break the skylight-window. Even if he had been able afterward to get into the church, and to burst open the door from that side, the delay must have been fatal. The fire must have been past arrest long past saving, by that time. We should only have given the flames free ingress into the church: the church, which was never preserved, but which, in that event, would have shared the fate of the vestry. There is no doubt in my mind—there can be no doubt in the mind of any one—that he was a dead man before ever got to the empty cottage and worked with might and main to put down the beam.

This is the nearest approach that any theory of mine can make toward explaining the fire result which was visible matter of fact. As I have described them, so events passed to us outside. As I have related it, so his body was found.

The Inquest was adjourned over one day; no explanation that the eye of the law could recognise having been discovered, thus far, to account for the mysterious circumstances of the case.

It was arranged that more witnesses should be summoned, and that the London solicitor of the deceased should be invited to attend. A medical man was also charged with the duty of reporting on the mental condition of the servant, which appeared at present to debar him from giving any evidence of the least importance. He could only declare, in a dazed way, that he had been ordered, on the night of the fire, to wait in the lane, and that he knew nothing else, except that the deceased was coming to Blackwater. My own impression was, that he had been first used (without any guilty knowledge on his own part) to ascertain the fact of the clerk's absence from home on the previous day; and that he had been afterward ordered to wait near the church (but out of sight of the vestry) to assist his master, in the event of my escaping the attack on the road, and of a collision occurring between Sir Percival and myself. It is necessary to add, that the man's own testimony was never obtained to confirm this view. The medical reports first declared that what little mental faculty he possessed was seriously shaken; nothing satisfactory was extracted from him at the adjourned Inquest; and, for aught I know to the contrary, he may never have recovered to this day.

I returned to the hotel at Welmingham, so jaded in body and mind, so weakened and depressed by all that I had gone through, as to be quite unfit to endure the local gossip about the Inquest, and to answer the trivial questions that the talkers addressed to me in the coffee-room. I withdrew from my scanty dinner to my cheap garret-chamber, to secure myself a little quiet, and to think, undisturbed, of Laura and Marian.

If I had been a richer man, I would have gone back to London, and would have comforted myself with a sight of the two dear faces again that night. But I was bound to appear if called on at the adjourned Inquest, and doubly bound as an answer at bail before the magistrate at Knowlesbury. Our slender resources had suffered already; and the doubtful future—more doubtful than ever now—must be husbanded decreasing our means unnecessarily, by allowing myself an indulgence, even at the small cost of a double railway journey, in the carriages of the second class.

The next day—the day immediately following the Inquest—was left at my own disposal. I began the morning by again applying at the post-office for my regular epistle from Marian. It was waiting for me, as before, and it was written throughout in good spirits. I read the letter thankfully; and then set forth, with my mind at ease for the day, to walk to Old Welmingham, and to view the scene of the fire by the morning light.

Truly has the great poet said, "There is nothing serious in mortality." Through all the years of our unintelligible world the awful and the terrible walk hand in hand together. The irony of circumstances holds no mortal catastrophe in respect. When I reached the church the trampled condition of the burial-ground was the only serious trace left of the fire and the death. A rough boarding of boards had been knocked up before the vestry door-way. Rude intentions were scrawled on it already; and the village children were fighting and shouting for the possession of the best peep-hole to see through. On the spot where I had heard the cry for help from the burning room, on the spot where the panic-stricken servant had dropped on his knees, a fussy-flock of poultry was now scrambling for the first choice of worms after the rain—and on the ground at my feet, where the door and its dreadful burden had been laid, a workman's dinner was waiting for him, tied up in a yellow basin, and left faithful on its charge was yelping at me for coming near the food. The old clerk, looking idly at the slow commencement of the repairs, had only one interest that he could talk about now—the interest of escaping all blame, for his own part, on account of the accident that had happened. One of the village women whose white, wild face I remembered, the picture of terror, when she pulled down the beam, was giggling with another woman, the picture of inanity, over an old washing-tub. Nothing serious in mortality! Solomon in all his glory was Solomon with the elements of the contemptible lurking in every fold of his robes and in every corner of his palace.

As I left the place my thoughts turned, not for the first time, to the complaint overthrow that all present hope of establishing Laura's identity had now suffered through Sir Percival's death. If he had lived—well! If he had, we knew that total change of circumstances really have altered the result? Could I have made my discovery a marketable commodity, even for Lawrie's sake, after I had found out that robbery of the rights of three was the essence of Sir Percival's crime? Could I have offered the price of my silence for his confession of the conspiracy, when the effect of that silence must have been to keep the right heir from the estates, and the right owner from the name? Impossible! If Sir Percival had lived, the discovery, from which (in my ignorance of the true nature of the Secret) I had hoped so much, could not have been mine to suppress or to make public, as I thought best, for the vindication of Laura's rights. In common honesty and common honor I must have gone at once to the stranger whose happiness I had been usurped—I must have renounced the victory at the moment when it was within my grasp—I must have unreservedly in that stranger's hands—and I must have faced afresh all the difficulties which stood between me and the one purpose of my life, exactly as I was resolved, in my heart of hearts, to face them now!

"THE SMOKE AND FLAME, CONFINED AS THEY WERE TO THE ROOM, HAD BEEN TOO MUCH FOR HIM."

Birmingham with my mind composed, feeling more sure of myself and my resolution than I had felt yet.

On my way to the hotel I passed the end of the square in which Mrs. Catherick lived. Should I go back to the house and make another attempt to see her? No. That man after Sir Percival's death, which was the last news she ever could wish to hear, must have received her hours since. All the proceedings at the Inquest had been reported in the local paper that morning: there was nothing I could tell her which she did not know already. My interest in making her speak had slackened. I remembered the answer hinted in her letter, and said, "There is no news of Sir Percival that I don't expect—except the news of his death. I remember his wife's stealthy interest in keeps when they settled on me at parting, after she had struck my servant. Some instinct, deep in my heart, which I felt to be a true one, made the prospect of again entering her presence repellent to me—and turned away from the square, and went straight back to the hotel.

Some hours later, while I was resting in the coffee-room, a letter was placed in my hands by the waiter. It was addressed to me, by name and I found, on inquiry, that it had been left at the bar a few minutes, just as it was then dusk, and just before the gas was lighted. She had said nothing; and she had gone away again before there was time to speak to her, or even to notice who she was.

I opened the letter. It was neither dated nor signed; and the handwriting was palpably disguised. Before I had read the first sentence, however, I knew who my correspondent was—Mrs. Catherick.

The letter ran as follows—I copy it exactly, word for word:

"SIR,—You have not come back, as you said you would, on the matter; I know that, and I write to tell you so. Did you see any thing particular in my face when you left me? I was wondering, in my own mind, whether the day of his downfall had come at last, and whether you were the chosen instrument for working it. You were—and you never worked it. You were weak enough, as I have heard, to try and save his life. If you had succeeded, I should have looked upon you as my enemy. Now you have failed. I hold you as my friend. Your inquiries frightened him into the workyard by night; you returned without your privity and against your will, have served the hatred and wreaked the vengeance of three unlikely years. Thank you, Sir, in spite of yourself.

"I owe something to the man who has done this, and I will pay my debt! I am not a young woman still, I might say, 'Come! put your arm round my waist, and kiss me, if you like.' Others have been fond enough of me, if you even to go that length; and you would have accepted my invitation, you would, Sir, twenty years ago! But I am an old woman now. Well! I can satisfy your curiosity, and pay my debt that way. You had a right—you ought to know certain private affairs of mine when you came to see me—private affairs, which all your sharpness could not look into without my help—private affairs, which you have not discovered even now. You shall discover them; your curiosity shall be satisfied. I will take any trouble to please you, my estimable young friend!

"You were a little boy, I suppose, in the year twenty-seven? I was a handsome young woman at that time, living at Old Welmingham. I had a contemptible fool for a husband. I had also the honor of being acquainted (never mind how) with a certain gentleman (never mind whom). I shall not call him by his name. Why should I? It was not his own. He never had a name as you know that, by this time, as well as I do.

"It will be more to the purpose to tell you how he worked himself into my good graces. He was born with the tastes of a lady, and he gratified them. In other words, he admired me, and he made me presents. No woman can resist admiration and presents—especially presents, provided the former is to be just the right size she wants. He was sharp enough to know this—most men are. Naturally, he wanted something in return—you, Sir, for instance. And what can think was the something? The merest trifle. Nothing but the key of the vestry, and the key of the press inside it, when my husband's back was turned. Of course he lied when I asked him why he wished me to get him the keys in that private way. He might have saved himself the trouble—I didn't believe him. But I liked my presents, and I wanted more. So I got him the keys without my husband's knowledge. Once, twice, four times I watched him—and the fourth time I caught him at work.

"I was never overscrupulous where other people's affairs were concerned; and I was not overscrupulous about his adding one to the marriages in the register on his own account. Of course I knew it was wrong, but I did it to harm to me—which was one good reason for not making a fuss about it. And I had not got a gold watch and chain—which was another, still better. And he had promised me one from London only the day before—which was a third, best of all. So I let it be known what his law considered the crime to be, and how the law punished it, I should have taken proper care of myself, and I suppose he would have got off. But I knew nothing—and I longed for the gold watch. All the conditions I insisted on were that he should take me to the end of the dance, and tell me every thing. I was as curious about his affairs as you are about mine now. He granted my conditions—why, you will see presently.

"This, you see, in short, is what I heard from him. He did not willingly tell me all that I tell you here. I drew some of it from him by persuasion, and some of it by surprise—and I determined to have all the truth—and I believe I got it.

"He knew no more than any one else of what the state of things really was between his father and mother till after his mother's death. Then his father confessed it, in remorse, and told what he could for his son. He died having done nothing—and having even made a will, I fancy, (who can blame him?) wisely provided for himself. He came to England at once, and made possession of the property—but there was no one to suspect him, and no one to say him nay. His father and mother had always lived as man and wife—none of the family, on either side, were acquainted with them ever supposed them to be any thing else. The right person to claim the property (if all the truth had been known) was in distant relation, who had no idea of ever getting it, and who never even set eyes on his father died. He had no suspicion. The lawyers took possession, as a matter of course. But he could not have succeeded on the property on a matter of course. There were two things wanted of him before he could do this. One was a certificate of his father's death—the other was a certificate of his parents' marriage. The certificate of his birth was easily got—he was born abroad, and the entry was given to him in due form. The other matter was a difficulty—and that difficulty brought him to Old Welmingham.

"But for one consideration, he would have gone to Knowlesbury instead. His mother had been living there just before she met with his father—living under the name she passed by—a touch being that she was really a married woman, married in England, where her husband had ill-used her, and had afterwards run off with another woman. I give you this fact on good authority. So he supposed—and so it is to soon as the reason why he had not married. You may wonder why the son, knowing the facts, should have taken the trouble to look into the matter, when the facts were all known. There was but a shadow, more or less, of an excuse for it—but there was a shadow. The law considered the crime to be, and how the law punished it, I should have taken proper care of myself, and I suppose he would have been usurped—I must have renounced the victory at the moment when it was within my grasping my discovery unreservedly in that stranger's hands—and I must have faced afresh all the difficulties which stood between me and the one purpose of my life, exactly as I was resolved, in my heart of hearts, to face them now!

MORE AFRICANS LANDED.

A telegraphic dispatch from New Orleans announces the arrival and landing of a cargo of 114 Africans at Mobile on Monday. They were immediately taken up the Alabama River on a steamboat, although by this time are judiciously distributed among the planters. They were from the vicinity of Abeokuta.

EXECUTION OF HICKS.

Alfred W. Hicks, the murderer of Captain Burr and crew of the oyster sloop E. A. Johnson, suffered the extreme penalty of the law on Friday [July 6], in Bellevue Island. The culprit made no remarks at the gallows, but prayed with the clergyman assigned him. He was attended in his last moments by Father Dumouget, to whom he professed to be made a convert to the religion of his guilt than that heretofore published.

The execution was private, and was witnessed by fully 10,000 persons, who surrounded the island in steamboats, sailing-vessels, and small boats. The sloop E. A. Johnson, on board of which the murders were committed, was also in attendance, and her burgee floated at half-mast in the breeze. She was anchored a few hundred feet from shore, and was crowded with spectators. Every sling passed off in an orderly manner, considering the character of the assemblage and the excitement attending the event.

FROM THE GALLOWS TO A BALLOON.

Our readers will all remember the Chicago barber, Hanri Desperts, who was tried for having received his mistress, Amelia Werner, period her body in a barrel and send it to Milwaukee, but in spite of the strongest circumstantial evidence, he obtained an acquittal on a technical point. After escaping from the gallows in this instance, he has since been arrested a fresh step in Chicago, but, disguised as a woman, he managed to get away, and succeeded in his own sense in reality. Intelligence has lately been received at the Police Commission in Paris, that this dreaded murderer and barber Franz, has fallen heir to a large estate in Germany, and efforts are now being made to ascertain his whereabouts.

PERILS OF AN AERONAUT.

On board the Steamship Minnesota New York steamship Minnesota, of the Detroit and Milwaukie Railway. which arrived at Buffalo Grand Haven at a quick hour night, had on board Professor Steiner, with his balloon. The flight of the balloon was previous to the arrival. After leaving the city, he floated out freely through the air in a course to the south east, and, in the space of about forty-five minutes, when he encountered a violent thunder-storm, which took him several miles out into the sea, and it was at this time that the spectators lost sight of him. They observed the balloon, when it was out of sight that it rapidly descended. The aeronaut threw out all the ballast, and, indeed, every thing but his self, in order to come of his clothing, but all was of no avail, and the balloon came down into Lake Michigan. Where did you the eastern shore? As a dernier resort, he cut away his car, and, again rose, and was carried by the second time at 7½ o'clock, in the Kalamazoo River, right up or nine miles from the mouth of that river. He was obliged to cut away his balloon in order to save himself, and, with his apparatus and a bucket of water, came from drowning, he succeeded in guiding the shore minus penalty till he reached. The grateful aeronaut proceeded by the Professor was 17,000 feet, which height was reached with the aid of a bottle of Ice. Mr. Steiner recovered his balloon and the car, but experienced much difficulty in finding a conveyance to carry them home. He arrived last night, arrayed in a farmer's coat, his pet fastened to a pole on his shoulders, and his face and hands he had endured an untold amount of suffering and danger."

ANOTHER HORRIBLE MURDER.

One day last week the wife of Mr. Schmucker and her infant boy were the victims of a most horrible murder, the employe of the family, named Francis Hoffman. The parties are all Germans, and the fact did not come to be committed in Schmucker's house, near the corner of Seventh-Seventh Avenue, in Brooklyn, until late on Friday, from the evidence that Hoffman had lately been discharged from service by Mr. Schmucker. On the day he learned, previously, the place where about $200, with some silver and articles of value, was kept by the family, that he watched his opportunity, before daylight, when Schmucker, who is a self-gardener, had gone to the city market with his produce to sneak in and commit the dreadful deed. Mrs. Schmucker was discovered in the darker portion of the house, but it is certain that he must have first murdered the child, which was found in bed with the head of her child that the latter was instantly killed, but the mother was not dead when found. On the day, in the morning, numerous articles of wearing the first were entertained for her recovery, but she died in an alcoholic state, and never more died. The accused was arrested in Fifty-second Street, at noon, with $150 of the money and all other property, all of which was readily identified by Mr. Schmucker and his workmen, in his possession. The murderer's prospect was that the next morning, when testimony was taken which completely fixed the guilty upon him, who was consequently arrested by Police; but the officers experienced much difficulty in conveying him to the city owing to the excitement of the crowd who had assembled in the neighborhood of the Twenty-second Precinct Station-house, and threatened to lynch him.

A PROLIFIC VINE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA, June 9, 1860.

"If you think of April 9, under head of 'Domestic Intelligence,' there is a notice of what was said to be produced by a vine of a woman and a large grape vine in this county, Santa Barbara. The vine is one of the many that is now in the vicinity of bunches of grapes the vine yields annually.

"Permit me to give you a correct statement of the extraordinary vine, as it is, I believe, the largest one in California, and the largest in the world.

"It is thirty years old, three feet in circumference, and one foot in diameter for about ten inches from the ground. It then gives off branches and covers an area of twenty-five rods square. It is trained on trellis work from the ground, on horizontal supports about ten feet apart. Last season I reported that there were 2,400 bunches, and can women, to keep an account of the number of bunches removed from the vine, the filled a large room, the floor, balding about three quarts, nearly full of beans; for every bunch picked. I have dropped a bean in the basket, and sold what remained on the vine for twenty-five dollars—two wagon full, drawn by two horses each. The quantity from one vine may appear to your numerous readers almost incredible, but it is nevertheless true.

"If you think the above worth publishing you are at liberty to do so.

PERSONAL.

On the occasion of the recent commencement of William and Mary College, in Virginia, which is said to have been the most brilliant known for many years, the Board of Visitors elected John Tyler, so long regret, as chancellor. Mr. Tyler is the first chancellor elected since Washington. The Faculty of Law was also restored, Charles Morrin being appointed professor.

Mr. Breckinridge is said to be the youngest candidate ever nominated for the Presidency. He is but thirty-nine years old, and consequently three years under the age at which a man becomes eligible to that office.

The Rhode Island papers chronicle the decease of a colored man named Thomas Thomas, who seems to have been famous during his long and useful life for his gastronomic performances. Six large loaves of bread with more than a quart of coffee or tea, generally constituted his supper or breakfast, or both. He also ate a pound of goose or a turkey, and has been known to eat a moderate-sized lamb at a meal. The latter fact very clearly indicates that Thomas Thomas was indeed a literal descendant of Haman. An immense pudding, concerning which he was imprudent enough to devour, disconcerted him at this mortal coil in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

PARLIAMENT.

The recent prorogation of Parliament have been unimportant. Notice has been given of a resolution in the Commons relative to the right of the House to the question of privileges raised by the House of Lords in rejecting the bill abolishing the paper duties.

The report of the Committee on this subject is published. It merely, as stated reported, quotes the precedents, and makes no recommendations.

THE GREAT REVIEW OF VOLUNTEERS.

A leading article of the Times says very says: "The review of the volunteers in Hyde Park on the 23d was a most splendid and successful display. The force assembled in Hyde Park was estimated at about 20,000, and might be fairly considered a representative of the whole population. The Queen, accompanied by the Prince Consort, Prince of Wales, the King of the Belgians, the Duke of Cambridge, and several foreign princes, and attended by a brilliant suite, entered the Park about four o'clock. The inspection was at once proceeded with, and the whole of the singular force, 20,000 strong, passed along the whole of the line, after which the volunteers marched past Her Majesty. Nothing can be more gratifying at showing what they were capable of in the way of field evolutions, but it is generally felt that the best part of the review called upon to do they did thoroughly well. Their fine martial appearance, their soldierly steadiness and precision in marching elicited from experienced officers of the regular service the warmest praise and surprise. The Duke of Cambridge stated to the commanding officers of the several corps that the manner in which he had borne in his life men movements carried out by a large body of men with greater precision. The volunteers were enthusiastically cheered along the route to the Park. The review passed off without any accident, and not unfortunately the well-known dictum of the Duke of Wellington, the 20,000 volunteers were got safely and expeditiously out of Hyde Park."

THE SWISS BOUNDARY.

A dispatch from Paris, of June 29, says:

The treaty to arrange the boundaries between France and Switzerland has been signed.

The French government has communicated to the Prince Neuf la Chatel, Swiss minister, the following mode for settling its differences with Switzerland:

1. To submit the question to a European congress.

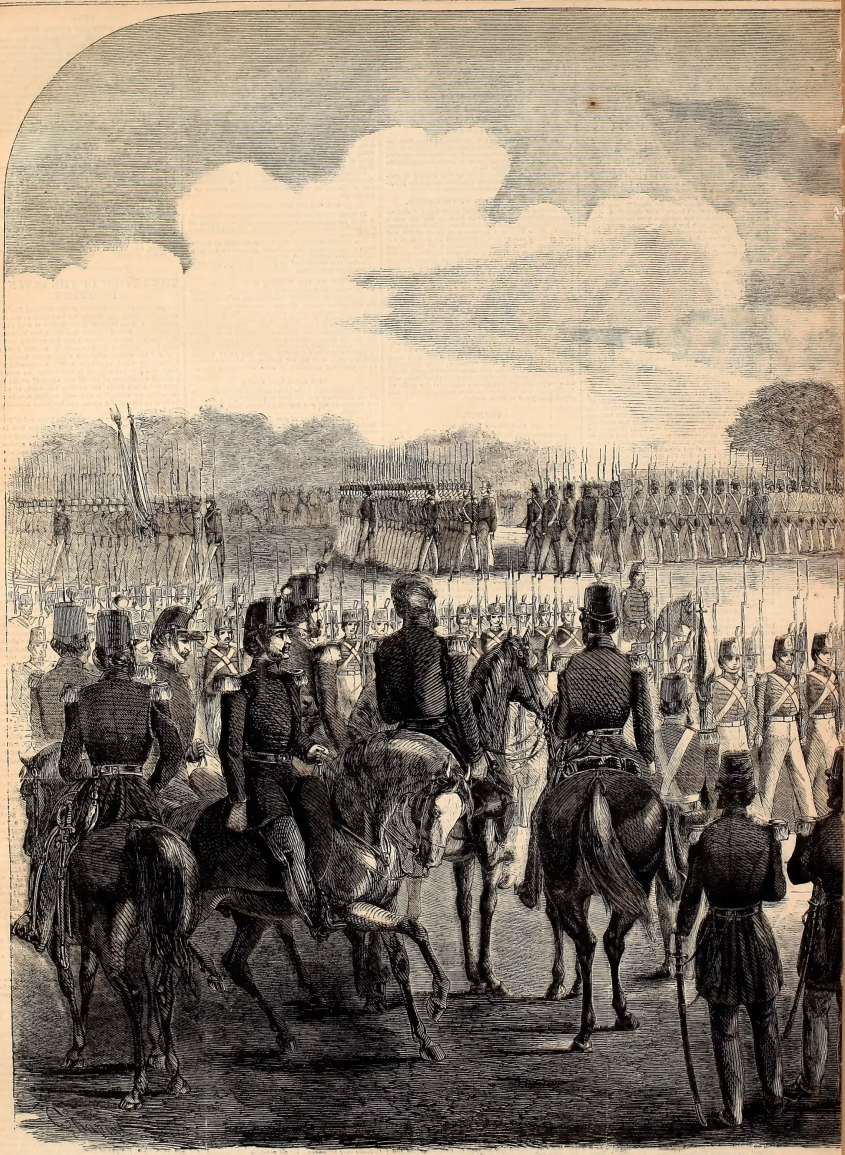
2. To submit to this negotiation the Powers who signed the Final act of Vienna.

3. To assemble in conference.

4. To pronounce on the question determined on it will very probably take place at Paris.

It is quite certain that France will make no cession whatever of territory.

A ROMANTIC TALE.



A trial is coming on in Paris, a story which will give publicity to a sad affair. An English lady, the widow of a retired naval officer, had a daughter who was left with a large fortune, had become attached to and married to a young Frenchman, M. Lefevre, who was employed in a notary. Nothing, however, has occurred during the honeymoon to lead to the belief that the end of the honeymoon to lead to the belief that the end of the step she has taken, although the gentleman did turn out to be the brother of a man, transported for life, and did meet him first of all (by accident of course) dressed in plain clothes at the Bal Mabille. The young couple one evening escorted by the soixante, who had tied her to the conjugal apartments, and who had taken the precaution, also, that no harm could possibly be thought of any thing going there in the absence of the husband. The daughter (by her first marriage) had grown—since the honeymoon—into a beautiful girl, and had received from a fine child of twelve into a lovely girl of sixteen. The mother-in-law, who had been the cause of the first mischief, was to his daughter-in-law; it seems that the zealous guardian of virtue, as far as the young wife was concerned, in a short last, came a tremendous shock to its tranquillity, when she found her self after the return from the theatre from a traveling commission agent, who had supplied the place for the first time, and who had come to receive the 3 million terms in consequence of the cultivation of his customers, which was to be paid in cash. Then the husband was, of course, treated with contempt—the young lady hearing of it, left the conjugal roof, declaring she is entitled to a large fortune—and the dissolute lover, hidden in the chamber (as good luck would have it) found that the bright particular star he had dared to woo, was dismissed, on the part of the mother-in-law, with every mark of consternation of contempt. The next day, however, the young lady was found dead in her bed, and the doctors announced that she had chosen to act for herself, and had stayed with the intervention of the mother-in-law. Therefore, between a necessary conclusion, and the young lady's own declaration, a trial will ensue.

The commission agent, whose manners are above his station, refuses to be an accomplice after the fact, and has been restored to his place in the house at Toulon, whence he had broken away just before the catastrophe, and has recognized at Bordeaux, in the cathedral, whither he had accompanied the body of the lady to be laid in the sepulchre of the Pere-Lachaise. The mother insists upon a divorce, and the trial will ensue, as it is thought, early this month (July).

THE CONCESSIONS OF BOMBA.

It is confirmed that the King of Naples has granted a Constitution to his people. It is to be promulgated, and, stated the 25th of June, constitutional and representative government is to be established in Sicily. Sicily is to be annexed to the Kingdom of Naples; a general amnesty is to be declared to all political offenders. Concessions are to be made with the King of Sardinia for the adoption of the commercial code, and measures are to be taken for the union of Sicily, with a Royal Prince as Viceroy. These concessions, published in the Giornale Officiale of Naples, prove, it was every where believed came too late. The Sicilians will not accept any thing but the Dictatorship of Garibaldi, with a Royal Prince as Viceroy. These concessions were

PEEPS INTO THE HAREM.

BY SIR JOHN BOWRING.

I HAVE enjoyed some privileges, as a traveler, under the auspices of a doctorial degree, and though I am not dignified with an M.D. title, the Ulema, or all practical and useful purposes, did just as well in the Levant. In fact, having an official position during our wars, I was known among the Arabs as El Hakim El Kebir, the great doctor —the doctor par excellence—and was not only frequently consulted on medical matters, but permitted and invited to penetrate into some of the mysteries of that domestic life which is in general carefully screened from foreign observation. Allah has not been done to convey accurate notions of the family and social interest among Mohammedan races.

I once dined with an Aga in a village of Palestine, Kefr Kenna, except his wife and children, were among the guests, and he, like many of his race, did not hesitate in allowing himself more than one lawful wife—sometimes as a study by the Koran, especially when he could screen himself from the observations of more severe and more censorious followers of Islam.

The dinner of the Aga over, conversation became more and more lively, and the colloquies ran from tongue to tongue, unbridled, upon the most lovable portion of creation. Under ordinary circumstances it is a great affront to talk to a Mohammedan of the lady who is one of his household, or even to suppose or imply the existence of a female sex. You may converse upon politics and upon geography as to the well-being or well-doing of a family, but it would be illbred and impertinent to show any interest about the health of a mother, wife, or daughter, even though you may have heard rumors of sickness, or even of impending death.

But wine, which will more than the Aga in [rarely], thaws the frozen reserve, and opens the locked lips of conversation to the most forbidden topics, and we began to talk of the fair beauties of his harem, and to describe to us some of the many beautiful children we looked up to him as their lord and master. We could not but express great interest in communications so eloquent; and complimented him on the possession of so many pearls of great price. At last his enthusiasm mounted to its full height, and his proud satisfaction broke out into an epithet expressive of happiness

"Would you like to see the damsels?"

"Above all things," was the natural reply.

"Come along, then—come!"

And he himself led the way to an upper apartment.

It was a large room, surrounded by a cushioned divan, and female shawls and robes of silk were scattered about in heaps and rolls on the floor. There were many mirrors on the walls, and lamps hung from the ceiling, and the moment we entered the door, I could hear by the footsteps of the Aga, clamors and shrieks broke forth from voices more or less melodious or discordant:

"You Giaour! you infidel!" you Christian dogs! what brings you here? Begone! begone!"

The Aga laughed about at the reception we experienced; but the Christian dogs were not a little perplexed and confounded; it was easy to perceive, though every one of the women crept her veil more closely over her face and around her shoulders, that the insolent and loudest were the eldest of the ladies; so abhorrent are they of whose accents were humorous and fascinating, I said,

"Sa'seet a voice must belong to a pretty face."

Upon which the damsel suddenly uncovered her countenance, looked penetratingly upon me with her black and brilliant eyes, and exclaimed:

"You Giaour! you infidel!" laughed aloud and drew the veil over her blushing cheeks. Again and again we were assuring sincerely was performed by other ladies, with a readiness or a backwardness which might be measured by the presence or absence of the Aga's harem; there were several who remained veiled through the whole of our visit with the most decorous and sedate obstinacy. The Aga said they were the old and ugly ones of the harem. Woman is every where woman, proudof—and will she boast—her attractions.

"Now, then, let us withdraw," said the Aga. We bowed to the fair community, and retired, for the visit lasted for a few minutes, amidst what the voices not altogether so boisterous or so impetuous as at our advance, but still they cried, "Infidels infidels!"

I was not quite so fortunate on another occasion, when I was the guest of the Pacha of Nablous—the Shechem of the Old Testament—the Sychar of the New. To me Samaria has always appeared more than Galilee—the most interesting part of the Holy Land, for the lies and legends which the monks have has introduced themselves, or they has found an inexhaustible mine of superstitions and absurdities; and the whole region represents, for more than dozen Judies, the unchanged characteristics of Biblical history. Fables and traditional less traditions crowd themselves into every part of Jerusalem, and even the sites of the most memorable events are subjects of doubtful discussion; but Samaria has the charm of being now what it was nineteen centuries ago; and the Samaritans, though reduced to a very small number of families, have retained the language, the religion, the prejudices of their ancestors; and they love the Jews as little as their ancestors did. To the Jews I owed a friendly introduction to the Samaritan Sheiks, one of whom in his principal residence and I received from them many courtesies and kindnesses. In answer to some inquiries, my host offered to show me the female apartments of the palace; but this was not after dinner; and he had not accommodated his conscience to his tastes, nor found arguments for surrendering his temperance to temptation, nor in wresting both the letter and spirit of the Koran to a very free interpretation. A messenger was dispatched to the harem, and soon after I accompanied the Pacha up stairs. We heard much bustle and confusion; and as the doors were opened we saw women scampering away in all directions along the balconies, and toward the inner apartments, in obvious haste and oppehension. They were all veiled, and the mode in which their garments hung about them showed that they had been unprepared for so sudden an exodus. We found the rooms in "most admired disorder," and every thing looked as if the late occupants had been rendered very much taken from fire and sword, earthquake, or other convulsion. There were on the carpets and the divan Cashmere shawls, gay and rich silk dresses, and decorated slippers, and musical instruments, and broken nosegays; but absolute silence reigned. Beyond these hasty glances I could not be induced nor sought to penetrate: any such attempt would have been alike a great discourtesy to the rules of the country, and an offense to virtuous. The ladies were not unaware of the presence of foreign visitors, and had probably been occupied in arranging flowers and sweetmeats, prepared by their own fair fingers, were brought to us for acceptance. The most distinguished were the youngest and handsomest the ladies of the harem is, however, a fairly-woven kerchief, or napkin, on which the receiver's name, or a verse of poetry, or a sentence of the Koran, is wrought in Arabic letters of gold.

There is a little hidden coquetry in all women's nature which, second in a few days, will break out in the presence of admiring man, and ordinarily the coquetry will be in the proportion of the attractiveness of the possessor. So women are liable to the charms of her own beauty, and she will seldom fail to exhibit them to the best advantage. It is not an unusual thing among Mussulmans of wealth, when they invite strangers, to give musical or theatrical entertainments after their meals, which the women of the harem honor with their presence; but they are concealed behind gratings and lattices, and it is very difficult to distinguish their faces, even when their voices are heard; but I have remarked that the greatest feet occasionally put aside the curtain to be seen, and she might always be certain that the loudest ittle-tattle was from the youngest and fairest of the group: the name of the fairest always improves an exhibition from his birds of paradise when fairly and safely caged. If the chances are few which a fair young girl of Europe has to show off her graces, she has the ready ingenuity to avail herself of them. There is no doubt a charm in waving the adjustment of the veil, under which, in the Levant, sometimes tempts a lady betyond the limits of maiden modesty and Western decorum. It is the breaking of the string of the unstretched bow.

I had a waiting-place on the principal road from Damascus to Jerusalem a is very ancient city, and was known by the name of Khan Shebeen. It has still many remains of the splendor of the great antiquity of the place. The government is administered by a native Syrian, an old man, to whom, at the time of my visit, I was a stranger. I had a general recommendatory firman signed by the Sultan. On our way thither we heard much of the extraordinary courtesy of the Sheik's young wife, who had the fame of being the most lovely woman that had ever been spoken of in those regions, and her husband was quite disinterested as Oriental husbands frequently are—the object of jealousy and jealousy, in the same degree the most affectionate admiration, on the part of her husband. Concealed and secluded, though she lived in the midst of the bustling village, the occupiers of her fair countenance shone by the reflection of its fame like a remote star in the heavens, and the old Sheik was an object of envy to the middle-aged youths less privileged than he in their domestic treasures. It was sunset when we reached the Sheik's palace, but he came out to meet us in the most urbane and perfect courtesy, and the usual phrases that his house was honored by our presence.

We observed evidence of much disquietude on the good Sheikh's visage, and it was obvious he was wrestling with some secret mental anxiety, which that he desired to get rid of a burden which pressed heavily on his mind. "Sir Doctor," he said, "I have no sorrow in the harem, that the child of his old age was sick, and, as he feared, at the point of death."

"Doctor, will you heal my child?" was his inquiry.

Now the infant boy had been born to the beautiful bride, and I was very much disposed to be preconceived in my thoughts, that I might possibly, through the desire of the father to save the sufferings of the child, get a peep behind the curtain. The school fame of whose loveliness was still sounding in my ears, and, let me own it, much sharpened my curiosity.

"Well, then," I answered, "take me to the harem, and I will see what I can do for you."

"Impossible!" said the Sheik; "impossible!"

"But if the child die, and you should be visited by the thought that the Hakim could and would have saved it?"

"Impossible!" he repeated. "It can not be."

"If the child is not relieved, he will die."

"Alas! but you can not be permitted to enter the harem. Shall the infant be brought out?"

"By no means—the child can not be removed. Besides, men know nothing about the complaints of children. We Western physicians have only one rule of treatment. We take the case to another that is invariably our practice. We hear from her the symptoms and the progress of the disease, and only after getting all possible information—information which the mother alone is able to give."

"It can not be! it can not be!" he repeated with new emphasis.

"I am sorry for it," was all my reply.

He hung down his head, saluted me, and quickly left the apartment.

It was some hours after this interlude that the Sheik made his appearance and appeared to avoid me.

"It was your disagreeable duty to tell me what must be, must. He could not run the risk of losing his child. Would I do him the favor to follow him?"

I bowed, of course, with great complacency, inwardly rejoicing on the success of my admirable diplomacy, but giving no outward sign of self-gratulation or delight.

He preceded me with a slow and seemingly beatified step, which he unlocked, he opened the doors of several apartments, through which we advanced to the sanctum sanctorum of the women. Upon a luxurious couch lay a very pale, emaciated infant, which seemed two or three months old. It was encumbered with garments; it had the Moslem head-dress—a turban—on its head, and its body was covered with amulets, charms, and verses from the Koran, to whose marvelous influence, aided by prayers to the Prophet, they had ventured to look for the recovery of the patient. Other hope there was none: and as the child was fading, as the child appeared sinking and to be past recovery.

Hanging over the child, looking like a statue of grief, a veiled woman was seated.

To her I addressed myself, but not a word did she reply. She seemed abandoned to sorrow and absorbed in contemplation of the little sufferer on the Persian rug. A sigh escaped her, and my sympathy was strongly excited. I pursued my inquiries as to the condition of the infant. What was its age? How long had it been ill? What had been done for its recovery? Who had been consulted? What were its precise symptoms? Did it get any sleep? and so forth: but only indistinct replies were given by the attendants of the people.

"You must speak more plainly. If your language were English, I should have difficulty in understanding you, even though that vast part of it comprehend your Syriac-Arabic very imperfectly. You must remove your veil, and you may then be heard by the child's mother who is sitting in the recess for your boy." She shook her head: it seemed as if I made no impression. I insisted more strongly. I said I was an English doctor, only accustomed to the practice of English mothers. She talked the more unveiled faces; that only did as all we wished to know; they gave every particular of their children's indisposition; and we were able from these to come clearly what ought to be done. Moved by my increasing urgency, she raised her hands, threw off her veil, stared me in the face—as only be of a woman, were not wrinkled. "I am the old wife," were the only words she uttered.

"Sal wife!" I exclaimed to the Sheik; and I could not check an outburst of laughter as we left the harem together. "Old, however, give some nutriment to the child, and learned other and that he had got well.

I have availed myself of such opportunities as I have had to learn from intelligent Orientals themselves their views as to the comparative influences of polygamy and monogamy upon domestic happiness; and the result has been most favorable to that policy consecrated by Christian laws and Christian sentiment. The one man and one wife union are exclusively bound together by the marriage tie, and the children only of such marriages are admitted to be the legitimate descendants of their parents.

VILLAGE ROSES AND THORNS.

THE village of Auvay-le-Clocher was situated on the side of a hill, looking in sunshine. At the entrance of the village—the ragged village with the soilless of trottoirs, and with a gutter in the middle, stood the church, and inclosed with it, the cemetery, which was inhabited only by the curé, his single maid-servant, and a little boy of nine or ten years old, the orphan nephew of the latter.

The curé, like all the other curés poor, reading in his breviary one of the portions allotted for daily perusal.

Clattering about in sabots, on the pavement in front of the house, was little Claude, the nephew of Jeanne, the curé's servant.

"I say, little one," said the good man, "tell thy aunt to make haste with dinner. I'm as hungry as a wolf—as hungry as the deuce!"

The child laughed, and clumped into the kitchen with his message, while M. Leroy proceeded up stairs to his room, to expedite some preparations. He drew the table into its place, and out of the corresponding cupboard extracted his bottle of vin ordinaire: wrenched that stuff: a knife, a cruet, a napkin, a plate, and a napkin to match, rolled within its ivory ring, on which an inscription hospitably wished that it might be "welcome."

While occupied in these arrangements, a back door, leading to the other rooms, above and below, opened, and there appeared in succession, a fork, the cloth.

"Par exemple, M. le Curé!" was her exclamation, when she saw how her master was employed; and taking the things from his hands, she began to perform her own duties in a good-humored manner, man of about four or five and twenty, but, like nearly all French peasants, appeared some years beyond. Her features were regular, with the exception of a somewhat coarse mouth; her dark eyes were fine, and surmounted by well-marked brows, and her complexion was of a rich, warm brown, with a good deal of color. Altogether, a handsome specimen of her class, but with a taciturn gravity and seriousness of demeanor somewhat unusual.

The curé sat down in his arm-chair, with a look of complete satisfaction at his wife and family in the room. It was evident his reading occupied little of his attention; for, whenever he could direct it unobserved to the servant he did so, and finally, when she left the room, he flung down the volume, murmuring, with an expression of profound concern,

"The poor girl! the unhappy!" and remained absorbed in evidently painful reflections till the sound of her approaching light step on the stairs aroused him.

But it must have been no common grief that could materially affect the curé's appetite, and when Jeanne had produced, in one course, the whole of the dinner, consisting of the usual soup and bouilli, a salad, a dish of potatoes cooked in butter, and a dish of the light-red pine-apple strawberries, of which whole fields are grown wherever the vicinity of a town of any size affords a market for them, M. Leroy fell-to with hearty good-will and made very short work of the repast. Then he sat down in the arm-chair, and quietly composed himself to his post-prandial nap, while the tones bolted outside the window to call him, and a little child on the grove below, sang thanks to him for the ruddy cherries to which he and his young family were the main audience.

Jeanne's and Claude's dinner followed that of the master, and the meal concluded, the former filled a little basket with eggs, and gave it to the boy.

"Go, my child," she said, "with this to Madame Morel; say Monsieur le Curé sends them with many compliments. Then go on to the Croix-Blanche, and ask, from Monsieur le Curé, if Madame Ledoux and her daughter are, and, coming back, you may call at Uncle Jacques's, and say to Florette that she would come down the first day this week she can get out. Go, and don't break the eggs, and bring back the basket. Mind."

Jeanne watched the door till the boy had passed through and latched the garden gate. Then she returned to the kitchen, took a large key from a nail above the door, a long bricle the opening chimney, and once more locking out and all round, she re-entered and proceeded through four contiguous passages to the room that formed the last of a straggling series, unlocked the door, and entered.

It was a small, gloomy lumber-room. In one corner the long-collected dust had been swept from the floor, where it was spread some fresh straw, and on it, rolled up, a mattress and some bedding. After listening intently for a minute, Jeanne, satisfied that no sleeper was disturbed down a house-top chair and a ragged rug that were placed on the top of a box in the corner near the door, and, having done so, within it drew a bundle tied up in an old colored handkerchief. Opening this carefully, several articles of baby's clothing, some more advanced in progress, all of the commonest description, but carefully made and clean, were disclosed, and Jeanne, taking working materials from the same bundle, began stitching away at an unfinished frock with feverish rapidity, still pausing now and then, with that look of intense anxiety, to listen.

For more than an hour she worked uninterited; then, as if feeling to remain longer away from her usual employments, she, putting her work under a half-finished cap, which might be worked at in any leisure moments, rolled up the bundle, placed it in the box, and again covered the latter with the rug and chair, as before. Then carefully locking the door behind her, she returned to the kitchen.

She did so just in time; for, while she was putting together the brands that, during her absence, had burned themselves to the middle, and, falling outward, become scattered and nearly extinguished, an old crone, bulbfagged, half-peasant, and consequently bareheaded, stretch, tottered into the kitchen. Standing just within the threshold, her knotted, claw-like hands crossed on the top of her staff, she spoke Jeanne in a harsh, low jour, and looked, contemplating the girl, with a grin intolerable to be seen.

"Sit down, Mère Gausset," Jeanne said, crossing herself in secret, as she turned to place a chair for the unwelcome guest, "it is a long way from your weather's come at last; that ought to agree with your rheumatism."

"Eh, eh, well enough, well enough. How is Monsieur le Curé?—and yourself?" suddenly, and with a scrutinizing look.

"Monsieur well; and I, I'm always well."

"So much the better, so much the better, my girl; ready to dance at the wedding on Thursday? Eh, it'll be a fine wedding."

So deadly a whiteness overspread the girl's face as she turned from the log to conceal it as she replied,

"So I hear."

"Well, you'll see it, no doubt, that'll be better. Eugène Landry and you were great friends last year, I remember; every body said you were going to be married. But, alas! he's off with a girl nothing, lover's are shy, and they say Mélie Prunier has not only a good dowery, but will have all old Louis Prunier's savings. Oh, it's a fine marriage for Eugène."

"A fine marriage," Jeanne repeated mechanically. Happily for us that moment the curé's voice, calling her, released her for the instant from her torture, and when she had performed the service required by the old hag, Jeanne summoned the lingered about up stairs till the old woman, tired of waiting, took her departure.

At night, Jeanne went solitary and sad to her bed: in the morning, when she went about her work, she felt as if she slept sleeping. The last she had gone through that night none but God and her own poor heart could tell.

"Jeanne, how ill you look; ill you look, my girl" the curé said, as he entered the kitchen. "What is the matter?"

"I am not very well," she replied. "I was ill in the night, and had bad dreams; but I am much better now, monsieur; it's nothing—it will all pass away."

M. Leroy paused, hesitated, sighed; he would fain have restored the poor confidence he had reassured him as to the suspicions that, never occurring to himself, had lately been suggested by village gossip. But Jeanne went to and fro, bestirring herself in a way to make any such opportunity difficult, and, with a slow step and anxious mind, the curé went out to tend his roses.

Through the next three and four days the subject still haunted him, but by degrees less painfully and at longer intervals. Jeanne seemed getting well again, and was, he fancied, less preoccupied; less oppressed with some hidden care than, despite all her efforts to conceal the fact, she had lately been. He had had some knowledge of Eugine Landry's former attachment to her, and he now began to think that it was Eugène's faithlessness alone that had so weighed upon her mind.

On the sixth day from the wedding Jeanne came to him with a troubled face. Her mother was alarmingly ill; she had had a letter from a neighbor, entreating that, if the curé could spare her, she would love no time in coming to her. M. Lecroy scanned the face before him—a face whose every wrinkle he knew, and whose set mouth and desperately beseeching eyes told all that hung on his reply. "I could not keep her in that agony of suspense; he could not, by the hint, even, of a perhaps unmerited suspicion, further torture her; so he consented.

It was: distance of nearly five leagues to Montrouge, the village where Jeanne's mother resided, and there being only chance communications between it and Auray-le-Clocher, she had no means of getting there except on foot. She was yet far from strong, and the weather was hot; but, on the mission on which she was going, solitude was wholly indispensable, and this she could only secure by walking.

She had arranged with her cousin Pierrette to take her place in the curé's household during her absence; and now all things were prepared for her departure, which was to take place before even the early June dawn. All that she might get beyond the risk of recognition while Auray and its neighborhood was yet buried in sleep.

Strange, indeed, that she was crossed with gleams of stormy sunshine, had been the experience of those last days of which she became. Happily her child was a healthy and a quiet one, and passed most of the hours of its first days in sleep. Still what agonies of vigilance and unceasing exertion would be heard, lest the frequency of her visits to its infirmplace should be noticed, lest Claude should, at any time, trace her movements! Yet, with all this, the passionate love she had for the infant—the ecstasies of maternal pride and tenderness that not all the sorrow and all the sufferings of her situation could smother—gave her moments she would have counted at almost any price; and though the child's removal would put an end to this perpetual state of anxious terror, she yet dreaded the separation almost as much as she desired the relief.

She had not confided her secret to any one; though she would have feared lately to admit the truth to her cousin Pierrette, who suspected it, but who, after a few leading questions, had, in pity, forborne to press further, and who did not come to take her place till some hours after her departure.

Before daylight, Jeanne, with her precious burden sleeping in her arms, and a basket containing the child's simple provisions for the journey, stole out of the presbytere, and through the garden wicket, into the sleeping village, whose lonely air had to traverse before gaining the road to Montrouge.

The moon had set, and though some stars still twinkled, the night was quite dark. Breathing, listening, seeking to penetrate the obscurity, she paused an instant before the church to assure herself she was unobserved, and then fairly started on her way. At first all was dead silence; then she fancied she heard—fancied she saw—something, that had been crouching by the white wall of the garden, near the gate, stir and rise slowly. Like a deer that suddenly scents its pursuers, she turned and fled, finding her way through the dark street and over the rough, sharp stones rather by instinct than sight, guessing that till the rapidity of her course had so exhausted her breath that she was forced to pause to regain it.

By this time she was well out in the open country, and the dim line of the white road just discernible before her eyes, accustomed to the darkness, she paused to rest against the gate of a long her way. Then she began to feel a little reassured, and to try to reason away her fears—since it might have been fancy altogether, the effect of an over-tired brain; or, as the impression had been so strong that it could not be entirely overcome by any attempts to refuse the evidence of her senses, she persuaded herself that what she could not deny she had seen was but simply a dog, gaunt, a wild animal, that her footsteps had disturbed. So probable, indeed, did this solution appear, that—her reason having come to her aid—she began to count it—she was fain to reassure herself with such explanation, and turning her thoughts as well as steps from more than a passing score to consider the dreadest scene of confession to her mother, who was utterly ignorant of the events that were so suddenly to be brought before her, and whose privileged illness had been, of course, merely a pretext to make them known.

By the time that the June morning was in its waking flush Jeanne had got so far on her way, without interruption or encountering any one, that she now began to feel there was comparatively little risk of detection. Still, she said to herself, she must not pause, and not think of resting a moment of the so precious morning hours. But ere she had got much further on her way, she began to feel that she was in a condition to travel either very far; and she reflected that it would be better to husband her strength before fatigue overcame it, than to put it all forth at once, and perhaps undo herself for the completion of her journey.

There was, she knew, not much further on, a little wood, and she now resolved that there should end her first stage. She could find shelter, rest, and concealment among the trees, without going far from the road; and this repose, with some food, would, she hoped, quite restore her to continue her journey by two or three easy stages, if she found she could not make the rest of it in one. So she walked on bravely, keeping a look-out for the little wood.

Suddenly a turn of the road brought her on a party of men, women, and children, half gipsies, half strollers, seated in a green spot by the highway, round their fire. One or two were at work there at her as she passed, but took no further notice; and she continued her way till some hundred yards further on she perceived, sitting at the foot of a tree, a woman whose general appearance seemed to mark her as one of the party she had just left behind, but whose attitude of grief—for body crouched together, her head bowed down on her hands—might sufficiently account for her thus isolating herself from them.

Hearing a footstep she looked up, and showed a dark face, still young, but marked with an expression of despair, and, as Jeanne fancied, at the same time so sullen, that Jeanne's quiet sense of compassion for her was for a time in touch of fear, and she instinctively shrank from the long, fixed gaze with which the woman followed her. After she had passed she began to think that perceiving she was still the object of the same uncomfortable scrutiny, a thousand vague anxieties assailed her.

She tried to recall the face, to remember where and how she could ever have seen it before; but her memory could furnish her with no clew but any previous association with it; and fancying that the woman must have been deserted by some miscreant lover, like herself, she dismissed the subject from her mind. Shortly after, coming within sight of the wood where she purposed to rest, she saw the approaching relief turned her thoughts into another channel.

Turning from the road, she soon found a spot at seemed perfectly suited to her purpose: a couch of thick moss, hidden from the highway, not so near to the wayside as to be open to a bank, overshadowed by a great gnarled and hollow oak, and further coiled and freshened by the flow of a little brook. Here she laid down her head on her hot and dusty face and hands, and having eaten some of the food she had brought with her, and nursed her child, she drank deeply of the water. With the murmur of the brook and the faint, regular respiration of her infant in her arms, all grew dim light, with here and there a little spot of blue heaven, or a white sailing cloud passing before her upturned face, and then all grew dark, and outward things became confounded, and she fell into the first really profound and dreamless sleep she had known for many weeks.

Then there came, stealing along with cat-like footfall and suspended breath, parting, with strong but cautious hand, the thick branches, stepping by moments to look and listen, then creeping on again, the woman with the terrible face; for more terrible now from the fact that, instead of a merely purpose stamped in every line of it. A few more long, lithe, stealthy steps brought her beside the mother and child.

Noiselessly she stooped over them, pausing and poise, but studying the best means to execute it. She child lay clasped in the fold of the mother's arm, and any sudden and violent disturbing her was at once the woman's desire and difficulty. Plucking a stem of feather-grass, she, with its fringed tip, touched the child's face with a hand, ready to drop and crouch behind her, so that, should the sleeper be so far disturbed as to open her eyes, she might not see her at once. But, as the latter guessed, her sleep was too profound for this, and she repeated the action, then put out the arm on the ground beside her, leaving the infant exposed.

In a second it was in the dark woman's grasp, and she was up and away, one arm clasping it close to her breast, the other pressing her face on its mouth and still its cries, if it should attempt to utter any; but it only started and murmured in its sleep, and was quiet again.

The woman sped on, without pausing an instant, till she came to a spot in the wood removed a considerable distance from the highway, but, up still only on the border, her course having been nearly parallel to the road, though not to be seen from it. Here she paused, and kneeling by a little spot where the ground had been newly disturbed, heaped together some withered and dead leaves almost concealed the part, she bent, and kissing the sod, murmured,

"Adieu, my darling! Je bon Dieu has given me one to replace thee!" Then, rising, she once more sped onward, and was soon out of sight.

It was past noon when Jeanne awoke, with a terrible dream of the dark woman.

She knew, the instant she found her child gone, what had become of it; but she felt no surprise, nor greater comfort. Wild and desperate, all thought but that of recovering the baby left her the cursed one: he might recognize her, she might know her vengeance could proclaiming it in the streets of Auray, but the dreadful fact that she had lost, willingly would she have paid such a price for its restoration. But what to do now? how to trace the woman? Her flight, and the sudden confusion of her senses no definite plan at first presented itself; but when, by a violent and determined effort, she collected her wits, the only chance for her was to retrace her steps to where the strollers had been assembled, and endeavor from them to gain information.

Turning backward, then, she rapidly traversed the ground she had so wearily trodden some hours before. A wayfarer, coming from the east, passed to look after the distracted woman, and a little boy tending sheep on the wayside crossed himself with mingled fear and pity.

She came at last to the spot she sought; but it was vacant. The scarcely-extinguished coal on the burned turf, scraps of rags, and dirty paper, and straw littered the ground, the grass still lay crushed and trampled by the dusty feet. But the wanderers were gone, and Jeanne recollected with a feeling of agony that a little further on three roads branched off in different directions, and that unless she could fall on some accidental trace of their course, the chances were two to one against her taking the right one. She traced the way back to where the roads separated. The probabilities seemed altogether in favor of their keeping the main road, which led to Auray. In her despair she had just decided on retracing her steps even thither, when the figure of a man in the distance, coming from that direction, raised a gleam of hope. Hastily joining him, she asked him if he had met the party she described. The man stared at her, took off his hat, deliberately wiped his face with the dirty colored handkerchief it contained, restored the handkerchief to the hat, and the hat to the head, and then replied in the negative.

"Where had he come from? From far? From beyond Auray-le-Clocher?"

He nodded.

"Then he must have seen them if they had passed."

"Probably."

"But there were so many of them, and they looked so different to ordinary travelers; and they had a van, with a white horse! He could not be mistaken if he had seen it at all!"

The man shrugged his shoulders. "Savoir! he had rested by the way, he might have slept, they might have passed him while he was asleep."

Jeanne could get nothing more out of him, but after muddering as was his stability, she was disposed to gather from his replies that the chances were against the travelers having taken that route. She was now at the choice guide her course, and therefore, with an instinctive shrinking from the glare of the sun, chose the more shady.

On, and on she went, till her feet were blistered and her knees trembled, and her head throbbed. On and on till sunset. On and on till nightfall. No trace, no hope. Then she lay down there under a bank by the wayside, and felt so utterly broken that she longed for death. All that she was to young to die—that she death to make so easy a prey, and sheer exhaustion plunged her into a sleep that lasted till the chill of the coming dawn aroused her. Then she crept on with dull, dumb pain, and by the time she had reached the outskirts of Montrouge she had no thought beyond that of continuing her journey.

Thus for two days and two nights more she wandered, and wandered in vain. Then, with what little strength she had was still left her, she decided to return to Auray, and rather with the instinct that directs a dog on his homeward way than by any mental process, she traced her road back to the presbytere by the evening of the fourth day.

In vain Pierrette questioned her; in vain Claude crept to her side and timidly looked up in her haggard face. She had no answer to give, but shook her head mutely, and sat in her chair, or stared blankly into the fire. The curé had gone for a game of chess with Mairie, and Pierrette would only get her to go passively to bed—all attempts to induce her to touch food were vain—and at last the latter, tired of the well-intentioned cares of her cousin, Jeanne turned her face to the wall and pretended to sleep.

Some weeks elapsed, and Jeanne had fallen into her usual course of duties; but quite mechanically, and as one to whom nothing in life could give a moment of interest or enjoyment. Her state of mind was a sort of dull, lifeless fatalism, that accepted all things as parts of a crushing, relentless destiny, which she was in neither comprehend nor resist, and which she could only bow under so long as her strength lasted, but which she felt that she should be roused from this condition, and in a startling manner.

She was arrested on a charge of infanticide.

At the trial the chain of evidence was painfully conclusive. Her attachment to Eugène Landry had been publicly known, her confession had, for many weeks back, been more than suspected in the village.

The widow Gausset was the principal witness against her. This woman happened to be about the house more than once at night during the evening work; she had heard Jeanne sobbing in the darkness and in the silence, the cries of a new-born infant proceeding from the room. She suspected again, by another of the same strange chance that be in the street, near the presbytere, not long after midnight on the day but one after the confession, she had been surprised and startled by hearing some one come out of the curé's garden; she had watched to see who it might be, and, though the night was dark, she had been able to distinguish a woman, carrying something in her arms, who fled on seeing her. The widow Gausset, much surprised at this circumstance, had gone the next day to the presbytere to relate what she had witnessed, assuming it to be a theft. She had found Jeanne gone, to see her dying mother, as she was told. She had not believed the story, but she had thought the affair was no business of hers; she did not wish to compromise the girl, so she had said no more about the matter to any one.

But since then she had reflected a good deal on the matter, and several circumstances (the last and most important of which had caused her to feel the necessity of revealing all she herself knew on the subject) had, strangely enough, been brought before her. She, the widow Gausset, had gained a living by going about to the neighboring farms and villages, assisting on the charity of all good souls, or by effecting sales on cattle that were sick, or affected by the evil eye, or other charms—she had visited Jeanne's mother, and, on speaking to her of the illness of her daughter's child, had been amazed to learn that the old woman had never been ill, and was ignorant of her daughter's having this, her suspicions had been so much excited that she—always as a matter of duty—had made every inquiry in the neighborhood and on the road between Montrouge and Auray, and had learned that several persons had seen a young woman whose description precisely answered Jeanne's appearance. For instance, a wayfaring man, who had found a pile of work at Montrouge, which had kept him there for some time, and a little goat-herd, especially, had seen her come out of a wood by the road-side, by which she must have passed that they had fancied her mad. These persons being called, their evidence wholly corroborated the Mère Gausset's testimony. Lastly, came the circumstance which, as the public prosecutor declared, made her feel it was imperative on her to bring to light all she had learned respecting the affair.

Returning from Montrouge, she was accompanied by a dog that she had cured of the distemper, and that she was taking back to his owner at Auray. Arrived at the wood described by the last witnesses, the dog had run in among the trees, and being unable to call him back, or to follow, lest she should lose him, she had followed to a certain spot, where she found him tearing up the ground with his paws. Fearing, as it was quite in character with him, she had, in some curiosity, further excited by the fact that the ground had evidently been lately disturbed, waited to ascertain what he was about. In the object of his search, and shortly, to her horror and amazement, she saw revealed the body of an infant.

Here the mayor of Auray deposed to the old woman's having been well known to have no account of his having, accompanied by her and the other witnesses, gone to the spot and found the body (she had covered it up hastily herself), and, by using a handkerchief round the dog's neck, had dragged him away from it by force); and of his having confided to her examination he had undertaken, whose testimony followed.

The doctor, who declared that, in consequence of the state of decomposition in which the body was found, it was impossible to say exactly how old the infant might have been, was probably a week or more, and possibly a fortnight. There were no marks of external violence on it, but, as far as he could judge, from its size and appearance, it had been born alive. He suspect that it might have been smothered. He had seen one or two cases of infants that had been buried alive, but the inquiry—one which was presented appearances to which those in the case in question seemed to bear a strong analogy.

Pierrette, who had, left all of Jeanne's mother, were called in to bear evidence, and what they had to say could in no degree invalidate the testimony of the previous witnesses.

So Jeanne Decisions was declared guilty of childmurder, with the plea, usual in France, where the life of the culprit is at stake (except in cases of the most exaggerated atrocity), of extenuating circumstances. She was sentenced to the travaux forcés for life.

Jeanne was carried from the court in a state of insensibility. Next morning, when, at last, the jailer entered her cell, he found her crouched in a heap in the rereuter corner. He spoke to her, but when, obtaining no answer, he laid his hand on her shoulder, she sprang at him, demanding her child; and such was the violence of her fury that it required men to hold her down and bind her. From this state, which lasted, with little intermission, for some weeks, she gradually fell into a state of dull, apathetic imbecility, and, in that condition, as she was generally harmless, though occasionally, and at long intervals, subject to fits of passion, her mother was permitted to take her to her own home, where she remained till the period of the old woman's death, when she entered upon the duties of seventeen years later. Then Claude, who, thanks to his own steadiness and intelligence, and to the kind recommendation of the curé, had risen from a gardener at the neighboring Château du Pierre, took on himself the charge of the almost-crazed woman.

Sixteen years had slipped away, bringing their changes to Auray-le-Clocher.

The curé, grown an aged, was still a hale and hearty man, and went about his duties with little diminished activity. His eye and his hand at billiards were as steady as they used to be, but on the other hand, his skill in the cultivation of his roses had so much increased, that one of them gained the prize for the horticultural show of the chief town of the department, and became known all over France as the beauty of Auray. The Mère Gausset, whose reputation of witchcraft, with the dread and dislike that belonged to it, had become of more pronounced character, remained a hale, grown paralytic and half-crazed, and not even the strongest-minded of the inhabitants of the village could push the door of her dingy hog-wash dwelling in some sunny corner, a hideous spectacle, mumbling and mowing, or at intervals bursting into impotent fury at any one who should attempt affront, without shuddering and crossing themselves.

Great preparations were made, as usual, for the fête of Auray, which, as the day of Saint Anne, the patroness of the village, was newly decorated, and adorned with fresh flowers, among which those gorgeous specimens of the curé's best roses, and various specimens of young Claude's skill in horticulture. Even the processions, with all its attendant pomp of music (so called), banners, and priestly vestments, rich with silk, gold, and embroidery; and then the fair, when booths were collected enough had gingerbread to sicken the youth of both sexes of Auray for the next ten days. Besides these were numerous booths for cakes and dolls, toys, baskets, brooms, mats, watering-pots, farm, garden, and household implements of all descriptions, and for sedans, lazy, pale yellow, smooth-coated fruits, closely related to pumpkins, in particular from the rinds. Then there were swings and merry-go-rounds, with wooden horses, and boards for a game distantly related to bagatelle, and there was shooting at a plaster figure with the arbalete or cross-bow, and there were a few shows of an humble character.

But the great attraction was reserved for the evening, when, in an interval of the dancing, some wonderful performances, chiefly of a dramatic character, though the acrobatic, pyrotechnic, and pro-tilligitatory elements of entertainment were not wanting, were to take place, executed by a strolling company.

The public, on the payment of one sou for those who were content to stand, of three for such as desired the luxury of seats, were admitted into a temporary inclosure formed of mats, canvas, and old tarpaulins stretched on posts planted in the sward, and the entertainment commenced by a short, wiry individual, with a swarthy face, keen black eyes, and fabulous head of frizzly black hair, performing a frenzied dance, blindfold, in a space of about two square yards, where were laid six eggs, without breaking one of them. This feat completed, amidst the applause of the spectators, the gentleman, tearing the bandage from his eyes, made a sweeping bow to the company, and retreated with a short backward run behind the canvas screen, which formed the green-room.

In a few seconds issued from the same retreat a dark, hard-featured woman, looking considerably past forty, though she had probably hardly reached that age, accompanied by a slight girl of from fifteen to seventeen, who, though thin and worn - looking, had some beauty in a pair of large soft blue eyes, and a profusion of rich waved brown hair.

Having sung one or two songs, to the woman's accompaniment on a cracked guitar, the girl, taking from her hand a tambourine, began to dance to the same music, and the spectators were in the height of their enjoyment, when there came a movement from behind, attended with a cry that sent a shudder through the assembly, and Jeanne, clearing the way before her, as the course of some furious animal divides the densest crowd, plunged forward, and seizing the left hand of the dancer, turned upward the under side of the wrist. There, traversed by blue veins, and agitated by the throbbing of the pulse, was a rose-colored mark, in size and shape not unlike a rose-leaf.

"My child!" the poor soul shrieked, and clasped the dancer in an embrace in which seemed to be concentrated all the love so long cheated of its object; but the girl shrank from her in terror, and it was to the dark woman that she appealed with cries of "Mother!" for protection. Then came a struggle, a whirl, a heavy fall, the crash and smell and smoke of extinguished lights, a confusion from which the girl with difficulty extricated herself, and when the terrified bystanders at last succeeded in separating the women, the gipsy's lifeless head dropped forward —she was dead.

Jeanne lingered two days between life and death, between reason and insanity. At the last she recovered sufficiently to establish beyond doubt the identity of the little dancer with her stolen child. Assisted in her last moments by the curé, and attended by Claude and Rose, her daughter, she passed out of her troubled life quietly and in peace.

Claude took Rose to his own home, and married her as soon as it was possible to get through the brief preliminaries necessary. They lived, and died, and were buried peacefully at Auray, where, as has been said, many of their descendants are still settled, and where this chain of circumstances is still preserved.

ONCE UPON A TIME.

BY ELIZA COOK.

ONLY look at Gaffer Grey
Creeping slowly on his way,
With a staff to help him stand,
Leant on with a shaking hand;
With a step that fears to meet
The pebbles of the village street;
With a cheek that faileth in,
And a very peaked chin;
With a forehead made of wrinkles
Carved in crosses, cranks, and crinkles,
And a voice so thin and mumbling
That his glee might pass for grumbling.
See his eyes so blear and dim,
And his beard so gray and grim;
See his legs, ill lean and lank,
Dwindled down to skin and shank.
Poor old Gaffer Grey is labeled
With the words that tune my rhyme:
Read him over—you'll discover
Naught but "Once upon a time."
I wander'd to a spot of earth,
Where Fame had crowned the ruin-crags,
Where ravens in their shrieking mirth
Flapp'd their black wings like conquerors' flags
Waving above a battle-field;
Where bat and lizard had allied,
With mole and owlet by their side,

THE PUTNAM PHALANX AT THE TOMB OF GENERAL PUTNAM, BROOKLYN, CONNECTICUT, JUNE 13, 1860.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY READ & ROBINSON.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

And forced the bulwark foe to yield.
Some phantasy beguiled my sight
With vision of a gorgeous story—
Of jewel'd roof, of halls of light,
Of purple woof, of walls of might,
Of pillar'd temples, thrones of state,
Of pomp and pageant, grand and great,
Of people's shouts, of feasting kings,
And all the myriad dazzling things
That haunt the place of fabled glory.

—I started, for a frighten'd thrush
Flew from a tuft of sedgy rush,
Then, gaining down, I steep'd inside
To let the toad crawl back and hide;
A squirrel leaped up the birch
That sway'd within the oriel arch,
And then my tread disturb'd the rest
Of a wild rabbit in its nest,
I trampled through the dank thick grass,

To catch the bindweed's trailing flowers,
That tied themselves in tangled mass
Across the cracking turret towers.
The topmost battlement was lying
Covered with the buttress pile;
And dolefully the wind was sighing
Through festive court and priestly aisle.
Time's scythe of green was flung about
The mammoth skeleton of strength;
And scatter'd layers of crumbly stones
Told of its giant breadth and length.
I stood upon a scatter'd heap
Of fragments of the watch-tower Keep;
I wander'd on, and stroll'd across
The banquet-hall, laid down with moss;
I climbed some steps now shut out from day,
Till dust and nettles choked my way;
I saw a mushroom springing up
Where vassal feet had led the dance;
I saw the foxglove's swinging cup
Where knights had hung their banner'd lance;
And as I gazed I saw a hand—

A wither'd hand—stretch forth and write
A short text fraught with holy thought,
Easy to read by dullest sight.
'Twas plain and terse, but sacred page
Given straight more simple and sublime,
It soften'd youth, it solaced age,
It mock'd the hero and the sage

In these words—"Once upon a time."

'Twas but yesterday I found
A score of letters, closely bound:
Some were torn in treasured pieces,
Some were worn in careful creases,
Ink had faded, seals had crumbled,
And my heart felt sad and humbled;
For I knew the thoughts, the hopes,
The earnest wish, the brilliant tropes
These letters hasten'd to reveal
Were symbol'd by the ink and seal.
I opened one—my pulse grew quicker,
My eyelid fell, my breath came thicker;
I traced its lines, clear, firm, and clear,
Telling how deeply, fondly dear,
The loving vow for whose love I asks
That letter came, with such a cake.
It gave report of Pincher's health,
It told of Muff's increase of wealth
In five young rabbits, all milk-white,
That Gyp and Dobbin were "all right,"
That Mid-summer would quickly come,
And then for holidays and home.
I gave a gasp, half sob, half sigh,
While Memory's flood-wave filled my eye,
And folded from my misty gaze
My mother and my school-girl days.

I knelt upon mother hand,
Bold, free, and dashing in its form;
And then I saw the loadsore strand,
And heard the passion of the storm
That tore the right arm from its hold,
And flung it nerveless, still and cold,
Upon the rocks, no more to send
Its tidings full of life and joy.
And there this childhood's playmate-friend
With letters from the sailor boy.
Another and another scroll
I opened—one by one I read:
I gazed as they who may unroll
A shroud to look upon the dead.
Love, with its ardent vows, was there,
Friendship, that promised to be true,
Words that breathed summer light and air
Till'd my heart's world with gold and blue.
Where was the lover? Where the friend?
The bond that was to know no end?
Where was the promise and the vow?

Alas, a yawning gulf of gloom,
Rifted wide by the dark gray tomb,
Had open'd wide 'twixt them and now.
A mufflèd sound of breathing round,
A mingled tone of merry chime
And funeral knells, but all the bells
Gave chorus of the home which tells Sad tales of "Once upon a time."

Come, I will write my epitaph
In letters shadowy and dim,
And though the young strong man may laugh,
'Twill shortly serve as well for him.
Just heap the clay where frost and sun
May help the ivy leaf to climb,
And all I've said, and all I've done,
And all I've lost, and all I've won,
Like strange hieroglyphics that I leave run
Shall find full record on the stone
In these few words of solemn tone—
"Once upon a time."

THE PUTNAM PHALANX AT THE GRAVE OF PUTNAM.

We engrave on the opposite page one of the most interesting ceremonies that ever took place in New England—the gathering of the Putnam Phalanx at the grave of Putnam on 19th ult.

Two years ago, in the City of Hartford, Connecticut, the Putnam Phalanx was organized—a corps consisting of two companies, numbering together some two hundred and fifty, and composed, for the most part, of the intellectually, physically, and pecuniarily "solid men" of that city and its neighborhood. Judged by their stalwart forms, they might be considered the lineal descendants of "Old Put." They have done much, during the two years which have elapsed since their organization, to revive the remembrance of the hero whose name they bear. Some six years ago the Connecticut Legislature appropriated the sum of three thousand dollars for the purpose of erecting a monument to his memory, on condition that a like sum should be raised by subscription. One thousand dollars have already been contributed, principally by the descendants of the General; and it was with the design of directing public attention to this matter that the Phalanx made a pilgrimage to his tomb on the 19th ult., the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill, in which he was so prominent an actor.

The tomb, a rough structure of granite, surmounted by a horizontal slab of marble, upon which is inscribed the epitaph written by Dr. Dwight,* is in the grave-yard, a short distance south of the village of Brooklyn, Connecticut. At that town (then a part of Pomfret) the General passed the greater part of his life, occupied with the quiet pursuit of peaceful industry. In his earlier days, by an occasional episode like that of his famous encounter with the wolf—by which he is, perhaps, better known to many than by his more important exploits in after years. In the French war he found the Indians more formidable foes than the wolf. They, having captured him during a sanguinary engagement, bound him to a tree, and were preparing to burn him, when he was rescued by the gallantry and humanity of a French officer. At Bunker Hill, and the siege of Boston, he typified the master-spirit in the former terrible conflict; and afterward, when during the siege of the city, the ammunition of the besiegers failed, chafing with impatient energy at

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE CHASE.

"It was all hands again, gentlemen. The hurricane had settled down into a moderate gale from northeast, though it was some time before the awfully confused sea got to roll regularly. Then we judged ourselves—for reckoning and observation had been out of the question—to be a long way south of Jamaica, and even to the southward of the great Pedro Bank. We did not wait this time for the Pirate to lead us in getting ready for a race, but we got on a brand-new suit of topsails and courses out of the sail-room, and so soon as the men could go aloft with safety, they were ordered not to unbend the few tattered rags still clinging to the yards, but to cut away at once. Up went the topsails and courses, and they were soon brought to the yards and set close-reefed, with a storm-jib to steady the ship forward. Presently we gave her the whole foresail and mainsail, and I think that even then, for some hours, but once-half the corvette's upper works could have been visible as she plunged through the angry heaving seas.

"It left us dry enough, however, to pay some heed to the brigantine ahead of us. She was about four miles off, a little on our weather-bow, and as the rain rode we saw—splendid as boat that she was—like a gull on the back of a mighty roller, her canvas and her bulwarks—mere boards and canvas, probably—had been shaved away, the house between her masts gone too, and, no doubt, her guns or whatever else had been lying hid under it. And now she was once more the schooner Centipede, long and sharp and without any hull to speak of, so that we could see her deck from the stem to her taffrail at every lurch she made. The only difference in her appearance was that her foremast with cross-trees and a topmast for square sails. Almost as soon as our topsail sheets were hauled home her own yards went up and she had us pooped, while with the bonnet off her foresail, the whole jib and a close-reefed mainsail, we both went flying to the southward with the gale at a point abaft the beam.

"So we went on, the sea getting more regular every hour, so that we could send up the topgallant masts, get the yards across, shake a reef or two out, and put the Scourge in order. The schooner needed no encouragement from us, but crenched on more sail until her long mainmast reeled and bent over as she came to, on the breaking ridge of a wave, like a whip-stalk. By noon the clouds had gone and left us a clear sky with the gale going down into a full top-gallant breeze, sending the corvette along good eleven knots. We got an observation for latitude, and five hours later we determined the longitude and our position to be a few leagues to leeward of the Serranas Keys, with the last bird of any consequence before us heading for the Mosquito coast.

"If we had caught a cataract of water as it rolled in our bows in the morning, the schooner was taking her bath in the afternoon, for occasionally, for five minutes at a time, there was nothing seen of her deck and only the masts and broad white canvas above, like jury-sticks out of a raft. But when she did slide up with her low, long hull shooting clean out of water till nearly half her keel, with the copper sheathing flashing in the sun, was visible, she looked like a dolphin making a spring after a shoal of flying-fish. And then on her narrow deck we could see a few fellows lashed about the foremast and a couple more abaft steering her like a thread through a needle.

"We began to gain upon her now, and whenever she kept more away before the wind the gap between us closed more rapidly; for the ship could evidently outcarry the schooner, and had the breeze freshened and the sea kept up we could have run her down; and there we went—the schooner leading us about a mile—at a rate which would have made both vessels leap clear over the first ledge they struck, and perhaps have thrown somersaults of us into the bargain. I asked the Captain, who had never left my side on the poop, if we should keep on.

"'Yes, Sir,' he replied, 'so long as we have a gun and a plank to float by.'

"And, by Saint Paul! we kept on. And there was not a soul on board the Scourge, from the steamer-boy up, who did not agree with the Captain. How those villains on board the Pirate relished this decision we could only surmise; but at all risks he held his course with a nerve that might have made the devil himself shudder.

"By this time the sun was well down and a brilliant moon was riding high in the heavens; but as bright as it was, the fellow who commanded that schooner was required as well as we on an albatross and a hand as steady as an iron bar to guide his craft in the direction he was going—so late for either of us for the making of anything off.

"He must, too, have had a thorough knowledge of the reefs and keys, and trusted, perhaps, if he got clear himself that the corvette, drawing eighteen feet water and ignorant of the channel, might touch something which would throw the game in his hands. Our men had the ropes stretched along the decks and the battery clear for action, so as to be ready to wear, or tack, or fire, as our pilot ahead might require.

"The reefs were to leeward of the string of low keys, which made the water comparatively smooth, though the wind still swept strongly over us and sung through the rigging, and it was here that Centipede entered, going like wild pigeons the pair of us. The outer reef had a fair, high, curling sea, and so had those of the next inner one presented but one narrow gate-way, scarcely wide enough for a ship to scrape through, with the white surf on one uninterrupted line of black, pointed rocks and roaring white breakers, which toppled over and boiled and eddied like a thousand whirlpools into the smoother water inshore.

"As the Centipede's stern gave its sharp pitching jerk when she entered this boiling gorge, we saw, in the moonlight, her head yards laid square and her whole set of sails flowing in the sheets as she fell off with wide swings and the wind on her quarter, and flew down inside the reef.

"Five minutes after we too entered this maelstrom chasm, and, though the helm was hove hard up, and the after-sails shivered, yet before the Scourge's bows, going at the rate she was, could turn the sharp angle of that water-gate, her port bike grated against a coral ledge and grooved and bounded the planks and copper away like so much sea-weed! But yet that slight grace never stopped us a hair's weight, and with additional sail, we rushed after our pilot, mile after mile, through reef, ledge, beach-ers, inlets, and keys, now bowed sharp up, and again going free, until at last the fellow, having run us a dozen or fifty ten miles, came out, and emerged into the open water, close jammed on the wind, steering nearly due east.

"'Thank God,' exclaimed the Commodore, "I am tired of talking; suppose you take up the thread of the yarn. Domine, another bottle of Tinta!"

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE WRECK OF THE "CENTIPEDE."

THE Commodore's grog was handed at this lieutenant, moved away the full glasses of wine which he had never raised to his lips since the Commodore began, and, resting his head upon cheek on his other hand, listened.

"It's very interesting indeed." "Tear an'ages, how I love it!" quoth the Scotchman and his Milesian crony in a breath.

Having put his arm over the shoulder of Harry Darcenant, as if it was a pleasant Corinthian column to lean upon, and breaking off the ashes of his cigar on the arm of a sofa-chair which he had specially devoted to that purpose, he forthwith began:

"I am quite confident, gentlemen, that I can not describe what afterward took place so well as Commodore Cleveland; but, at all events, I'll do my best. Nor do I remember very distinctly the events of the night after we got out of the Magdalen Keys; for I was pretty well logged not myself, and, as it was, we had the watch below turned in to take the first wink of sleep we could catch for forty hours.

"The next morning, however, when I took the deck, I found the corvette under royals and flying-jib, with a fresh trade-wind blowing from about east-northeast, and a smooth sea; though close-hauled as we were, and going ten knots, the spray was flying well up the weather side of the foresail. The Centipede was about a mile and a half ahead, jammed on the wind, and trying all she knew how to eat the wind out of her, as the Commodore there said at the time, he had thrown that trick away when he cut off eight or ten feet of his foremast and made a bugantine of the craft, so that he could not brace his head-yards sharper or lie nearer the wind than we did.

"I remember, also, that two or three of the officers and I, with a hundred of the seamen, were very anxious to pitch shot at the chase from the long eighteen in the weather bridle port; but the Captain came on deck and we were forced to cable's length or two in yawing off to fire, and it would be better to save the powder until we could show a broadside into him. But all the while that Centipede was handled and steered in such a thorough seamanlike manner, and proved herself such a beautiful sea-boat, that I doubt if there was a man on board the Scourge who would not have given a year's pay to have had her whole, and only expended a spare topmast-studding-sail halliards for the necks of her crew.

"From the top-gallant forecastle we could see every thing that took place on the schooner's deck: sometimes a lot of fellows forward receiving some hard, angry objects about the flying sprit, or putting on a seizing to a traveler on the jib-stay; with a chop or two aloft stitching a chafing-mat on the lee backstay; and then aft a man shinning up the main shrouds with a tin pot hung around his neck, greasing the rim of the main-gaff, and twisting a wrinkle out of the gaff-topsail, so that it would lie as flat as this sticking-plaster on the back.

"But always, from the very first moment we descried her—before the hurricane and afterward—the whole crew fellows aluft in the gaff rail. One a large fat man, in a long dark dress, who appeared at times to be leaning over the rail as if he were sick; and the other was a tall, full-bull fellow, who sat there with a quadrant in his hands and smoking cigars, measuring the distance between the two vessels as if the whole government surveyor and especially appointed to make a hydrographical chart of the Caribbean Sea. Occasionally, too, we could see him approach the binnacle, spread a chart on the deck at his feet, examine it closely with a pair of dividers in his hands, and then he would return to his seat on the taffrail, cigar in his mouth and quadrant by his eye as before.

"Nor were we idle on board the Scourge; for when the breeze lulled we slacked up the sheets, rigging and rove down all away weight and bumper from the tops, sent the watch below to the berth-deck with a round shot apiece in their hammocks, moved a couple of carronades about the spar-deck till we got the ship in the best sailing trim, and then we went skipping and springing through the water with the elasticity of an Indian-rubber ball.

"At noon the sailing-master reported the position of the ship to be two hundred and eighty miles from the nearest land, which was the Dutch Coast. So all that day and all that night, with a moon to make a lover weep to see, we were bowling after our wanton consort in leges before long of taking the sting out of her. No kite ever pranced its quarry with a keener eye than we did the Centipede; and I could see the wolf with the flesh streaming from his jaws and blood-red, thirsty eyes, than did the Scourge those that followed Pirate. The moon that made our eyes sparkle and our teeth sharper in expectation; for we knew we would have our prey sooner or later, and it was only a late and a pleasure deferred.

"The next morning and all the day there was no change to speak of in our respective positions. The Centipede went skimming on over the water with every thread of canvas she could spread, reeling over on her side at times when the breeze freshened, while the spray flashed up joyously and sparkled in the sun, leaving a long white curving wake behind her; which, before it had been entirely lost in the regular waves of the sea, the corvette's sharp bows would plunge into, and again make it flash high up to her fore-yard, and then go scething and hissing and kissing her black sides with a polished around her rudder and was lost again in the wake astern.

"And all the time that man sat with a cigar in his mouth on the Pirate's taffrail; while Commodore Cleveland there stood with a spyglass to his eye on the poop of the Scourge.

"You may imagine, gentlemen," continued Hardy, as he again knocked the ashes off his cigar, "that going to sea attended with some few discomforts, such as battening down the hatches in a sirocco in the Mediterranean off Tyndi; a simoon in the China seas; a bitter northwest gale off Barnegat, with the rigging and sails frozen as hard as an iron-bar; or a typhoon can each forty winks of sleep once in a while,—whether in a hammock or on an oak mercantile sofa,—but I never knew a man or fellow—he may manage to weather through it. But from the moment we first saw that Pirate till we saw the last of her, I never knew a lieutenant of the Scourge nor the commander of the Centipede once closed their eyes, unless—I won't say anticipate.

Piron reached over his hand and shook that of his friend Cleveland heartily.

"Very well, now! very well!". "He's the man to do it!" said Stewart and Burns to Stinson, nodding behind his chair approvingly.

"Gentlemen," resumed Hardy, as he shook the ashes level in his wine-glass, as if he wished to preserve them for a future cigar after his cheroot smoking, "I will not detain you much longer. Both vessels were making great speed, and long before sunset we could see the land of Cuba, right out for the land. At last it was reported, trending all around both bows, low and with a trembling haze over it, which was the tropical sun-up, and a multitude of rocky keys dead ahead. We were steering directly for the Gulf Stream, and I remember that little knew to any navigators save, perhaps, the Buccaneers of the Gulf of Columbia, and perhaps Pirates, the dangers of running us just such another dance as our pilot had a night or two before. However, we were agreed that the Pirate would not run in unless she knew her way, moreover, we got the starboard anchor off the bow and bent the cables to it, and had the spring-buoy ready, that if we had to be all ready to moor ship in case our pilot required us to do so. And likewise the cutters were hoisted out from the spar-deck davits, and boats which had once before paid a complimentary visit to some of the friends—supposing he would like to entertain us in person.

"The sun went down again in a fiery blaze, and with its last rays we could see from the main truck of the Pirate a swallow-tailed black flag, with a white skull and cross-bones in the field, fall down, and then it was hoisted out straight and clear, and then twisted itself around the thin mast never more to be released by hands or halliards! The last glimpse those pirates ever caught of the murderous symbol they had so often fought and sailed under; and it was the last we saw of it, for night and eyes ever looked upon who were sailing there in that half league of water, which, however, was widening bright and beaming, as clear as a bell, overhead, and that was all the light we cared for. The Pirate, I think, would have preferred no moon at all, with a cloudy sky and a bit of a rain squall, to pursue the intricate navigation through the Keys, if Heaven arranged the atmospheric scenery otherwise.

"'By the deep eight!' sung out the leadsman in the port chains, and the Pirate was hauled to the opposite side. 'Another cast, lads, quick!' 'And a half four!' 'Six fathoms, Sir!'

"'Ye've had your eyes on the sand, Cleveland,' said the Captain; but even as he spoke the man in the starboard chains sang out, 'Seven fathoms, Sir!' and while each instant we expected the ship to bring up all standing and the masts to go by the board, the leadsman's voice sung out, joyfully, 'No bottom with the line, Sir!'

"Well, we were safely through that bed of coral, doing, no doubt, some trifling damage to the tender shoots and branches as we flew through it, and were now in the open water, heaving and moaning on the sandy shores over the Keys, out into deep water again.

"For one hour more we beyond stood out a bluff rock, looking in the moonlight like a dozing lion with his nose stretched before him, ready to bound upon any who should approach his lair in the dense jungle of pines and tangled thickets which could be dimly like a bristling mane on ridge of his head.

"The Centipede was now but a short half mile ahead of us, with the deck alive with men, and manifestly ready for some desperate deviltment. On her after rail, too, stood a tall figure, in a red cap and blue jacket, with a cutlass in his right hand, and Tom Tropp's hundr'd an' sixty," rejoined the statistical host.

Dr. Mordaunt expressed the opinion that some things were better than weight.

"What?"

"Why, science and stimulus."

"Science is a good thing, I'll bow; but as for stimulus, the less of that you drink the better. Science is a man think he can whip all creation; but he can't do half so much as he can without it. Stimulus is a 'simulous' sham."

"I mean the stimulus of determination—the stimulus a man's brain puts into his muscles."

Mr. Carruthers shook his head dubiously. "Don't know any thin' about that; but you'd better look out for them boys. They's deep'rate fellers." Afterward Mr. C., happening to look up, noticed a certain something in Blagden's eye and about his mouth that made him think he might have underrated the prowess of the young master. The fact is, Blagden had forgotten his breakfast for the instant and was going through the fight in imagination.

The third week went by without any decided rupture. One thing was becoming clear, however. The milder methods were failing in their effect upon a certain portion of the school. While the majority were catching the spirit of self-respect, were living made better and self-governing, a few were left upon which these influences were quite powerless. They must be met with other measures.

It was now the fortieth week. In the middle of the forenoon, when the top of the bell had topped off the first movement of the first class in practical arithmetic, Bill Stokes sat doggedly in his seat, looking up under his eyebrows with a pair of eyes containing a large quantity of devil.

"Take your place in the order, William."

"I won't."

The master saw that this was the point of conflict between himself and two or three rather desperate and powerful characters. The master boys began to wink and nudge each other. The girls turned pale. The smaller scholars began to cry.

A wave of his hand seated the class which had risen to advance.

"Come forward, William."

The stout fellow came into the floor.

"Did you intend to disobey me?"

"Yes."

"Will you not be governed by the rules of the school?"

"Not by a darned sight." The other boys laughed at this specimen of brilliant insolence.

"There is the door, Sir."

"No, you don't. I'm goin' to pound you into a jelly fust;" and Bill Stokes turned up his sleeves about his brawny wrists.

The young master remembered where he was; and so turning to the big boys of the school he added, "I play for love first?"

"Fair play," said the chorus.

Thereupon Bill Stokes drew himself back and wheeled a heavy blow, which, being dodged by the master, only cut the air. The next moment he was flat on the floor. The contest was not very unequal,however; for the lazy boy was strong enough.

It is slightly difficult to carry one's self with perfect self-possession through a contest of this nature: for a boy's fighting up to the face is a powerful quickener of the will, adding not a little to the species of "stimulus" to which Blagden had referred in the morning. He may have studied the war too far. Perhaps he pursued his advantage, after having successfully conquered his rival's body, and, rising from his prostrate antagonist, he lifted the girl to her feet, and became calm again.

This contest settled the question of supremacy. The young master thought it best, however, to follow it up with the gentleness and sternness of rules. Hence, the next morning, he quietly announced that a new system was then established, and that the monarchy of a single violation would be a fer-ling upon the hand.

Two hours passed in great quietude.

"Buzz-z-z" from a corner of the room.

The master looked up. All was still.

"Who whispered?"

No answer.

The master became stern.

The whole class that whispered then will come forward and be punished."

Sweeping his eye across that portion of the school-room, he could not positively detect the culprit. A pale, half-sickly face looked paler than usual, but it could not be here. The master deliberated anxious, but it might be fear for a friend. One little girl began to cry; and one—the peacemaker of the previous day—sat and looked into his eyes with a very strange expression, but it couldn't be Nim; and the master felt a shaking at the heart at the possibility that upon him.

The poor sickly child laid her face upon the desk and wept.

The pupil who broke the rule will come forward and be punished," he repeated.

He was not sure that his own words now; for Miss, looking like any thing but a culprit—pale, but with a sort of radiance in her sweet face, rose to her seat, and walked down the floor.

Poor Mr. Blagden! When Bill Stokes stalked out into the floor on the previous day the master had half-relied upon the prospective battle. But here was Mira, the light and life of that village school — Mira! — unclasping the pale girl's arms from her little round waist, and coming easily down the aisle, the little pink-spotted lawn rising under her dimpled chin with the least perceptible heave, and her eyes fixed on the master with a look which went to his soul. Mira!

Mr. Blagden drew a deep breath, felt the blood forsaking his face, and rushing and eddying about his heart. He looked around the school-room. Every eye was upon her.

Mira held out her hand, and the drapery sleeve of the pink lawn fell away from an arm such as artists watch for. It was a little hand, white, light, velvety. The master held the tips of the paper fingers, and lifted the forkle. While he poised the instrument in the breathless hush the little hand touched once with the least possible nervousness. His eye forsook the hand and followed along the wrist, down the arm to the elbow. He now glanced at the little round waist, and then into the eye. It was a strange language for those eyes of his. The female name down from its cynic without touching the hand.

"GOME FORWARD AND BE WHIPPED!"

OLNEY, September 9, 1858.

"James Corruthers, Esq.:

"DEAR SIR,—I will take the situation you offer me on the terms you name. As you know, it will be a new experience in a public school; but I will do what I can.

Yours, &c.,

FRANK BLAGDEN."

THE letter would have gone to the long home of business-epistles many a month ago but for a circumstance which occurred in the course of the fourth week. An event having no bearing upon the letter, as such, but upon the engagement of which it was the cincture.

The school proved to be a turbulent one. The district formed part of a rough country—in Western Pennsylvania, where the Dutch population were being perpetuated in genuine Dutch vigor and grit and stolidity.

At first Mr. Blagden tried the milder methods. Carrying himself with composure and dignity, he overlooked every little trick it was possible to ignore, substituting remonstrance for correction, and trusting to his own equanimity, and the latter sense of duty in pupils, to bring about a gradual change in the temper of the school.

At the end of the second week he became conscious of rather a brief supply of patience. The fact is, the fullest reservoir will run dry at length, under nevercessing drainage.

"I think I shall have to take some of the big boys down a notch or two before long."

This was said at the breakfast table.

"You don't look much like doin' it," said the head of the family.

"Why not?"

"I should say you didn't weigh more'n a hundred and forty pounds. Stokes is hundred an' forty, and Tom Tropp's hundr'd an' sixty," rejoined the statistical host.

Dr. Mordaunt expressed the opinion that some things were better than weight.

"What?"

"Why, science and stimulus."

"Science is a good thing, I'll bow; but as for stimulus, the less of that you drink the better. Science is a man think he can whip all creation; but he can't do half so much as he can without it. Stimulus is a 'simulous' sham."

The master stepped to his desk, and tapped the bell. The books were put in their places. Another tap, and the pupils defiled from the room. The pale girl lingered by the desk, and while they were marching out, murmured through her sobs:

"It was me who whispered."

"You?"

"Yes, ma; and Mira didn't whisper a bit."

Blaglen sat at his desk when the school-room was empty and still, and wrote Mr. Carruthers another letter.

"DEAR SIR.—I resign my situation to-day.

"Yours truly, FRANK BLAGLEN."

And then he wrote another:

"Mira, my good and noble pupil, I am going away. I shall not trust any more any where. I shall cease to be one you by-and-by, if you will not forget your teacher while he is gone.

"FRANK BLAGLEN."

Mira did not forget him while he was gone, as he knew very well, when he came back, the moment he saw her face and felt the flutter of her little hand.

When he asked Mira to give him that little hand she was still a long, long time, but at last looked up with an arch smile and tears, and said:

"Won't you forgive it?"

THE PATEK WATCH.

In view of the fact that individuals are known to be preparing to impose upon the American public an inferior imitation of this

UNRIVALED LADIES' WATCH,

Messrs. Patek, Philippe & Co.,

of Geneva, Switzerland, the manufacturers of the Patek Watch, have recently appointed

Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., 550 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, their Agents in this City and State, to advise purchasers of this counterfeit. The spurious article is simply made to resemble the genuine movement, and bears engraved upon its cap a forged trade-mark, either Stark & Co., or Patek, Philippe & Co., Paris, or Alexandre Patek. The genuine is engraved with the name of PATEK, PHILIPPE & CO. ONLY. Messrs. TIFFANY & Co., and is invariably accompanied by a certificate signed by the members of the Geneva Government, this attempted imposition is but an unworthy copy in externals alone of the unrivaled watch from which it would seek to steal reputation; but as it is known that the parties to this fraud are even going the length of forging Mr. PATEK's own certificate and signature, the purchaser of a Patek Watch can only be sure of its genuineness by obtaining it of the authorized and sole agents, TIFFANY & Co.

Health of American Women.

The Graefenberg Company was organized under an Act of Legislature fifteen years ago, and has become one of the most widely known and firmly established medical institutions in the country, and in its reputation for skill, integrity, and confidence, it challenges comparison with any other medical organization in the world.

Some years ago the following testimony from high authority in the literary and religious community was received:

My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Graefenberg Company is such that I am prepared to express the opinion that their medicines are worthy of confidence.

ROBERT C. SANDS, M.D.,
Editor and Proprietor N. York Commercial Advertiser.

I hereby certify that I have examined a number of testimonials published to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they present a combination of genuineness, and are therefore entitled to the confidence of the public. HORACE GREELEY, M.D., of Hartford, Conn.

Since then, one of the leading Graefenberg medicines has been its

Empire Spring Water.

SUPERIOR TO CONGRESS SPRING WATER.

The Empire Water is bottled from the celebrated FAIRFIELD SPRING, SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y. This fountain is situated not far from the Congress Spring, and the superior qualities of the Empire Water, over the Congress Water, consists in its containing all the properties of that Water, in addition to a large amount of Iodine, which improves the combinations, and renders it more valuable as a remedy in Lung Affections, Fevers, and Irritation of the Kidneys and Bowels, for which the Congress Water is so extensively used. Hence it is not only acknowledged as the best medicinal, and most soothing in its effects, but the most delicious as a beverage, and for Dyspepsia and Constipation its equal is not to be found in any other mineral water.

The Empire water is put up at the Springs, in champagne bottles, in pint and quart bottles, with the corks all branded with the name of

Watson's Neuralgia King

Never Fails to Cure

Neuralgia and Rheumatism.

THIS

GREAT INTERNAL REMEDY

Is curing Thousands of cases where all other remedies have utterly failed. It is no mere "ANODYNE," relieving for the moment, but is a perfect SPECIFIC and CURE for those painful diseases. The vast number of Liniments, Embrocations, and External medicines, which act as stimulants of the surface only, are merely temporary in their effects and of doubtful virtue. The NEURALGIA KING reaches the source of all trouble, and effectually banishes the disease from the system. We advise one and all to give it a trial, and become satisfied of its wonderful power.

Read the astonishing cures of well-known citizens of Englis.

☞ ONE BOTTLE cured Mr. Elias Weed, Commission Merchant, of severe Neuralgia of the head and neck, after all other remedies failed.

☞ Mr. L. GROSVENOR, of Perry Street, was confined to the house, and entirely unable to attend to business, in new well from the use of Watson's Neuralgia King.

☞ THE NEURALGIA KING cured Mr. Joseph Conery, Sussex Street, of INFLAMMATORY RHEUMATISM of long standing. At the time of commencing its use he was confined to bed.

☞ JAMES VAN VALKENBURG, a well-known Engineer of this city, was cured of Rheumatism and Neuralgia in the wrist.

☞ INFLAMMATORY RHEUMATISM.—Mr. C. H. Field, 36 Cornelia Street, was cured after trying other remedies for years.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 187.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE LATE JEROME BONAPARTE.

"MISS PATTERSON'S" HUSBAND.

THE death of Prince Jerome Bonaparte, President of the French Senate, severs the last link between the first and the second French Empires; and we have, accordingly, placed his portrait on record in our columns.

At the time of his death he stood alone among "the veterans;" no one then living had seen, enjoyed, and suffered as much as he.

He was born the year after the peace with England, 1784, nearly seventy-six years ago; his native place was that of his brother, Ajaccio, in Corsica. When the family removed to France he was a baby; we hear of him first at a girls' school directed by Madame Campan; next at a military academy; then, when he was fifteen, as a midshipman on board a French man-of-war. His brother had commenced his autocratic career; under his auspices, had young Jerome possessed a fair share of ability, the world would have heard of him before he had attained his majority. Like the Prince of Wales, who commanded a British regiment at the age of sixteen, young Jerome was placed in command of a fine corvette at eighteen, and was bidden by his brother to "die or serve his country." Unhappily for his biographer, the young man had no inclination to do either the one or the other. He sailed to St. Domingo with the ill-fated General Leclerc, and then sailed back again, none the more famous for the voyage. He likewise sailed to the United States, and saved his ship from capture and himself from a long imprisonment by a judicious run into New York Bay. Sailoring, he said, was not his forte—and, so far as the event proved, he certainly was right.

He was more successful in the drawing-room. At Baltimore, just fifty-seven years ago, he met Miss Elizabeth Patterson, a lady who was universally conceded to be the belle of her day. She was beautiful, she was rich, she was highly accomplished, high-minded, and of distinguished family. The young Captain, like many others, fell in love with her: she was equally charmed by her admirer; and without waiting for the consent of any one save the bride's family, the young couple were married by the Bishop of Baltimore, a Carroll. We need not stop here to notice the rashness of the proceeding on the lady's part. Jerome was twenty years and nine days old—a minor, to all intents and purposes. He was, as all who knew him must have detected, a young man of feeble will, and not brilliant intellect. He belonged to a family second to none in the world. The lady, though beautiful and accomplished and good and rich and adorable in every way, was, after all, only a Patterson; and she married him without waiting for a line of consent from his mother or his all-powerful brother, the despot of France. These circumstances must be well weighed when we come to judge Napoleon's subsequent proceedings.

When the news of the marriage reached France, the Emperor simply pooh-poohed the affair. Young men will be young men, he said, in substance; that rascal Jerome is sowing his wild oats in America. As for marriage, the idea is a good joke. I intend, said he to his friends, to marry Jerome, some of these days, into a good old royal family. As for "the Patterson," we must pension her.

Needless to remark that these oracular intimations found their way across the ocean, and greatly disturbed the honey-moon of the child-couple. Jerome himself had been bred in wholesome terror of his willful brother; his young wife was frightened, and loving, and uneasy about the future. Why should Jerome, said she, go away to France? Why not stay here with us, and be happy—away from courts and wars and angry brothers?

Well would it have been for her—perhaps well for him too—had he done so. But the magnetic influence of the Imperial court could not be resisted by so weak a mortal as Jerome. In the midst of a long and delightful nuptial tour the order of recall reached him, and he obeyed. 'Twas the last of "Miss Patterson's" happiness.

Chased by British cruisers, ruled by anxiety about the future, the young couple made land at Lisbon in the spring of 1805. If Jerome had been a man of pluck he would have taken his pretty young wife with him to plead at his brother's feet for her rights as a wife. He was a coward; and he left her at Lisbon, under a plea of ill-health, and ported to Paris alone.

He had been of more consequence there since his marriage than he had ever been before. The Emperor had been heard to swear that "the Patterson" should never be one of his family. When Jerome arrived, hot and anxious, Napoleon laughed at him bitterly, notified him that his marriage had been annulled on the petition of his mother, and bade him make a decent disposal of "Miss Patterson." If Jerome had had any energy in him he would have resisted. As it was, he only whined feebly; cried, too, 'tis said, a good deal, when his fair wife, far gone in pregnancy, was absolutely refused permission to set her foot on shore at Amsterdam—the port to which she sailed from Lisbon. She went to England, poor girl, and there gave birth to her son; but the boy's father was lost to her forever.

The Emperor knew enough of men to judge his brother rightly. A few energetic measures were sure to end his boyish love. In March, 1805, express orders were given that no registrar in France should register "a pretended marriage" of Jerome Bonaparte with "a foreigner." In May following, this letter was written by Napoleon to the Pope:

"I have frequently spoken to your Holiness of a young brother, nineteen years of age, whom I sent in a frigate to America, and who, after a sojourn of a month, although a minor, married a Protestant, the daughter of a merchant of the United States. He has just returned. He is fully conscious of his fault. I have sent back to America Miss Patterson, who calls herself his wife. By our laws the marriage is null. A Spanish priest so far forgot his duties as to pronounce the benediction. I desire from your Holiness a bull annulling the marriage. I could easily have this marriage broken in Paris, since the Gallican Church pronounces such marriages null. But it appears better to me to have it done in Rome, on account of the example to sovereign Families marrying Protestants. It is important for Princes that there should not be a Protestant young woman in our royal room. It is dangerous that a minor and distinguished youth should be exposed to such seduction against the civil laws and all sorts of propriety."

The Pope, however, did not take the bait. He was about as weak as Jerome himself, but he saw an opportunity of thwarting his great oppressor, and he seized it. He declined to annul the marriage. It is not likely that the Emperor was greatly chagrined by the event, though it did not probably improve his opinion of the Pope. He quietly annulled the marriage by civil decree, and offered Jerome a fine embassy to Algiers in exchange for his wife. The many-pointed creature accepted the offer, and his beautiful Elizabeth became Miss Patterson once more, returning home to this country with her son.

THE LATE JEROME BONAPARTE, HUSBAND OF "MISS PATTERSON," OF BALTIMORE.

Historians have been fond of alluding to this transaction as an evidence of the selfishness and bad faith of the Emperor Napoleon. But there is another side to the question. It is using a mild term to say that the lady's friends acted unjustifiably in the matter. It was clearly their duty, in view of Jerome's age and rank and character, to have obtained Napoleon's consent before the celebration of the marriage. No careful father would allow his daughter to marry a foreigner and a minor without some evidence of the willingness of his parents. If any New York merchant suffered his daughter to marry the minor son of an English duke, without ascertaining how the duke felt on the subject, the public would not be surprised to hear that the boy's father had taken steps to have the marriage annulled. Unfortunately for Jerome's wife, there is evidence to show that her friends did not overlook the possible and probable contingency of the nullification of the marriage, but actually traded upon it. The marriage contract was drawn by Mr. Dallas, one of the ablest lawyers of his time, who was afterward Secretary of the Treasury, and father of our present minister to England. It contains the following clauses:

"Article 1. In case of any difficulty being raised relative to the validity of the said marriage, either in the State of Maryland or the French Republic, the said Jerome Bonaparte engages, at the request of the said Elizabeth Patterson and the said William Patterson, or either of them, to cause to be used every necessary exertion and diligence, and to confer on the said union all the character of a valid and perfect marriage according to the respective laws of the State of Maryland and of the French Republic.

"Article 4. That if the marriage should be annulled either on the demand of the said Jerome Bonaparte or that of any member of his family, the said Elizabeth Patterson shall have a right, in any case, to one-third of the real, personal, and mixed property of her future husband."

Both of these clauses, we are sorry to say, look to pecuniary results. The latter specially looks as if the former could only have given rise to an action against Jerome for money damages for non-fulfillment of contract. It is pleasant to see that the lady has never availed herself of the privilege.

No one could be more gracious than Napoleon when people got into a holy and unholy row. He made Jerome captain of a line-of-battle ship, put him in the way of capturing a few British frigates and thought, in the usual luck, he was obliged to run his ship ashore to prevent her being taken by the first English man-of-war she met. He rewarded his failure as though it had been a success. Jerome lost his wife; but he was made an Admiral, a Prince, and a General of Division in the army. Thus laden with incongruous honors and titles, the weak-headed youth was easily persuaded to assent to the nullification of his marriage, and to wed a German Princess, Frederica Catarina of Wurtemberg. The particular bribe he got for this condescension was the crown of Wurtemberg, which he assumed at the age of twenty-two, three weeks after his second marriage.

Jerome's public career was so uneventful that it may be dismissed in a very few words, and the reader's attention recalled to the more important details of his private life. As king, he was a bon vegan—a good fellow; played leap-frog in his court-room; laughed at his religion, and for years he welcomed the Jews to his capital. In 1812, he led a division of the Grand Army, and behaved so badly at Borodino that he was degraded from his brother. Next year, he ran away from his capital, and a few days afterward, he ran out of Germany altogether. A year after, he ran out of Paris. By-and-by, Napoleon escaped from Elba, and Jerome loomed up again, very respectable, but shamefully feeble, in the House of Peers; a few days more, and he was running away again—this time from Waterloo. Finally, he craved a testimonial of his father-in-law, whom he had previously dispossessed of his throne; the old man consented, provided Jerome would have no one near him who spoke French. The Germans, you see, had already acquired that touching affection for their Fatherländische Sprache which is one of their most amiable characteristics to-day.

For a time Jerome existed in this condition of dependence; but the Wurtembergers came to be too hot for him at last, and he run away once more—this time to Austria, where he lived some thirty years in peace. In 1848, the old man was permitted to France by his nephew, then President of the French Republic, and Louis Napoleon kissed him. He paraded him on all occasions and in all vestibules before the Parisians as "the last surviving brother of the Emperor;" he made him a Field-Marshal; he made him President of the Senate; he gave him "dotations" to enormous amounts; he presented him with the Palais Royal as a residence; he appointed him heir to the throne, failing direct issue. The old man bore all meekly, and did as he was bid; it must have been pleasant for him to exercise that he was, at last, of some use in this world.

Satisfied with Jerome, in the life of his mum, new arguments against female sagacity; for feeble and cowardly and inept as he was, he was beloved truly and honestly by two of the strongest women of his day. His first wife, "Miss Patterson," still lives at Baltimore, universally beloved and respected. Over half a century has elapsed since she parted forever from her husband: all three years she has lived alone, a graceful and noble lady, devoted to her son, her grandchildren, and her neighbors, and maintaining so high a social standard that, in Baltimore, it is she and not Jerome who is said to have made a mésalliance. Whatever may be said of the friends who suffered her, in tender giddiness, to contract an imprudent marriage, even the foulest scandal-monger has hushed his voice when the name of "Miss Elizabeth Patterson" has been mentioned.

Nor was Frederica of Wirtemberg an ordinary woman. Like her sister-in-law, Hortense, she was married to two natives of another race, to a man whom she hardly knew, and whose poor affections had already been given to another. Like her sister-in-law, she found herself bound by law to a husband who loved her husband, followed him in his exiles; accompanied him to the camp, guided him in his hour of trouble, and stood by him honorably and faithfully when her own kith and kin had no insult too keen or too brutal to insert upon him.

How few good and strong men have the good fortune to marry one woman as excellent as either of the two wives of this poor simpleton!

The race of Jerome Bonaparte survives in the persons of Captain Patterson, a West Pointer, now in the Revenue Service, and "Miss Bo-Bo Patterson:" Prince Napoleon, who succeeds his father as President of the French Senate, and the Princess Mathilde, late Duchess of Frederica of Wurtemberg.

Captain Patterson inherits his grandmother's vigor of character, and is a fine soldier. He has calmly endeavored to have the decree annulling his grandfather's marriage, and Miss Patterson cancelled. The present Emperor declines to reverse his uncle's decision.

Of "Jerome Napoleon" and Mathilde it is difficult to speak seriously. They are the common butts of the Parisian wits. Rumor accuses the former of being a coward and a fool; the latter enjoys a very dusky reputation. An industrious Jew-collector has gathered in a dozen or less than six hundred jokes against Prince Napoleon, all of which have been current in Parisian salons; and his sister has been equally victimized. For the last few many years up to 1858—Mathilde. In Jerome's last illness he was attended by Doctor Rayer.

The story runs as follows: "One day the Prince Napoleon is said to have rushed into the Princess's room to see his father; he was stopped in the ante-chamber by Dr. Rayer, who desired him to wait a little, as the patient was confused and wandering, and that it might be an indiscretion to see him in his present state of delirium. The Prince insisted; he was sure his father would recognize him, and therefore there could be no harm in admitting him. The Prince was obliged, when his father, turning his eyes to the door, exclaimed: 'Je suis, mon Jerome!' Then, turning to the doctor, recognized Mathilde. The same story is turned in another sense to suit the Princess Mathilde. The Princess insisted upon seeing her father when in this condition, and the doctor remonstrated as he did with the Prince Napoleon, that it was useless, as her father was incapable of recognizing her. The Princess, however, was admitted, and the doctor added that the only remark she let fall was that stood by his bed-side. 'Oh, oui,' he answered, 'c'est Mathilde la seule femme!' 'There,' said Rayer, 'I told you he was deranged.' So numerous are these jokes that the Bureau of the Ministry of the Royalty threatens to leave town till the excitement is over."

DECAY OF MUNICIPAL INDEPENDENCE.

We have noticed from time to time various measures which have been made by the Legislature at Albany to encroach upon the municipal rights of this city. Insignificant as each of these measures may appear separately, history proves that nothing is more fatal to liberty than the practice of which they are examples. France, we all know, has been enslaved simply through the destruction of her municipal franchises.

A fresh danger now menaces our municipality: this time it is not the Legislature at Albany but from the Mayor's office at New York.

Fernando Wood, elected Mayor of New York through the agency of the Police Force and the Republican party, has discovered that the power of "removal for cause" which the charter confers upon him, enables him to dictate at will to the Police Board, and to those not like or whom he can not control. All that he requires to exercise this power is the consent of a majority of the Police Board thereto: the courts ruling that the Mayor and Aldermen are the sole judges of what constitutes "cause for removal." He has thus removed the City Chamberlain and the Recorder of the Police Board: he would have removed the City Inspector had not that functionary at the last moment consented to do anything, and has thus gained the patronage of his office. So far as matters have gone, perhaps, little harm has been done. There are no Police Boards in this city to whose that the new Chamberlain and the other new officials will be less efficient than the old ones. But it needs very little foresight to perceive that the new removals of the present Police Board removals for cause gives the death-blow to our municipal liberties. For instance:

By law the Governor has the right of removing the Mayor of New York "for cause." This State is Republican; this city is Democratic. By and by we may, we probably shall have some violent rural politician in the Governor's chair. The Senate will be Republican. It may, it probably will occur to the Republican Governor and the Republican Senate that the enormous patronage and spoils of the city of New York would be a good thing for their party. They will remove at will the whole Democratic Mayor: "Mr. Mayor, be so kind as to appoint none but sound Republicans to office in your city." If the Democratic Mayor hesitates or declines, presto, he is removed "for cause," whereof, under the new reading of the law, the Governor and the Senate are judges without appeal; and thus the city passes under Albany domination. The result would be the same, of course, if the Mayor yielded to the Governor's demands. In any event, the new doctrine demolishes utterly and thoroughly municipal independence, and lays the corner-stone of a centralized despotism.

Mayor Wood's friends should stay his hand in time, or they may be the first victims of the guillotine he has invented.

WATERING-PLACES.

The city is being deserted. Houses with closed blinds and dusty doorsteps meet the eye in every turn in the upper wards. Less all the world and his wife have gone to Saratoga, and Trenton Falls, and Niagara. Moralists have discovered and citizens have declimed against the discomfort and the high charges of fashionable hotels; but the public is not much affected by the diatribes, and goes to its old haunts just as usual. A few prudent fathers, with more wit than cash, are sending their families to farm-houses in rural villages, where indeed need not dress, and little boys and girls may make dirt-pies without disgrace; where milk, and eggs, and bracing air abound, and fashionable society, and flirting, and Champagne are rare. But the mass of mankind is at the time-honored resorts.

Saratoga is as full of guests as ever. "Congress Hall" opens its hospitable doors to its old friends; the "Union" has been enlarged and renovated, and will doubtless be the place this season for visitors to Saratoga Springs. For those who wish to combine romantic scenery with rural leisure the Trenton Falls House, and the Intermontane at Niagara, invite patronage; at both cool breezes blow, and the ever-rushing roar of waters soothes the mind to serenity. Denizens of the interior will probably seek a summer residence on the sea-shore; for them the Mansion House at Long Branch has been contrived. Situate on the lip of the broad Atlantic, with nothing between it and Africa but a few infinitesimal sea-craft, this caravansarai is the best place we know of to give an idea of the vast, the unbounded, and gently heaving like a maiden's breast, or rolling fierce waves with impetuous onslaught upon the sandy beach. Finally, invalids will find gutta percha air, and the attendance at its various medical retreats—among which we may mention the Round Hill Water Cure at Northampton, Massachusetts—will deserving attention.

It will thus be seen that all tastes can be readily gratified by a judicious outlay of cash. Of course every body can not go to Corinth.

ARE OUR CADETS STARVED AT WEST POINT?

Of all our educational institutions the one of which our people are proudest is the West Point Academy, and justly prepared to concede the inferiority of most of our schools to those of Europe. Our colleges can not compare, we know, with Oxford, and Paris, and Gottingen; our great universities produce few first-class scholars; but it is an article of faith with our people to believe that nothing can surpass the West Point Academy. Nor does that faith rest on a doubtful basis. The course of study at West Point is agreeable to the soundest philosophical principles of the newest habits of the age. Boys are there taught the best things which they can learn; they are fitted to excel, not only in a military, but in any civil career, and while they are at West Point, filled with whole some knowledge, their bodies are strengthened and hardened by judicious exercises, and their tempers are brought under control by excessive bit discipline. So far as the mental, moral, and physical systems in vogue at West Point are concerned, there is absolutely no room for criticism, and very substantial ground for congratulation.

Of late, however, rumors have been gaining ground which is to the duty of the public and the Government to notice. It is reported, on authority worthy of prima-facie attention, that the food of the cadets is not what it ought to be. It is said that the beef, which forms the staple article of their dinners, consists of the poorest cuts; that the potatoes would be unsaleable in a market; that the fish is frequently, if not generally, stale and unwholesome; that the butter is rancid; and that the diet generally is not so generous and so nutritious as growing lads need, especially when they are working hard with body and mind. We commend this matter to the early attention.

No father would suffer his son to remain at a school where the food was reported to be unwholesome. Growing boys need the very best food. It is much worse evil of the first order if any private school as it is currently reported of the West Point diet, it would be decreed in a fortnight. The Government ought to be less careful of its children than individual fathers are of theirs?

It must be remembered that the hundred and odd cadets at West Point are the flower of our American youth, and the best hope of the country. West Pointers are the best educated men we have in civil life; it is on them that the country relies for guidance in the hour of danger. "If any young men should be cured for, it is they. And if it should prove that they are deprived of proper food in order to enrich contractors, what shame would devolve upon the Government and its officers, who stand in the light of parents to these boys!

The subject certainly deserves investigation. It is due to Colonel Delafield and the Board of Inspectors that the current rumors should be silenced, if they are false; it is due to the cadets and to the country that they should be verified, and the abuses corrected, if they are true.

OUR CIVILIZATION.

MARSHAL RYNDERS, standing upon the shore of Bedloe's Island, and gazing proudly upon the hundreds of boats and thousands of eager spectators who had come to see Hickey the pirate hanged; wiping from his forehead the perspiration which had accumulated during the pleasure-excursion with which he gracefully prefaced the drama of the day; elbowing his way between the prize-fighters and the Common Councilmen to take his last stare of the man he was about to hang—Marshal Rynders, we say, under these circumstances, with a touching delicacy worthy of the man and the office, turned to the spectators, and observed: "Gentlemen, the prisoner declines to address his fellow-citizens." And so Hicks died, the poor wretch, cursing with his last exclamation the eager cry from the boats, "Down in front there!" "Let's have a fair look at him!"

This Marshal Rynders, it should be stated for the benefit of country readers, is the chief executive officer of the United States in New York.

"THE METHODIST"

Is a new religious weekly in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It bears the names of REV. DR. CROOKS and M'CLINTOCK as proprietors and editors. Besides these a number of distinguished names are engaged as regular and occasional contributors. Under such auspices, it will doubtless be among the very best of religious weekly newspapers. It is gotten up by the enterprising liberality of a number of lay Methodists in and around New York, who think that the time has come when the religious press of the Church will do better under less ecclesiastical control. Doubtless the laity, and especially the vast conservative lay force of the Church, will see that their interests, as it deserves, a splendid success. It is published by MR. LEMUEL BANGS, 7 Beekman Street, New York, at $2 per annum.

THE LOUNGER.

THE SHIP.

He would not be a faithful Lounger who did not go to the foot of Hammond Street and see the Great Eastern. Japanese curiosities which may once again—even a Tycoon is not impossible—Henrica Boys grow on every soil—Princes of Wales are not likely to fall, and Fortunes. Rides from a penny common kind of Princes; but another ship of ships —another Great Eastern—will hardly ever float. She is disproportioned to the average size of customers, and to the depth of ocean avenues.

For the present she does not disappoint. Notwithstanding the vast excitement of expectation—notwithstanding the endless descriptions and the beautiful pictures, in which everybody could look like cock-boats by her side, and Iernias and Adrianas barely escape invisibility, the Great Eastern is a very big thing. Indeed the closer you look the more surprising is her size.

If you take a car in the shadow of St. Paul's after you have made an extensive inspection of Barnum's opposite, you will find it instantly filled, and after a moment, you will roll smoothly along, turning after a little while to the right; and then you are at Hammond Street. The journey is not very long, and is probably the best way to get over the car ride. Other cities smell offensively; but they have some kind of redeeming associations. Here there are none. You are in the dismally-built of every thing but a bad smell—at least in the region which you traverse to reach the Great Eastern.

There she lies, her great black bow beyond the high brick block-ho. Down the descending street you go toward the river, and there she is herself. Here it is high holiday. Here the incomparable soup for every purpose under the sun is sold. The superior lemonade at the price of which will be afforded if it is proved not to be superior—here the agile lad is found among thimble-rigs—here the celebrated Welsh giant, whose portrait reveals a gentleman nineteen feet high, of a benign and melancholy aspect—here the fat lady, the two-headed calf, the grizzly bears, the fresh oysters, cakes, hand organs, pop-corn, and "Black your boots, Sir!—all your other adventures that the simple visitor is perplexed. Might he not while away the summer upon this spot?

Still he is on one's push on. They walk along the huge bulk of the ship. They see that she lays her keel for her length along the space of three blocks. They think of Lucifer and "many a road," and then they have reached the ticket office; they pay her last is the Great Eastern, upon which there lines of a port-hole has on. But it is so vast that you can not fancy it a port-hole until you remember that it is the Great Eastern, upon which every thing becomes possible again, however large.

Passing through you emerge upon the third deck, and look around. You are in a section of the ship. At the sides there is what seems to be a rather thin shell of iron. You stand upon a rough deck, and there is another over you; but the space seems too spacious to be upon shipboard, and that impression will pass you throughout. There is nothing more to see in that place; for it is only the lateral decks of an iron ship, with nothing there. Ascending broad, rough steps in company with other people, who are arriving all the time, you reach the second deck, where you have the same impression and emotions as upon the third; and passing on and up more steps, and you stand upon the great deck of the ship, rising from the point of the bow to the wheels at the stern. This is covered by a rather low, heavy awning, and seems to you like a vast hall or pavilion. I confess my first feeling was, that nothing could persuade me to go to sea in such a thing. It seemed like embarking in the largest Lowell cotton factory. What an we could guide such a tremendous mass? Why should it not founder, "ruin, indigestate moles" (see the Latin Grammar) in the furious arms of the sea?

Upon this immense deck, dwindling down the perspective toward the bow, there were probably a thousand persons moving about. "There are forty feeling like one." They did not seem to be crowded as the ordinary company of a summer steamer to England; and I thought of the other four thousand swarming all through the other parts of the ship. I walked forward to the bows; and as I sauntered slowly along, passing some prominent man of Broadway, I could understand Eliot Warburton's joke about the passengers upon the Mediterranean steamer grouping their Continental costumes and hurrying off toward the bows, as if they feared not to arrive in time. The Great Eastern is only three or four times as long as the largest ships, but it seems twenty times larger—as if she differed in kind as well as in degree.

I stepped on the wheel-house, whence you overlook every thing, and then descended to the deck between the paddle-boxes, and entered over a railing, hooked down into an abyss of machinery. It is all brightly polished—massive, simple, strong; it is the brain of the machine that is honored it. Then down into the ladies' or chief saloon or cabin—which is not like a cabin at all, but like a saloon apartment in a palace, where there is many a serene hereditary German Grand-Duke of Schlossenshagen hanging who would be glad of as fine a lot in his serene hereditary residence as this saloon of the great ship. It is finished in Moresque, with mirrors, and lounges, and sofas. Upon them sit and recline from the deck those who come closely engaged in the sweetest maternal duty—some gravely turning over the leaves of a book of Alison and advertisements—some making a needful toilet before the mirrors—some tellined in the corners, and giving the weary hours thus passed by stare for stare. The saloon is so high, so light, so spacious, that you have no suggestion of the ship's size. The very grace of the whole is increased by a railing which runs round the sides, and over which you look down upon the lower deck, which is thus lighted more perfectly.

The state-rooms are entered across a little bridge which extends over this open space, and they are in nests of about six rooms. Some contain only two berths, some four, and some open into such other for parties of six. The berths are the old-fashioned sailors' which are good for holding the patient in; and I should think there was about the usual allowance of space to each patient—the girl over the old ships being in the height and light of the room. The rooms of four berths are very large and pleasant, and they are all furnished very amply. But the patient can easily spare the crimson and yellow satin damask bob-curtains when he is assured that a single cluster of rooms has its own bathing convenience, et cetera.

The chief saloon is the only really handsome or finished part of the ship. The main decks are spacious, and light, and plain; but there is a nearness about them which is not comfortable. I do not need a little more air in their arrangement before the proud lantsman could be really tempted to become a landsman, and spend upon the sea a night. In fact, while the English plainness is every where apparent, the equally celebrated British comfort is not to be found upon this vessel as yet. She is very shabby, although clean; and produces, in the housekeeping department, the impression of a second-class boat. The patient might well expect to find feather-beds in the bunks! But he would not. And he might take heart again in the steward's room. There I saw a whole quarter of Champagne lying down upon the ice in perfect order, as the British Lords knelt in long rows on turf at Waterloo. As the long row of sepulchers stood gazing at the fine sight—for the necks, shoulders and heads had a kind of ghostly effect at look—how ardently we wished the very rosy general in a white apron had given the stern word to his regiment, "Up, and at them!" "Oh yes!" said an enthusiast at my side, to whom I suggested this possibility; "there'd be no sham fight then, however; and no corpses might be!" And I looked to see if some one of the bottles had not had a private skirmish!

But we surely heard "Refreshments below, Sir," and turned sadly away to return to the upper air. There the same scene was enjoying about the deck, wide-eyed and happy, staring at each other, and occasionally looking at the ship. I made the circuit of the whole once, and happened my curiosity—for all the statistics and instruction are to be found in the Great Eastern Extra of Harper's Weekly—I descended the steps which conducted the visitor out. Here, upon the third deck, I found "the wife-hearers." A crib is inspected. You may have ice-cream, and pay fifteen cents for them. You may have lozenges at a shilling a box, and you have "all other comforts of home." And until they—we mean I—began to feel a little sea-sick, I had a very pleasant time. I talked with a boy, spoke to a lady, and had a chat with a gentleman. I was not bashful, and I was not afraid of the sea. I was only afraid of the ship.

Passing through you emerge upon the third deck, and look around. You are in a section of the ship. At the sides there is what seems to be a rather thin shell of iron. In fact, while the English plainness is every where apparent, the equally celebrated British comfort is not to be found upon this vessel as yet. She is very shabby, although clean; and produces, in the housekeeping department, the impression of a second-class boat. The patient might well expect to find feather-beds in the bunks! But he would not. And he might take heart again in the steward's room. There I saw a whole quarter of Champagne lying down upon the ice in perfect order, as the British Lords knelt in long rows on turf at Waterloo. As the long row of sepulchers stood gazing at the fine sight—for the necks, shoulders and heads had a kind of ghostly effect at look—how ardently we wished the very rosy general in a white apron had given the stern word to his regiment, "Up, and at them!" "Oh yes!" said an enthusiast at my side, to whom I suggested this possibility; "there'd be no sham fight then, however; and no corpses might be!" And I looked to see if some one of the bottles had not had a private skirmish!

But we surely heard "Refreshments below, Sir," and turned sadly away to return to the upper air. There the same scene was enjoying about the deck, wide-eyed and happy, staring at each other, and occasionally looking at the ship. I made the circuit of the whole once, and happened my curiosity—for all the statistics and instruction are to be found in the Great Eastern Extra of Harper's Weekly—I descended the steps which conducted the visitor out. Here, upon the third deck, I found "the wife-hearers." A crib is inspected. You may have ice-cream, and pay fifteen cents for them. You may have lozenges at a shilling a box, and you have "all other comforts of home." And until they—we mean I—began to feel a little sea-sick, I had a very pleasant time. I talked with a boy, spoke to a lady, and had a chat with a gentleman. I was not bashful, and I was not afraid of the sea. I was only afraid of the ship.

GOING TO CAMP.

GOING to the Seventh Regiment camp was like going to the Derby. From the point where the Clove Road joins the highway from Vanderbilt's landing to Fort Hamilton, the scene was advanced like the Homeric heroes in an obscuring cloud. Dust was never known before. Skirting the lovely New York public, hosts upon one of the most charming roads to be found any where, you look across the unfenced meadows, covered with groves and glades and single trees, to the sparkling bay with the ships coming and going. In fact, there is many a point upon Staten Island from which you may see the scenery of the Isle of Wight which Tennyson has put into "Maud." Galloping along the "Ocean Terrace," or descending to the plain, you shall see, plainly as the poet saw, "the liquid azure bloom of a crescent of sea." For one to be deserted by the dust, and to enter the trotops; and all upon the way to the camp, if you choose to take the prettiest road.

But as you approach the edge of the New Dorp plain you come into dust. And when you have left that, and passed the Patten House, and then turn along by the Moravian Church and Grove Lane, then you come into dust such as the road at Newport between the locusts never knew, nor even the driver to Barnum's. The afternoon before the camp broke up there was a wild whirl of carriages spinning down the road. The passages mate the track of the new Staten Island railroad, upon which the new locomotives have been shrieking with delight for two months past; and they were crowded. The trains dart across the plain, and you see them as you shirt the edge with baggage-cars full and each car crowded with people. Upon the road itself nearly a thousand passengers could not be carried, such was the throng at the station.

But this afternoon every carriage met at the crossing. Such a jam was never known upon the peaceful isle. The cars went on and the carriages pressed forward. There were coaches, barouches, buggies, light wagons, covered wagons, carryalls, gigs, rockaways, omnibuses, and every species of wagon, exporter carts, donkey carts—every kind of carriage except the coupé, wedged in and squeezed, and every style of conveyance, driving and driving, and shaking whips and reins, and shouting, laughing, joking, staring: some very solemn and dignified, with their eyes straight to the front, as we fancy, in high good-humor, and in dust so dense that the horses went in and out of it like a fog. The train had dumped out its load of men, and were flying, too, among the wheels and the horses, and the loud invitations of wagon drivers, jumping and running, and bawling to get in. The dust rose from behind the fences upon the roadside, and had worn a smooth path just inside the fences; and boys were up and laughed and swore, and disappeared in the dust as they rushed on.

Toward evening upon the crush and confusion of carriages was hopeless. Every driver tried to help matters by swearing at every other. They shook their fists at each other, and "Confound—bare! wiirr! You might as well swear at "Big Tom" when you are in the belfry where he is ringing. "Big Tom" is accustomed to swearing from a little. There is a general hurrah! Wild horses' heads snort and peer, but no horse can do any thing. The pressure is too great. Only Barry, Somebody tries to turn and wishes he hadn't, there is such a shy and sudden disappearance. Others start and forward all a little. Then every body stops as the bang of a cannon close at hand splits the air. Another, another, another. Firing in happening. For Heaven's sake, let's get on! And nobody budges an inch. A few desperate hop down and try which way they can get, and scramble, and amidst great laughter they clamber into the most convenient carriage. At length we have moved for that is a little room for a horse to get in the main entrance, guarded by the police, and we drive smoothly along under the trees separated by a fence from the dust.

The little canvas city is built upon the level grassy plain, and is the camp of instruction of one of the Richmond County Club, upon which the members drive their fast horses, and trundle the new style, for the purpose of which the camp is here try in vain to repel. The companies march out from the glittering white streets and fall into line. The sentries fall the crowd, which shuts in on them that a troop of horse is just about moving rapidly along the line. The crowd is incredulous and sits down in front upon the grass. By-and-by one horseman gallops along the edge of their toes and waves them back; but a small line, a handful of sentries, and it would need at least a hundred to keep the line, they give it up, and the good-humored crowd keeps quiet and sits still.

There a body of indistinguishable but, doubtless, greatly distinguished people, in black coats, marches into the centre of the ring, and the President the Mayor is there; Major-General Sandford is there; General Hall is there; Alderman Boole and Bagley are probably there. Hence the loud guns!

But now the band falls into place; the line wheels into rank; the sentries are withdrawn; and the big drum in the base roof wielding that presidents at all. Every movement, every position is most graceful. It is not to be denied. The regiment looks handsome, and the band plays delightfully. The evolutions are very fine, and the whole affair is very pleasant.

The music stops and they do evolutions. They run in and out. They do the exercise. Clap, clap! ring, ring! Three hundred muskets sound like one! Yes, the men move like an intelligent machine. They do it easily, but symmetrically. It is more like a French drill than a Prussian. And, by the way, citizens—not subject—That is the moral of the matter. It is all volunteer. Not a man is there who is not one of men like these! They would march from Gingenti to Capua in a week. And what they are, others are. "For instance, there is the Eighth Regiment, which will receive them to-morrow. And the Chicago Zouaves. And the Providence Light Infantry. And the Boston marching Rifle-Club; the Black Tip. The ten thousand people cheer and clap as they look on and think of these things. A confused small boy, intently watching the cavalry, asks if our friend of the big stick in the huge muff is Garibaldi. "No, my son! but look.

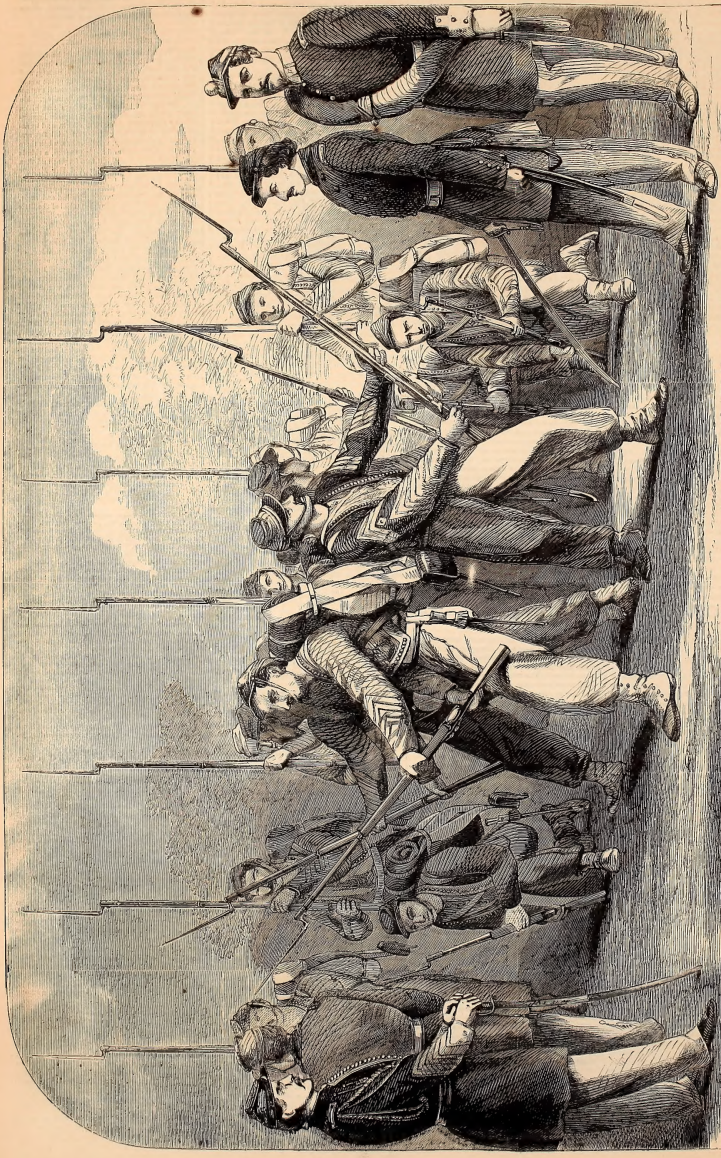
Another extravagant flourish of the drum-major, and the band bursts into music once more. The citizen soldiers file away. They march, they wheel, they disappear in the new-mown streets. Farewell, brave men! Farewell, brave youths! Farewell, brave boys! In your strong arms, our land and liberty are safe.

IN THE CARS.

MY DEAR LOOKER, observes, you travel by rail between Springfield, Massachusetts. Not the city, which is one of the prettiest in the land. Not the people, who are the most civil and lawyers of the passengers who there step into the cars. The Hog family are very apt to join the train at Springfield. It is a regular Station, you know; a gangleon of roads, and seats are always scarce. I knew this, but I still ventured to step out for a mouthful of air, leaving my coat, and cane, and an umbrella in my seat. I walked about and had my mouthful, and then returned.

A man of the strictly American species—that is, with shaven cheeks and chin covered with hair—was just lifting my coat and looking about for a place to hang it. I saw my umbrella leaning in a very young child in her arms stood by him. I hastened forward and said,

"How is that particular occasion for my coat?"



"Sir," said the man, with the surliest look and tone in the world. "No, but I'm going to have this seat."

"My dear, I confess I was frightfully angry. I was so very much excited that I did not dare to suffer myself to speak. Besides, I saw at the side of the Hog, the child looking young woman with the hot baby; the air was very close: the cars were very full and dusty; I foresaw a very serious scene if I spoke at all. I reached forward and took my umbrella, and, by the grace of God, held my tongue. I send this to you, hoping that it will allow me to it. If he does, he may understand that his selfish conduct, so outrageous that all the neighbors in the car were amazed, and its utter inhumanity and just punishment only because of his wife and child, and an extreme reluctance to a scene in public.

It is clear that nothing will correct the indecency of travelers in respect to the right of seats in cars except the outspoken public opinion of the passengers around.

NOVELTY IN ART.

"MR. LOOKER, ON," said we, and stick we might have something new in the way of subjects for painting? We are afflicted with so many sonnets and sunrises, portraits of ladies, landscapes, that, that one grows weary of exhibitions, and long for a change. Now if one of our artists would paint a picture—pure—overwhelming sense subject or tale in several pictures, how interesting it might be made! If he does, he may understand that why not tales without words? Or suppose he symbolized in this form some well-known book by a well-known author? Or suppose he painted his subject wholly himself for a series. Such humor, such pathos exquisitely combined, as we have in Dickens's novels, would stand forth well in the colors of a painter-artist, even as a page to be read. Suppose some one of this sort would. In fact, any novel at all well known to the reading mass would be received with enthusiasm. Why, then, we would be received with enthusiasm. Why, then, we would be received with enthusiasm. Why, then, we

THE CHICAGO ZOUAVES.

THE event of the week has been the arrival of the Chicago Zouaves—otherwise called United States Cadets—a fine military company hailing from Chicago, Illinois, and commanded by Colonel E. E. Ellsworth. They number 150 muskets; only 40 rank and file, however, came here. They have been reviewed here several times before enormous crowds, and all are agreed that no company in the First Division is as perfect in drill as they. The peculiarity of their Zouave tactics has attracted attention. They are bound by the rules of their organization not to drink spirituous liquors, and not to enter improper houses or barrooms on any pretext. They live very plainly, and generally sleep on bare floors with a blanket round them. The full-dress uniform of the Zouaves consists of a dark blue coat, with buff trimmings, and pantaloons and caps of blue, with similar trimmings to those on the coat. The Hill Zouave uniform worn on the occasion of their reception consists of loose scarlet trowsers, with a gold cord over a blue stripe, high gaiters and leggings; blue vest, with orange braid, and a peculiar pattern of moire antique facing; a jacket of blue, with red and orange trimmings, and bell buttons; and a jaunty little red cap, with black band and orange trimmings. In addition to the above, they also have fatigue uniforms and a chasseur uniform, consisting of red pants and blue coats, beautifully fringed and trimmed. Most of their manœuvres are derived from Hardee's tactics; but their drill, their evolutions, their dash and dare are peculiarly their own, and have aroused the enthusiasm of all our military men.

On the opposite page the reader will find a fine picture of the Zouaves. We subjoin a poem written for this paper:

THE ZOUAVES.

To bugle note and beat of drum
They come—the gallant Zouaves come!
With plume of blue and glints of red;
With airy, light, elastic tread;
With dashing, wild, insouciant air;
With figures wiry, lithe, and supple;
With pale rapiers with fiery grace;
With cloudless eye and boyish face,
And agile play of feet and hands,
Swift as a Bedouin of the sands.
They come—the gay Zouaves!

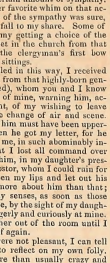
Lo! as they file along the green
I seem to see the Algerine!
The marble piles of building fade,
And the vast desert without shade
Save where the Oasis uplifts
Its green plumes mid the sandy drifts—
Stretches before my dazzled sight,
While rising o'er a distant height,
On lean, swift steeds, with slender spears,
The sallow Arab troop appears
To chase the French Zouaves!

They slope along the gold-red sand;
Their keen eyes sweep the sky and land;
The lean steeds snuff the desert wind;
The watchful vulture soars behind,
But neither answers upon the plain;
The keen eyes search the sands in vain.
Before, behind, and left and right,
A sandy ripple meets the sight.
Nor even these black-eyed devils know
That nigh yon sand-hill, lying low,
Are crouched the brave Zouaves!

Four puffs of smoke that seem to float
From out the earth—a crackling note—
Four saddles emptied in the troop—
Then wild and shrill the Arab whoop,
And sparpling uplifts the stirrupd foot,
And dashing of the coursers fleet,
And then—four puffs of smoke once more,
Four saddles emptied as before.
In vain the Hill they invoke,
With pertinacious puffs of smoke
Reply the brave Zouaves!

Out of the earth, like Genii, rise
The red Zouaves with flashing eyes,
And on the sallow Arab troop
Like hawks upon a bird they swoop.
With bayonet keen, with murderous gun,
With cuckoo, clattered, erratic run,
With sudden fall upon the sand,
With quick deploy, with gun in hand:
Thus like a meteor of the skies,
Vivid with red and blue, arise
The dauntless French Zouaves!

Over the tawny sands they fly,
Now seem they far, now seem they nigh.
They fire and fall, they fall and fire,
They scud on limbs of sinewy wire,
In each manœuvre seeming wild,
Each soldier's docile as a child;
And even the fleetest Arab finds
A foe that's fleeter than the winds.
Thus outmanœuvred and outaged,
He turns and hides his haughty head
Before the French Zouaves!



Your Zouave corps, O haughty France!
We looked on as a wild romance,
And many a one was heard to scoff
At Algiers and at Malakoff;
Nor did we Yankees credit quite
Their evolutions in the fight.
But now we're very sure what they
Have done can here be done to-day,
When thus before our sight deploys
The gallant corps from Illinois—
American Zouaves!

MRS. CATHICK'S STORY CONCLUDED.

"I MUST begin this fresh page, Mr. Hartright, by expressing my surprise at the interest which you appear to have felt in my late daughter—for it is quite unaccountable to me. If that interest makes you anxious for any particulars of her early life, I must refer you to Mrs. Clements, who knows more of the subject than I do. Pray understand that I do not profess to have been at all overfond of my late daughter. She was a worry and an encumbrance to me from first to last, with the additional disadvantage of being always weak in the head.

"There is no need to trouble you with many personal particulars relating to those past times. It will be enough to say that I observed the terms of the bargain on my side, and that I enjoyed my own comfortable income, in return, paid quarterly. Now and then I got away, and changed the scene for a short time; always making leave of my lord and master first, and generally getting it. He was not, as I have already told you, fool enough to drive me too hard; and he could reasonably rely on my looking my tongue, for my own sake, if not for his. One of my longest trips away from home was the trip I took to Limmeridge, to nurse a half-sister there, who was dying. She was reported to have saved money; and I thought it as well (in case any accident happened to stop my allowance) to look after my own interests in that direction. As things turned out, however, my pains were all thrown away; and I got nothing, because nothing was to be had.

"I had taken Anne to the north with me; having my whims and fancies occasionally about my child, and getting, at such times, jealous of Mrs. Clements's influence over her. I never liked Mrs. Clements. She was a poor, empty-headed, spiritless woman—what you call a born drudge—and I was, now and then, not averse to plaguing her by taking Anne away. Not knowing what else to do with my girl while I was nursing in Cumberland, I put her to school at Limmeridge. The lady of the manor, Mrs. Fairlie (a remarkably plain-looking woman, who had entrapped one of the handsomest men in England into marrying her), amused me wonderfully by taking a violent fancy to my girl. The consequence was, she learned nothing at school, and was petted and spoiled at Limmeridge House. Among other whimsical fancies which they taught her there, they put some nonsense into her head about always wearing white. Hating white and liking colors myself, I determined to take the nonsense out of her head as soon as we got home again.

"Strange to say, my daughter resolutely resisted me. When she had got a notion once fixed in her mind she was just like other half-witted people, as obstinate as a mule in keeping it. We quarreled finely; and Mrs. Clements, not liking to see it, I suppose, offered to take Anne away to live in London with her. I should have said Yes, if Mrs. Clements had not sided with my daughter about her dressing herself in white. But being determined she should not dress herself in white, and disliking Mrs. Clements more than ever for taking part against me, I said No, and meant No, and stuck to No. The consequence was, my daughter remained with me; and the consequence of that, in its turn, was the first serious quarrel that happened about the Secret.

"The circumstance took place long after the time I have just been writing of. I had been settled for years in the new town; and was steadily living down my bad character, and slowly gaining ground among the respectable inhabitants. I helped it forward greatly toward this object to have my daughter with me. Her harmlessness, and her fancy for dressing in white, excited a certain amount of sympathy. I left off opposing her favorite whim on that account, because some of the sympathy was sure, in course of time, to fall to my share. Some of it did fall. I date my getting a choice of the two best sittings to let in the church from that time; and I date the clergyman's bow from my getting the sittings.

"Well, being settled in this way, I received a letter one morning from that highly-born gentleman (now deceased), whom you and I know of, in answer to one of mine, warning him, according to agreement, of my wishing to leave the town, for a little change of air and scene. The ruffian only said that matters had been suspicious, I suppose, when he got my letter, for he wrote back, refusing me, in such abominably insolent language, that I lost all command over myself, and abused him, in my daughter's presence, as 'a low impostor, whom I could ruin for life, if I chose, by opening my lips and not his secret.' I said no more about him than that; being brought to my senses, as soon as those words had escaped me, by the sight of my daughter's face looking eagerly and curiously at mine. I instantly ordered her out of the room until I had composed myself again.

"My sensations were not pleasant, I can tell you, when I found, in effect on my own folly. Anne had been more than usually crazy and queer that year; and when I thought of the chance there might be of her repeating my words in the town, and mentioning his name in connection with them, if inquisitive people got hold of her, I was finely terrified at the possible consequences. My worst fears for myself, my worst dread of what he might do, led me no further than this. I was quite unprepared for what really did happen, only the next day.

"On that day, and without my warning to me to expect him, he came to the house.

"His first words, and the tone in which he spoke them, surly as it was, showed me plainly enough that he had repented already of his insolent answer to my application, and that he had come (if he could but temper) to try and set matters right again before it was too late. Seeing my daughter in the room with me, I had been afraid to let her out of my sight after what had happened the day before, he ordered her away. They left me of them like each other; and he vented the ill-temper on her which he was afraid to show to us.

"'Leave me alone,' said he, looking at her over his shoulder. She looked back over her shoulder, and waited as if she didn't care to go. 'Do you hear?' he roared out, when she reached the door. 'Speak to me civilly,' says she, getting red in the face. 'Turn the idiot out,' says he, looking my way. She had always the crazy notions of her own about her dignity; and that word, 'idiot,' upset her in a moment. Before I could interfere she stepped up to him in a fine passion. 'Beg my pardon, directly,' says she, 'or I'll make it the worse for you.' He knew your Secret? I can prin you for life, if I choose to open my lips.' My own words!—repeated exactly from what I had said the day before—repeated in his presence as if they had come from herself. He sat speechless, as white as the paper I am writing on, while I pushed her out of the room. When he recovered himself—

"'No! I am too respectable a woman to mention what he said when he recovered himself. My pen is the pen of a member of the rector's congregation, and a subscriber to the 'Wednesday Lectures on Justification by Faith'—how can you expect me to employ it in writing bad language? I shall write for myself, the raging, swearing frenzy of the lowest ruffian in England; and let us get on together in this way, or else be to the way in which it all ended.

"It ended, as you probably guess by this time, in his insisting on securing his own safety by shutting her up. I tried to set things right. I told him that she had merely repeated, like a parrot, the words she had heard me say, and that she knew no particulars whatever, because I had mentioned none. I explained that she had affected, out of crazy spite against him, to know what she really did not know; that she only wanted to threaten him and exasperate him for speaking to her as he had just spoken, and that my unlucky words gave her just the chance of doing mischief of which she was in search. I referred him to other queer ways of hers, and to his own experience of the vagaries of half-witted people—it was all to no purpose—he would not believe me on my oath. He was absolutely certain I had betrayed the whole Secret. In short, he would hear of nothing but shutting her up.

"Under these circumstances I did my duty as a mother. 'No jumper-Asylum,' I said; 'I won't have her put in a jumper Asylum. A Private Establishment, if you please. I have my feelings, as a mother, and my character to preserve in the town; and I will submit to nothing but a Private Establishment, of the sort which my genteel neighbors would choose for afflicted relatives of their own.' Those were my words. In gratifying to me to reflect that I did my duty. Though never overfond of my late daughter, I had a proper pride about her. No jumper stain—thanks to my firmness and resolution—ever rested on my child.

"Having carried my point (which I did the more easily in consequence of the facilities offered by private Asylums), I could not refuse to admit that there were certain advantages gained by shutting her up. In the first place, she was taken excellent care of—being treated (as I took care to mention in the town) on the footing of a Lady. In the second place, she was kept away from Welmingham, where she might have given people suspecting and inquiring by repeating my own incautious words.

"The only drawback of putting her under restraint was a very slight one. We merely turned her empty boast about knowing the Secret into a fixed delusion. Having first spoken in sheer crazy spitefulness against the man who had offended her, she was cunning enough to see that she had seriously frightened him, and sharp enough afterward to discover that he was concerned in shutting her up. The consequence was she flamed out into a perfect frenzy of passion against him, going to the Asylum; and the first words she said to the nurses, after they had secured her, were, that she was put in confinement for knowing his secret, and that she meant to open her lips and ruin him when the right time came.

"She may have said the same thing to you when you thoughtlessly assisted her escape. She certainly said it (as I heard last summer) to the unfortunate woman who married our sweet-tempered, nameless gentleman, lately deceased. If either you, or that unlucky lady, had questioned my daughter closely, and had insisted on her explaining what she really knew, you would have found her lose all her self-importance suddenly, and get vacant and restless and confused; you would have discovered that I am writing nothing here but the plain truth. She knew that there was a Secret—she knew who was concerned with it—she knew who would suffer by its being known—and beyond that, whatever airs of importance she may have given herself, whatever crazy boasting she may have indulged in with strangers, she never to her dying day knew more.

"Have I satisfied your curiosity? I have taken pains enough to satisfy it, at any rate. There is really nothing else I have to tell you about myself or my daughter. My worst responsibilities, so far as she was concerned, were all over when she was secured in the Asylum. I had a form of letter relating to the circumstances under which she was placed, ready for me to write, in answer to one Miss Halcombe, who was curious in the matter, and who must have heard plenty of lies about me from a certain tongue well accustomed to the telling of the same. And I did what I could afterward to trace my runaway daughter, and prevent her from doing mischief, by making inquiries myself in the neighborhood where she was falsely reported to have been seen. But these are trifles, of little or no interest to you after what you have heard already.

"So far, I have written in the friendliest possible spirit. But I can not close this letter without adding a word here of serious remonstrance and reproof, addressed to yourself. In the course of your personal interview with me, you audaciously referred to my late daughter's patronage on the father's side, as if that privilege was a matter of doubt. This was highly improper, and very ungentlemanlike on your part! If we see each other again, remember, if you please, that I will allow no liberties to be taken with my reputation, and that the moral atmosphere of Washington is by no means the expression of my friend the rector's) must not be tainted by loose conversation of any kind. If you allow yourself to doubt that my daughter was Anne's father, you personally insult me in the grossest manner. If you have any doubt, you will continue to find, on unhallowed occasion by on this subject, I recommend you, in your own interests, to shun it as if it were an adder. On this side of the grave, Mr. Hartright, whatever may happen on the other, that curiosity will never be gratified.

"Perhaps, after what I have just said, you will see the necessity of writing me an apology. Do so; and I will willingly receive it. Let me, afterward, if your wishes point to a second interview with me, go a step farther, and receive you. My engagements only enable me to invite you to tea—not that they are at all altered for the worse by what has happened. I have always liked, as I think I told you, well within my income; and I have saved enough, in the last twenty years, to make no quite contemptible for the rest of my life. It is not my intention to leave Wellingham. There are one or two little advantages which I have still to secure in the town. The clergyman bows to me, as you saw. He is married; and his wife is not quite so civil. I propose to join the Dorcas Society, and I mean to make the clergyman's wife bow to me next.

"If you favor me with your company, pray understand that the conversation must be entirely on general subjects. Any attempted reference to the latter will be quite useless—I am determined not to acknowledge having written it. The evidences have been destroyed. I do not affect the information I here communicate, in consideration of the special indulgence which you have received at my hands. One hour for tea is half past five, and my buttered toast waits for nobody."

XI.

My first impulse, after reading this extraordinary letter, was to destroy it. The hardened, shameless depravity of the whole composition, from beginning to end—the atrocious audacity of mind which persistently associated me with a calamity for which I was in no sense answerable, and with a death which I had risked my own life in trying to avert—so disgusted me, that I was on the point of tearing the letter, when a consideration suggested itself, which warned me to wait a little before I destroyed it.

This consideration was entirely unconnected with Sir Percival. The information communicated by me, so far as it concerned him, was little more than confirm the conclusions at which I had already arrived. He had committed high crime, as I had supposed, and I have committed it; and the absence of all reference, on his father's part, to the dreadful register at Knowlesbury, strengthened my previous conviction that the existence of the book, and the value of detection which it offered, must have been necessarily unknown to Sir Percival. My interest in the question of the forgery was now at an end; and my only object in keeping the letter was to make it of some future service in clearing up the last mystery that still continued to baffle me—the parentage of Anne Catherick, on the father's side. There were one or two sentences dropped in her mother's memorandum, which it might be useful to refer to again, when matters of more immediate importance allowed us leisure to look for the missing evidence. I did not despair of still finding that evidence; and I had lost none of my sanguine confidence, for I had not a doubt of my interest in tracing the father of the poor creature who now lay at rest in Mrs. Fairlie's grave.

Accordingly, I sealed up the letter and put it away carefully in my pocket-book, to be referred to at a future time to the same cause.

The next day was my last in Hampshire. When I had appeared again before the magistrate at Knowlesbury, and when I had attended at the adjourned inquest, I should be free to return to London by the afternoon or the evening train.

My first errand in the morning was, as usual, to the post-office. The letter from Marian was there; but I thought, when it was handed to me, that it felt unusually light. I unfolded and opened the envelope. There was nothing inside but a small strip of paper folded in two. The few blank, inevitably-worthless lines which were traced on it contained these words:

"Come back as soon as you can. I have been obliged to move. Come to Gower's Walk, Pulham (number five). I will be on the look-out for you. Don't be alarmed about me; we are both safe and well. But come back.—MARIAN."

The news which those lines contained—news which I instantly associated with some attempted treachery on the part of Count Fosco—fairly overwhelmed me. I stood breathless, with the paper crumpled up in my hand. What had happened? What subtle wickedness had the Count practised during my absence? Assuming that my letter to Marian must have miscarried, and that I should get back to them—some new disaster might have happened already of which I was ignorant. And have, miles away from them, here I must remain—held doubly bound, at the disposal of the law!

I hardly know to what forgetfulness of my obligations anxiety and alarm might not have tempted me, but for the quieting influence of my faith in Marian. Nothing ever moved me, when I began to recover myself a little, but the remembrance of her energy, fidelity, and admirable vigilance in my interests. My absolute reliance on her was the one earthly consideration which helped me to restrain myself, and gave me courage to wait. The inquest was the first of the impediments in the way of my freedom of action. I attended it at the appointed hour; the legal formalities were gone through once in the room, but, as it turned out, not calling on me to produce my evidence. The business delay was a hard trial, although I did my best to quiet my impatience by following, the course of the proceedings which I was not called.

The London solicitor of the deceased (Mr. Merriman) was among the persons present. But he was quite unable to throw any light on the inquiry. He could only say that he was inexpressibly shocked and astonished, and that he could depend on the character of the servants and circumstances of the case. At intervals during the adjourned investigation, he suggested questions which the jury put to the witness. But all to no results. After a patient inquiry, which lasted nearly three hours, and which exhausted every available source of information, the jury announced the customary verdict in cases of sudden death by accident. The coroner drew up the formal decision a statement that there had been no evidence to show how the keys had been abstracted, but that the jury considered that what the purpose was for which the deceased had entered the vestry. This act closed the proceedings. The body was delivered to the clergyman was left to provide for the necessities of the interment; and the witnesses were free to retire.

Resolved not to lose a minute in getting to Knowlesbury, I paid my bill at the hotel, and hired a fly to take me to the station. The gentleman who heard me give the order, and who saw that I was going alone, was the person who lived in the neighborhood of Knowlesbury, and asked if I would have any objection to his getting home by part of the road with me. I accepted his proposal as a matter of course.

Our conversation during the drive was naturally occupied by the one subject of interest of local interest. My new acquaintance had some knowledge of the late Sir Percival's solicitor; and he had the means of obtaining almost any over the county that his solicitor could only obtain as a matter of necessity and professional duty. He had died without leaving a will, and he had no personal property to bequeath, even if he had made away with the whole fortune which he had derived from his wife having been swallowed up by his creditors. The estate to the next heir (succeeding her left no issue) was a son of sir Felix Glyde's first cousin —an officer in command of an East Indiaman. He would step into unexpectedly handsome and unencumbered; but the property would recover with time, and, if the captain" was careful, he might still handle a good rent, before he died.

Absorbed as I was in the one idea of getting to London, this information (which events proved to be perfectly correct) had an interest of its own to interest my attention. It certainly justified me in keeping secret my discovery of Sir Percival's fraud. The heir whose rights he had usurped was the last person to profit by the estate. The income from it, for the last three-and-twenty years, which should properly have been his, and which the law had since squandered to the last farthing, was gone beyond recall. If I spoke, my speaking would confer no advantage on one. If I kept the secret, my silence concealed the character of the man who had cheated the dead and ruined the living. For her sake, I wished to conceal it—for her sake, still, I tell this story under feigned names.

I parted with my chance companion at Knowlesbury, and went at once to the townhall. As I had anticipated, no one was present to prevent me from searching the coroner's formalities were observed, and I was discharged. On leaving the court, a letter from Mr. Dawson was put into my hand. It informed me that he was absent on professional duty, and it reiterated the offer I had already received from him of any assistance which I might require at his hands. I wrote back, warmly acknowledging my obligations for his kindness, and apologizing for not expressing my thanks personally, in consequence of my immediate recall, on pressing business, to town.

Half an hour later I was speeding back to London by the express train.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

It is generally known, we believe, that the ladies have taken up the much vexed question of the completion of the Washington Monument, and have organized a "Ladies' Washington National Monument Society," for the purpose of collecting the funds required for the purpose. The President of the Society is Mrs. Finlay M. King, of Port Byron, New York; the Secretary, Mrs. Anna W. Cosby, of Washington. At a Convention held at Chicago last September the work was fairly set on foot, and the ladies referred to look hopefully forward to the future. The following extract from an address by Mrs. King, which, together with the Constitution, was adopted at Chicago, will explain the aims and method of the Society:

"The expense of the obelisk was originally estimated at $250,000, and the population was over-taxed to accomplish and yet the base, and one hundred and seventy feet of the obelisk, have been erected at an expense of but $230,000. Hence the sum of $21,000 to be raised, in order to complete the Monument. It is not at all certain that these estimates are correct; yet, for the want of estimates upon which entire reliance may be placed, we think, for the present, make them the base of our calculations; and I think, with entire confidence in the ability, and generosity of the American people, the sole portion of American society which is responsible for the Washington National Monument Society,' we may hand over to the contractors the sum of $21,000 of this sum, trusting upon ourselves the labor of raising the balance, $200,000.

"The plan for the organization of the Society, which I submit herewith, is in the form of a Constitution for the Ladies' Washington National Monument Society. It will be perceived, on examination, that I constitute the wife of the Master of every Masonic lodge in the United States a Vice-President; and where no lodge exists, it authorizes the appointment of an agent by the County Treasurer, which latter office is appointed by the Vice-President of the State, District, or Territory in which she may reside. The only exception to the principle of local appointments to office is that of the National Treasurer, and this exception is made only because it is deemed by me to be a business necessity to offer to exercise the legal authority vested in him by the charter of the Washington National Monument Society, granted by Congress.

"I have not deemed it necessary to require any further security of the officers of the Society for the faithful discharge of their duties than that afforded in the general good character of the women of America, which all will be vigilant to observe.

"The approach and obliquity of the whole nation, which would follow the completion of the work, must prevent any attempt at dishonesty on the part of the ladies.

"The address of the Chicago Press will have only fidelity to live up to the Constitution in order that the whole system shall be carried into operation, the requisite amount for the work and the Monument completed.

"I commend the project submitted herewith to the favorable consideration of the patriotic assembled at Chicago, and respectfully suggest such revision and amendment of the plan as their wisdom may dictate (for I do not claim it to be perfect); and I ask that the Society may be organized at once, in order that we may proceed to the work this undertaken.

"It is also respectfully suggested that the officers of the society should not feel themselves restricted, in the collection of funds, to the single mode pointed out by the Constitution, but that they have their Sewing Circles, Fairs, and other contributions-boxes in countenances at the ailing of courts, at the polls of popular elections, and upon all other days when opportunity may present itself. Let the people be appealed to as a matter of course.

"Let the ladies of the Union, then, take hold of this work in earnest, and the whole of the public subject of local interest. My new acquaintance had some knowledge of the late Sir Percival's solicitor; and he had the means of obtaining almost any over the county that his solicitor could only obtain as a matter of necessity and professional duty. THE POLICEMAN'S MISTAKE.

SIR.—" Lost Item of Summer."

'Twas the last hour of daylight—
The twilight had come—
When a weary policeman
Was walking at home.
But he still lingered kindly
On Broadway's wide pave,
For his aid to the ladies
He cheerfully gave.

'Twas the last hour of daylight—
Night's shadows were nigh—
When close at his elbow
He heard a soft sigh.
At his side stood a lady,
Young, graceful, and small,
In the tip-top of fashion—
Hoops, flounces, and all.

Only one thing displeased him
(Just like all the men!)—
A thick veil the lady's bonnet
Was fastened just then.
That her fair face was hidden,
Provoking it was!
But he whirled and cried, "Dear madam,
Are you wishing to cross?"

And she bowed, but was silent,
As round her he threw
His brave arm to protect her,
And on they went through Policeman grew pale!
Then out spoke the lady
And—oh! oh! consternation!
"Daw, now! lem me go!
Golly! nassa perlease, you
Stop a-hoggin' me so!"

'Twas a capital tableau,
Rich, racy, and rare!
How he stood, blank—confounded—
His eyes all a-stare,
Thus to find he'd been hugging
A darkey—oh yes!
How he started and put, then,
I leave you to guess.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

The Herald says: "Recent advices received by the State Department from Europe convey the intelligence that England and France have determined to intervene in Mexico, and enforce the belligerent parties there to establish an armistice for twelve months, or else a convention of popular delegates to arrange the questions at issue between the Church and the State. We, however, think Mr. Buchanan or no Mexico, will go out in a short time from England with full instructions on the subject."

"Strong representations have been made to our Government by the English and French Cabinets, in relation to a note in the Anglo-French policy for the arrangement of Mexican affairs, which seems to be antagonistic to these entangling complications with other governments, and that it proved fatal in the case of the treaty others and such doubtful ones, that Mr. Buchanan will probably refer the matter to the next Congress. It has passed in our relations with that republic. The result of the Presidential election by Congress and Senate are very doubtful, and may lead to complications and difficulties which will require more than thousand miles distant from the scene of action."

A SPEECH BY SENATOR DOUGLAS.

Senator Douglas addressed the people of Boston last week; among other things he said:

"The liberties of this country can now put in peril by sectional parties, appealing to sectional passion, sectional prejudice, and sectional agitation, which are the bane and harmony of the whole country. [Voices—'That's so.'] On the one hand, you find a great Northern sectional party appealing to the North against the South. [Voices—'That's so.' Another voice—'Down.'] On the other hand, you find a sectional party Southward, appealing to the South against the North. [Voices—'That's so.'] The Republican party demand possession of the Federal Government, on the ground that they have now acquired the prohibition of slavery where the people want it. [Voices—'That's so.' 'That's right.' 'Down.' 'That's right.'] The Southern sectional party demand possession of the Federal Government on the ground that the power of the government may be wielded for the defense of slavery where the people want it. [Voices—'That's so.' 'That's right.'] Whenever you see your representatives why they did not support the Crittenden resolutions, and support the expenses of the Government without borrowing twenty millions of dollars a year. They did not pay bad and time. [Laughter.] The whole time was occupied in the discussion of slavery, and there was no time to raise money to pay your honest debts. ['Good,' 'Good,' and 'Down.'] Whenever you asked your representatives why it was that the Pacific Railroad had not been made, you were told that slavery was in the way, whenever the slavery question absorbed the entire session of Congress. Whenever you ask your representatives why it is that the army pass has not been reformed and carried on with vigor and economy, you find that they are kept back by the old war for want of time. [Laughter.] When you ask why it is that you have to contribute such vast sums for Pacific, and no steam lines, you are told that the slavery question occupied the whole session. My friends, you have lost for want of time. [Renewed laughter.] Thus you find all the great measures which affect the commercial interests, the shipping interests, the manufacturing interests, and the agricultural interests, have been kept for want of time. [Laughter and applause, and cries of 'Good.'] Gentlemen, there never will be time to perform the duties for which the Government was made except by the restoration of harmony between the Federal Government and popular sovereignty in the States and Territories, as not practiced by the Democratic party. It was affirmed in the Compromise Measures of 1850; it was affirmed in the Kansas platform of 1856; and well as in that of the Democratic; it was affirmed by all national men in these days, and should be affirmed by all national, conservative, Union-loving men in the present day. [Loud applause.] My friends, there is nothing to you my profound acknowledgments for the kindness which has accorded to me here to-night, and the respectful attention with which this vast assemblage has listened to my observations. I thank you for it. [Cries of 'Go on!'] and again removing to you my thanks, I beg to take my leave, bidding you a kind farewell." [Loud and continued cheering.]

THE BRECKINRIDGE MEETING.

A large meeting took place on 16th in this city, in the Cooper Institute, by that portion of the National Democracy that favors the election of Breckinridge and Lane. The in-door assemblage was presided over by Mr. John H. Brower, and the meeting was addressed by him, by the Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson, Captain Mackintosh, and Mr. A. R. Wood. An out-door meeting was presided over by Mr. C. E. Stewart, and was addressed by Mr. Paul R. Brown, Mr. Levi Smith, John Van Buren, Isaac Lawrence, and Mr. Lowry. Letters were received from President Buchanan, Governor Stevens, of Washington Territory, Mr. Charles O'Conor, and other distinguished Democrats.

THE BRECKINRIDGE AND LANE CAMPAIGN.

The following is the address of the Executive Committee:

"The Constitution and the equality of the States, which are the symbols of everlasting Union."

For Secretary,
JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE,
Of Kentucky.

For Vice-President,
JOSEPH LANE,
Of Oregon.

NEW YORK, July 18, 1860.

DEAR SIR.—It has become necessary to organize the Democratic party in this State, upon the platform adopted by the Baltimore National Democratic Convention held at the Maryland Institute, Baltimore, on the 23d day of June last; and for that purpose a State convention should be held at the earliest practicable moment.

Please forward to me, as soon as you can procure, in each Assembly district in your county, known friends to Breckinridge and Lane, as delegates, with the names in a call for a State Convention to nominate an electoral ticket, and candidates for State officers for the coming election. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FERDINANDO WOOD,
Member of the National Democratic Committee for the State of New York.

PROSPECTS OF THE MORMONS.

The Overland says": "A pleasant chat with Captain Walter M. Gibson, just returned from a winter's sojourn with the Latter-day Saints at Salt Lake, has supplied us with some additional items of interest respecting that singular people and their fortunes.

"The oft-uttered story of the Mormons wishing or consenting to sell out their landed possessions in Utah, is a baseless fabrication. They like that country better and better; they are vanquishing the difficulties and impediments incidental to pioneer adventure, and are fast surrounding themselves (at least the magnates etc) with the comforts of civilized life. Of cattle and grain they have good store; sheep are multiplying; flouring and woolen factories are beginning to turn out fabrics; exploring precision clay has been discovered among them, and emigrants from the English potteries will soon be contributing it into stylish and serviceable wares."

"Some new railways have been recently opened to settlement—namely, south and east of the Great Lakes. These are greatly liked. They of course lie higher than the Lake Valley, and have a sharper altitude; but their lines are more wood, more water, better grass, and other advantages. They are rapidly filling with settlers.

"The rumor of a proposed sale per tender of relief of their present pensioners to the Federal Government had probably just this foundation. There are many reserves to the folks of the Salish—one living in India, Utah, Australia, and the more remote parts of the Pacific and Indian Oceans. These it is not considered to gather to the Lake Valley, as they enjoy other advantages. But a plan of refuge shall be found or made for them. This will probably be found on New Caledonia, or on the islands of the South Seas. We presume Captain Gibson—whom they have found out—will advertise it. Indian Ocean are well known—has been conferring with the Apostles and reference to such localities is in his mind or may not be. We believe it receives full."

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

On Monday afternoon, July 30, the Great Eastern will go to Cork with the new hundred and fifty passengers on board, and a few thousand ton-dollar passengers; and from an 8th to 14th days to her Philadelphia visit, thousands take a new crowd of Philadelphian on board, steam down to Delaware Bay, exchange passengers once more, and return to New York on Wednesday. After that date she will be anchored in the stream, and no more visitors will be received on board till she sails for England on the 1st of August. On Wednesday, 15th, attended by the Zouaves and the fine weather, nearly 3000 people paid their half-dollars to inspect her internal arrangements. On her way home she will touch at Halifax, to land the Prince of Wales, and we desire to be the bore to use the ceremonies attendant upon the reception of the heir to the British throne.

THE WALTON MURDER.

Charles Jeffrey, the son of Mrs. Walton, has been charged by the coroner's jury with the murder of his mother. Mr. Walton. When the verdict was brought in the following colloquy took place:

THE CORONER (to the prisoner). "You are at liberty to answer or not as you please. I put it to you, Jeffrey, is your name?"

The prisoner, in a calm and measured tone, free from the least agitation or excitement, responded: "Charles Jeffrey."

THE CORONER. "How old are you?"

THE JURY. "Twenty-three years of age."

THE CORONER. "Where were you born?"

THE JURY. "City of Washington, District of Columbia."

Q. "Where do you live?"

A. "No. 27 New York Avenue, Jersey."

Q. "What is your occupation?"

A. "Grocer."

Q. "Have you any thing to say, and if so, what, in relation to the charge now alleged against you?"

JEFFERS. "I am entirely innocent of the charge, and I am satisfied that I could to obtain my witnesses for the unbiased consideration of the Coroner and the City county. Therefore, I am free, and before this jurisdiction, I have nothing further to say."

[The prisoner was then affixed his name to the statement just made.]

THE CORONER (to Officer Jeffrey). "Where, you are charged by the jury. The officers will take charge of the prisoner, Charles Jeffers, and take him to the Tombs."

He was removed in custody.

FREDERIC HOFFMAN COMMITTED.

The examination of Frederic Hoffman, the alleged defaulting keeper of the Pacific Mail steamship company, had before Justice Connolly, at the Jefferson Market Police Court, was concluded on Friday, when the prisoner was committed to await trial on four distinct and separate charges of the illegal issue of a check and two for forgery. The amount of bail was fixed at $12,000, for which an application will be made to the Supreme Court.

ANOTHER STEAMBOAT DISASTER.

The Petersburg Express of the Philadelphia and Richmond line, caught fire by spontaneous combustion, as a supposed, on Thursday night, in the James River, near Jamestown, and was entirely destroyed, involving the loss of the lives of three children. The rest escaped very rapidly, and the survivors had barely time to save themselves in safety, for the fire prevented any to the boats. The children were lost from the upsetting of one of the boats in being found impossible to the attempts to rescue them. A storm also prevailed at the time, which rendered the accident more horrible. The survivors were finally taken from the rafts by another steamer, which providentially came to the scene of the disaster before it was too late.

A MURDERER LYNCHED.

The Berlington (Iowa) Hawkeye of July 7th gives the following account of the last scenes in the life of Kerhart, the murderer of Mrs. Willis and her two children:

"At an early hour of July 5, the people began to assemble in the neighborhood where the murder of Mrs. Hart would be hung. The place chosen was on the left bank of Lindon Creek, on the road leading from Port Donavia to Abingdon, about a hundred yards or more from the house where the crime was committed. The crowd upon the ground about 10 A.M., and already a hundred or more were present, waiting, and the people were in a state of anxiety, while two men were busy digging the grave. By one o'clock two thousand people had gathered to witness the execution, which was a novelty, perhaps, in this country; and on the right bank of the creek, fronting the scaffold, and the place where the murder of the unfortunate woman and children was found, the women, who numbered three or four hundred, were seated, and the men, who were also present in force, they had been invited to a bridal scene.

"At 12 o'clock the messenger arrived with the intelligence that the mob had broken into the jail at Fairfield, and taken the prisoner, the power of the law was at once the strongest speeches that had been spoken in behalf of Kerhart, but were fast approaching the end. At 2 P.M. a distinguished citizen of Agency stepped upon the scaffold, and in a few solemn but impressive words, full of pathos, in which he expressed the irresponsibility of the murderer, which he remarked that he professed to be a God-fearing man and law-abiding citizen, but when death came from the hand of man, and from them both, it struck Kerhart—the murderer, the victim—children the holiest and sweetest on the stage of death. They had been given him to make a confession, and as it had not expired, he would not do it, but desire, to say that he possible the few remaining moments of his life. At 3 o'clock the wagon containing the prisoner, his hands handcuffed having been tied around his head to hide his face from the gaze of the many spectators, the rope was then numerous voices, the handkerchief was removed for a few moments, to allow the multitude to look upon his countenance, and to allow him a last look at the bright sunshine which he was relinquishing forever. The wagon was then driven from under the tree, and he hung suspended between earth and earth."

MORE AFRICANS AT NEW ORLEANS.

We read in the New Orleans Delta of 12th: "A few days ago, within about twenty-four hours of our arrival, in landing a gang of negroes, in Mobile Bay, twenty-three remarkably fine females and boys were placed on board of the Mobile steamer for this city, and having safely arrived, are to be sold on Friday next, at the St. Charles Hotel, by Julian Neville. There is much discussion and inquiry as to the character of these negroes, whether they are of the recent, or whether they are a portion of the one hundred and ninety for whom grass was cut on the Wash. Both are, we presume, reasonably enough, entitled to the comfortable quarters at our river plantations, and to the new accessories of a Levee Side grass cutting. Certain them. One of the lot, a boy of seventeen, weighs two hundred and seventy, and is over six feet high. It is supposed he is of the Bozale tribe, and that his father was a renowned warrior of that warlike race.

"On the landing of a steamer from a port under the nose of Judge Campbell, the most conscious of all the foes of the traffic, is carried a very contentious act. The time, too, selected for the landing adds to the gravity of the offence. The Judge's recent pronouncement to the Grand Jury, and eloquent exhibition of the horrors of the middle passage, had just been delivered, and orders had just been given to the United States Marshal to prosecute the offenders to the utmost. The Judge has since declared that it was no violation of the Act of Congress to buy negroes recently imported, and that the Marshal was not, yet, in fore of all this peril and responsibility, some dare-devil has ventured to land a cargo of slaves. It is difficult to time for the picking season, which will be a valuable addition to our labor, and a timely force of agricultural laborers. 'Can such things be?'"

BAD SEND OF A CHILD.

The Newark Daily Advertiser publishes the following: "Several notices have recently been published respecting the disappearance of Joseph Hedden, (age 4½ years, who disappeared on July 5, having followed from home the last band of Fifth ward boys that day. His dead body was found on Saturday near the Kearney Meadows, about 1½ miles from the Passaic, who was guessing. The bucking of his dog in a thicket attracted the attention of the finder to the spot, and found the body almost imbedded in mud. The child had evidently wandered into the meadow in the night, and having started to return to his home on the hill, ever he succeeded in extricating himself from the mire, he was robbed from exposure and hunger. During the night of the 5th a heavy rain fell, which the child undoubtedly was suspected, and no search was undertaken. The eyes and face of the unfortunate child were picked out by some bird, or by muskrats, and the body was otherwise mutilated by the same cause. The child was identified by the age, by age of starvation the had attempted to relieve himself. He had probably lived for two or three days, under the two or three days, under a swelling sun by day, and exposure at night, and finally died from fatigue. The case is one of the most affecting that has occurred for a long time. The parents are overwhelmed with grief, sympathy to the bereaved parents, and the scene that followed was heartrending."

PERSONAL.

Lieutenant Thomas J. Page, of the United States Navy, died on board the steamer Iroquois, in the Bay of Naples, on the 5th ult. Lieutenant Page was taken ill of the remittent fever for more than three weeks during the passage up from Gaeta, and subsequently it was found impossible to remove him to the hospital on shore, and he remained on board the ship until the day of his death, when he was conveyed to the hospital on an apartment in the hospital to a number of our sick, it was found that Lieutenant Page was dangerously ill and remonial. He was a son of John H. Houston, Esq., of Wilmington, Delaware.

The celebrated Mrs. Robinson, better known as Mrs. Cunningham, is one of the best hands at the needle; as we entered, she averted her head, as is her custom when strangers enter. She is a woman of refined-looking woman; but the change-ful turning of her dark eye, and the tell-tale expression of her mouth tell all."

"I noticed a bouquet of flowers sent by a moment Mr. Post, late known as Isaac V. Fowler, of New York, who committed suicide in this city some years ago, and who devotes most of his time to the study of Spanish grammar."

The Rev. Dr. Chapin preached on Sunday evening for the last time in the Church of the Divine Unity, and for the closed until that time. During the vacation he will, it is said, preach in Boston. The Rev. Mr. Bellows is promised to preach in the School Street, Warren Street, and Hollis Street Churches, and also in the Unitarian Church in Roxbury.

A young lady named Julia Hudson, of this city, one of the guests at the Columbia Springs Hotel, Columbia County, on Tuesday last, about 2 P.M., left the table of rose, stepped to the window of her room to empty a washbowl, and, as it is said, fell out of the window, and was seized with a fainting turn. She dropped the bowl in passing, and the water fell on the head of Mrs. Bailey, effect it as to be vexatious, some thirteen feet below. The bowl struck the head of the unfortunate woman, producing a striking upon the fragments of the bowl, which cut her face and neck in a terrible manner. She died rapidly recovering from the effects of the accident.

An interesting meeting of the Corresponding Committee seen at Yale College will be the meeting of the surviving members of the class of 1810. The object was to gether regularly at intervals of ten years, beginning with the year 1850. Of the original number, thirty-eight in all, their separation there are still living forty-six members. Eighteen were present at the meeting. Letters may be mentioned the Rev. Edward Beecher, the Hon. John A. Kasson, the Hon. Alexander H. Bullock, Dr. Bailey, of the House of Representatives, Judge William Rockwell, of the Supreme Court of New York, the Rev. Walter Colton, Chaplain in the Navy, the Hon. Gurdon Baker, Member of Congress from Connecticut, the Rev. William Cranwell, and the Rev. Dr. Todd.

Hon. Jefferson Davis left Jackson early are at the Astor House. The Senator, we believe, usually spends a portion of the summer at the White Sulphur Springs.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, who has recently returned from a European tour, is at Andover.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The proceedings of the British Parliament reported to the last steamer, are interesting. In both Houses the question of the murder of the Rajah of Coorg and the speakers evinced the warmest sympathy for the Gorkhali Government. In the discussion in the House of Lords, on the Privilege question, had been carried *ser*atim in the House of Commons, Lord Derby said that the question was a question, had stated that Gorkhal Horsey had been received by the Queen, and that the Government did not object to the arrangements of General Scott for the solution of the San Juan dispute.

A RUNAWAY MATCH.

The Cork Examiner has the following: "A circumstance occurred on last Sunday at Queenstown which, on account of the appearance of mystery and romance connected with it, has afforded much food for gossip to the residents of Queenstown. A few days before a young lady of extraordinary personal attractions arrived at the Queen's Hotel, and remained there until Sunday, under the name of Miss Hall. On Sunday morning a handsome, lovably-dressed gentleman called at the hotel and inquired for Miss Hall. On being told that the young lady had packed, paid her bill, and left, proceeded on board the steamer for Liverpool. There has been nothing unusual in the circumstance, the departure of the pair excited no attention; but in about two hours after the sailing of the Persia the proprietor of the hotel received a telegram from Dublin, offering a reward of £100 for the capture of the latter. It was then, however, too late.

The Tipperary Examiner, however, in the following extract, seems to throw some light on the strange departure of the Carew: "On Monday last, a young gentleman from Carrick-on-Suir was ordered to address him family, whose exertions to discover his whereabouts have been unceasing. It is now ascertained by that he took the house was also absent, and on account of the fact that he had been previously married, and that both took and master had eloped, the latter father of the bride. The young couple are at present in Cork en route to America. The cook, who had resisted with the bride's father, is reported to be pursuing more strongly to the Turkish than to the Irish ideal of female beauty. The affair has been very quietly and accomplished, and will be entitled to considerable property on arriving at age."

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

At latest dates the acquiescence of all the Powers in the Paris Conference was considered certain, and that it will be held in Paris during the month of October. The Powers will be represented by their plenipotentiaries.

FUNERAL OF PRINCE JEROME.

We read in the Paris correspondence of the London News: "The funeral of Prince Jerome, like all splendid spectacles, attracted a great crowd. The day was fine, but extremely warm. To the last moment the ceremony was decided upon—the Rue Rivoli, Place de la Concorde, and the Champs Elysées were filled with the greatest crowd of people possible to have a good view of the gorgeous procession. The Emperor and Empress, as the head of the deceased would be closed, were kept open as usual, and the Imperial personages were in here de la Concorde. Just before the raising of the Rue Rivoli, were closely packed with spectators. Behind the troops the ground rose rapidly, so as full as I have often seen it on an illumination night; and the windows, as well as the balconies, were filled on or other side by very dense masses, owing to the fact that the Champs Elysées are very generally closed, and although nothing could be more respectful than the behavior of the crowd as a whole, there was a good deal of talking at all like that universally prevailing sentiment of curiosity which is always excited by the sight of a crowd. Consequently the funeral of the Duke of Orleans, for instance, was not at all calculated to impress the spectators with the full solemnity of the festivities. The clergy of St. Roch received the body at the door of the church, and the usual requiem and mischief before and by the side of it, carrying lighted tapers. The Emperor and Empress did not attend, but in their stead, and in other side by very dense masses, owing to the fact that the Duke of Nemours, who was present with other ornaments. The pall-bearers were M. Fould, Minister of State; Count Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Count Vaillant, and M. Troplong, the President of the Senate. The procession was very long and imposing, and it was much remarked that he appeared profoundly affected. The body was then conveyed to the vaults, and placed beside over his general's uniform. The marshals commanding the different corps d'armée were present at the last act in the ceremony, and unrobed behind Prince Napoleon, who, with Count Montebert and the Duke de Mouskoff were recognized by the crowd with much interest. The Emperor and Empress left as soon as they followed. The procession so long that it took upward of an hour to pass. The Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris, performed the funeral service; and after an oration by the Bishop of Nancy, which will doubtless be published in the Moniteur to-morrow, the body was lowered into the vault. The Prince de Joinville and Duke d'Aumale were present, but not in their official capacities, as they are forbidden to wear the uniform or to accept any decorations of the chapel.

"The Prince de Joinville and the Duc Javalliès broke through the lines of the police, and I hear that an old man was knocked down and thrown taken with premature labor in consequence of fright."

A NEW INVENTION.

Among the novelties of the scientific world has lately been of is the invention of an Italian—A Florentine, named Meucci, who has devoted many years to the study of electricity and telegraphic matters. He has some extraordinary instrument, which he has presented to the Emperor of the French. It is stated that among other things he has the means of transmitting articulate sounds of human vitality and manuscripts from station to station by the electric wire. The Emperor appears to be much pleased. He can also transmit a likeness by this agency, to be reproduced at the other end of the wire.

ITALY.

THE LATEST FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

Telegrams from Sicily say that General Garibaldi was in possession of Messina. The Neapolitan troops are nearly large supplies, both of men and stores; about 2000 men and 20 guns left Naples for Messina, where great numbers of volunteers are assembled; and a French ironclad is said to have left Toulon with a large number of artillerymen, rifles, and muskets for Garibaldi's service.

The Neapolitan force in the province of Messina were computed at 9,000 men.

Naples and Sicily, then, was tranquil, and the proclamation of martial law has been rescinded. The Neapolitan Parliament has been prorogued for the first time to November. The Constitution of 1848 has been proclaimed, and the Ministry has been reconstructed. Under the reestablishment of the Press laws enacted in 1848 and 1849, the Neapolitan journals are being issued without confidence in the minds of the people.

It is now believed that Garibaldi—and the language of the Opinione of Turin would seem to justify the statement—has been deceived in assuming the British Government to listen to the overtures of the King of Naples and even to have promised to intercede with the Courts of Naples and Piedmont. The Government of the latter kingdom has positively refused to entertain the proposal.

The Sicilian Exchequer to France had reached Paris.

GARIBALDI WANTS MORE GUNS.

The following letter from General Garibaldi to the Chairman of the Central Italian Committee, in London, has been published:

"COMANDO GENERALE DELLO ESERCITO NAZIONALE, "PALERMO, 15th June, 1860.

"SIR,—One of our friends suggests to me that, in laying before the public the wants of the army, and of a few articles, it would be possible to obtain a couple of steamers capable of carrying artillery.

"We have already so many pounds of the sympathy and of the generosity of the British people, that I will have ventured to make the proposal to you.

"Will you kindly, sir, make every endeavor the expression of my most lively gratitude, and that of all Italy?

From your devoted

"G. GARIBALDI."

GARIBALDI'S POLICY.

We read in the London Times: "Garibaldi has decidedly convoked the electors for the 18th inst., to vote on the question of annexation to Piedmont, and the Ministry has to decide the question. No Parliament will be convoked, as was at first reported, by which means he will be unquainted with present usages. Garibaldi is a republican, but he is also a practical man, and knows that Italy is not ripe for a republic. He therefore, we presume, designs promptly, deciding by yes or no, and wastes no time in hearing the endless harangues of rival speakers. It is undoubtedly for better than a Parliament in which all parties might openly propose and advocate their own solutions, and in which it would be necessary to spend weeks and months in listening to the expression of hopes and regrets. While a decisive act is being prepared in Sicily, the Ministry at Turin remains openly quiet, and its repugnance to any alliance with Naples. In the situation of the Pope, the Ministry has concentrated the force of its members, natives of Southern Italy, in Marseilles and M. Farini has gone to Paris on a confidential mission."

THE PAPAL TROOPS.

The Paris correspondent of the London News says: "The Pope's troops, which are to be increased to 20,000 men, are to be commanded by General Lamoricière, who is to be appointed Minister of War. The Pope's troops are to be composed of Swiss, Belgians, Irish, Bavarians, and Austrians, and are to be paid by the Catholic Powers

NO. XI.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

SOME years ago a temporary inability to sleep, referable to a distressing impression, caused me to walk about the streets all night, for a series of several nights. The disorder might have taken a long time to conquer if it had been faintly experimented on in bed; but it was soon defeated by the brisk treatment of setting up directly after lying down, and going out, and coming home tired at sunrise.

In the course of those nights I finished my education in a fair amateur experience of houselessness. My principal object being to get through the night, the pursuit of a lodging for me into my varying conditions with people who have no other object every night in the year.

The night was March, and the weather damp, cloudy, and cold. The sun not rising before half past five, the night perspective looked sufficiently long as the hall past twelve: which was about my time for confronting it.

The restlessness of a great city, and the way in which it tumbles and tosses before it can get to sleep, formed one of the first entertainments offered to the contemplation of an houseless pedestrian. It lasted about two hours. We lost a great deal of companionship when the late public-houses turned their backs on me, and when the closing thrust the last brawling drunkards into the street; but stray vehicles and stray people going home were left us, after that. If we were not, we had a policeman's rattle sprung and a fray turned up; for, in general, surprisingly little of this diversion was provided for people in the Haymarket, which is the worst kept part of London, and about Leicester Square, though, and along a certain part of the line of the Old Kent Road, the peace was seldom violently broken. But it was always the case that London, as if in detestation of individual existence belonging to it, had expiring fits and starts of restlessness. After all seemed quiet, if one cab rattled by half a dozen would surely follow; and Londonlessness even observed that intoxicated people appeared to be magnetically attracted toward each other, so that, when we were not in a state of broken object staggering against the shutters of a shop, that another drunken object would probably stag. ger up against us. Minutes were out, in fraternization or fight with it. When we made a divergence from the sparse public-houses of mutilation, thinarmed, puff-faced, leaden-lipped gin-drinker—she encountered a rarer specimen of a more decent appearance, but one that sported a curiously dress-ed-in soiled mourning. As the street experience in the night, so the street experience in the day. A common bird, in some unexpectedly quiet little property, come unexpectedly into a deal of liquor.

At length these flickering sparks would die away, were the last vertebræ worn out of the living life trailed from some late pieman or hot-potato man—and London would sink to rest. As to the yawning, the hunkers round would be for any sign of company, any lighted place, any movement, any human suggestive of any one awake anywhere, even so much as awake, for the houseless ex looked out for lights in windows.

Walking the streets under the pattering rain Houselessness would walk and walk and walk, seeing nothing but the interminable tangle of streets, now as a corner, here and there, two policemen in conversation, or the sergeant or inspector looking after his men. Now and then in the night—but rarely—Houselessness would become aware of a fellow head peering out of a door-way a few yards before him, and, coming up with the head, would find a man standing half dressed to keep within the door-way's shadow, and evidently intent upon particular service of his society. Under a kind of fascination, and in a ghostly reliance suitable to the time, Houselessness and his gentleman would see one another through a half a foot, and so, without exchange of speech, part mutually suspicious. Drip, drip, drip, from lodging and cooping, from pipes and water-spouts, and by-and-by the houseless shadow would fall upon the stones that pave the way to Waterloo Bridge; for, it is to the houseless mind to have a halfpenny-worth of excuse for saying "Good-night" to the toll-keeper, and catching a glimpse of his fire. The toll-bars and a good proportion of a good wooden seek-shawl, were comfortable things to see in connection with the toll-keeper, and his brisk wakefulness was excellent company when he rattled the change of halfpence down upon that metal table-top. Like a man who had fallen in sight, with all its sorrowful thoughts, and didn't care for the coming of dawn. There was next of encouragement in the threshold of the bridge. The bridge was dreary. The chopped-up murdered man had not been lowered with a rope over the parapet with enough weight upon it, to sink him, and slept then quietly enough, most likely, and undisturbed by any human of whom he was famous. But the river had an awful look, the buildings on the banks were muffled in black shrouds, and the reflected lights seemed to quiver like fear in the water, as if the spectres of suicides were holding them to show where they went down. The wild moon and clouds were as much out of the civil conscience in a tumbled bed, and the very shadow of the immensity of London seemed to lie oppressively on the river.

Between the bridge and the two great theatres there was but the distance of a few hundred paces, so the theatres came next. Grim and black without, at night, those great dry Wells, and lonesome by imagine, with the rows of faces faded out, the lights extinguished, and the seats all empty. One would think that nothing in them knew itself at such a time but Yorick's skull. In one of my night walks, as the church-steeples were shaking the March wind and rain with the strokes of Four, I passed the outer boundary of one of these great deserts, and entered it. With a dim lantern in my hand I groped my well-known way to the stage, and looked over the orchestra—and this was like a great grave dug for a time of pestilence—into the void beyond. A dismal cavern of an immense aspect, with the chandelier gone and like every thing else, and nothing visible through mist and fog and space but tiers of winding-sheets. In the centre of the pavement of the Strand there, I had seen the pensivity of Naples dancing among the rings, reckless of its natural enemy who should descend to overwhelm them, was now in possession of a strong serpent of engine hose, watchfully lying in wait for fires. And the Genius of Fire fly atit if showed its forked tongue. A ghost of a watchman, carrying a faint corpse-candle, roamed the distant upper-galleries of the Italian opera. Retiring within the proscenium, and holding my light above my head toward the rolled-up curtain (green no more, like the sea, by night), my sight lost itself in a gloomy vault, showing faint indications in it of a shipwreck of canvas and timber. Methought I felt much as a diver might at the bottom of the sea.

In those small hours when there was no movement in the streets, it afforded matter for reflection to take Newgate in the way, and, touching its rough stone, to think of the prisoners in the cells, and then to glance in at the lodge over the spiked wicket, and see the fire and light of the watching warders on the other side. It was an unspeakable time either to linger by that wicked little Debtor's door—shutting tighter than any other door one ever saw—which has so often let me out, or to journey. In the days of the uttering of forged promissory notes by people tempted up from the country, how many hundreds of times have I seen on both sexes—many quite innocent—having out of a garden and inconsiderate way, with the money in their pockets for the first time, and the first fatal knife making away with the fire. Next I went to Billingsgate, in some hope of market-people, but made my way slowly, crossed London-bridge, and got down by the water-side on the Surrey shore among the buildings of the Borough, where I found a few people going on at the brewery; and the reek, and the smell of grains, and the rattling of the plump dray horses at their mangers, and the knocking-up of their refreshed by having mingled with this good society, I made a new start with a new heart, set into the old Kent Road, and plodded on for the next object, and resolving, when I should come to the wall, to think of poor Horace Kinch, and the Dog at his son.

A very curious disease, the Dry Rot in men, and difficult to detect in the beginning of it. Whether Horace Kinch inside the wall of the old King's Bench prison, and it had carried him out with his feet forward. He was a year older than I, and in the prime of life, well to do, as clever as he needed to be, and popular among many friends. He was suitably married, and had children, and was fond of children. But, like some fair-looking houses, or fair-looking ships, he took the Dry Rot. The first strong external revelation of which in his case was a tendency to lurk and lounge; to be at street-corners without intelligible reason; to be going home presently when my way lay past his private door rather than at any; to do nothing tangible, but to have an intention of performing some idle piece of work quite dutiful to-morrow or the day after. When this manifestation of the disease is observed, the observer will generally find that the sufferer's impression once formed or received, that the patient was living a little too hard. He will scarcely have had time to turn it over in his mind, when he will see the terrible suspicion "Dry Rot," when he will notice a change for the worse in the patient's appearance: a certain shadowy slackness and looseness, which is not poverty, nor dirt, nor intoxication, nor ill-health, but simply Dry Rot. To this succeeds a small act of dishonesty, or a small piece of waste, to that, a lonesness respecting money: to that, a stronger smell as of strong waters at all times; to that, a trembling of the hands, somelonesy, misery, and trembling of the whole body; to that, the end is seen. Dry Rot advances at a compound usury quite incalculable. A plank is found infected with it, and the whole neighborhood is infected. It had been with the unhappy Horace Kinch, lately buried by a small subscription. Those who knew him best and thought him one of the last men to be comfortably established, with such hope before him as good yet, is feared, with a slight touch of Dry Rot. "Time he," they would say to each other as he comfortably established, with such hope before him as good yet, is feared, with a slight touch of Dry Rot." Time he! the same time for all of us, and comfortably established, with such hope before him as good yet, is feared, with a slight touch of Dry Rot." Time he! the same time for all of us, and wonderful to see how common story. I chose not to watch her by Bethlehem Hospital, and to examine it lay on my road round to Westminster; partly because I had a curiosity to see how the place looked at its best perused within sight of its walls and dome. And the fancy was this: Are not the sane and the insane equal as night and day? Are not the sane days? Are not all of us outside this hospital, who dream, more or less in the condition of those inside it, every night of our lives? Are not our dreams, for the most part, unbridled, as they daily are, that we associate preposterously with kings and queens, emperors and empresses, and notabilities of all sorts? Do we not nightly jumble events, and personages, and times, and places, as these do daily? Are we not sometimes troubled by our own sleeping incensistencies, and do we not vexedly try to account for them or unreason them, just as these do sometimes in respect of their waking delusions? Said an afflicted man to me, when I was last in a hospital like this, "Sir, I can frequently fly." I was half ashamed to reflect that so could I—by night. Said a woman to me on the same occasion, "Queen Victoria frequently came to me with me, and her Majesty and I dine off peaches and macaroni in our night-gowns, and his Royal Highness the Prince Consort does us the honor to make a third on horseback in a Field-Marshal's uniform." Could I refrain from reddening with consciousness when I remembered the amazing royal parties I myself had given (at night), the uncountable visits I had paid on state and on private occasions, the manner of conducting myself on those distinguished occasions? I remember that the great master who knew every thing, knew best of all the depth of each of his flock. He did not call Dreams the insanity of each day's sanity.

AN OLD MAN'S MEMORIES.

IT seemed to me to-day, as I sat listening in Magdalene Chapel to the grand old organ, and the boys' voices, that voices singing some years ago had been heard there for three hundred years, and watching the soft evening light as it came mellowing in through the painted windows, just falling on the picture over the altar, and bringing out clear the quaint carving of the oak stalls, that only I had changed through the long, long years since I first sat there a feeble child, weeping from very fullness of heart—it all seemed to me so beautiful. I fear well I remember that day (so long ago now) when I first went to the chapel. The last notes of the organ had died away, the young men and all round me had risen to escape from the enforced quiet, but I still sat in a corner of the dark Anti-Chapel, quietly crying; I could hardly have told why, except that I was a little child, and could not stand my thoughts and express my feelings as I heard my self and my words. I could not speak much about my home, but I was not happy there; my own mother had been long dead—my father had married another, and he was no companion for both cared for her hand-some boy more than they could do for me. They were never unkind, only indifferent, leaving me to wander as I liked; but I knew all their love was for Hugh, a bright, winning child, as unlike me as they could well; and I was thought dull, and was always told to be very quiet and very bitter sometimes.

It was suddenly startled by a light hand being placed on my shoulder, and a gentle voice asking "what ailed me?" I raised my eyes and saw a tall, gray-haired gentleman looking down on me kindly, I could not feel frightened. He led me out of the chapel, and made me sit by him in the cloisters outside, and said "I'll look all about you;" and I did open all my childish heart to him, for there was an earnest simplicity and gentle kindness about him that made me feel that he was a stranger. He listened very patiently, asking me questions as I went on. When I told him how I loved the music, he seemed to see it all with me, for he smiled and told me it was he who played the organ and taught the boys to sing, and asked me if I could sing. I said "Yes," for I could, but it seemed as unreal a dream that I should ever do so as that I should fly, joyful dreams my childhood had. I was so fond of music; and soon, through his influence, I was one of the boys in his choir, and happy as a bird.

My father failed in his business soon after this, and left Oxford, with my mother and little sunshiny face. A cousin of my father's, living at Saint Martin's office of adopting me as his own son—an offer generously made when he saw how it would unburden a man of his large family—and I went to singing. So I lived on at the old gray house a long, long time, and grew to be a tall, awkward lad, and more daily. We were quite companions, notwithstanding the difference in our age. I was too little to join in the games of my schoolfellows, and much preferred wandering about with him in the lovely college gardens, hearing all the many traditions of the place talking, learning to know him the old books he loved and I learned to love too, and helping him to pet and play with his dear dog Jessie, a pretty, little child, who seemed to loved better than any thing on earth, for her young mother had died when she was born, some four years before.

She was always fond of me, awkward boy though I was; and I ever grateful for the kindness I was so ready to show. It was not a hard bondage, for she was gentle and tender-hearted as her Master, and full of life and fun sometimes. Dear little Jessie! how she used to flit along the cloisters to meet me when I came from school, her bright, curly head, and her little white frock and innocent face, and her blue eyes sparkling with pleasure because "Stephen had come back to play with me and not study any more." What delightful rules we had together by the river-side! Then, when she was tired, I would sit on the roots of one of the old willow-trees, and tell her stories, which it impossible not to look at the little fairy figure, half-hidden in the tall bulrush-ups and grass, or not to listen to the silvery voice, now laughing, now claiming some wonderful discovery of hidden flowers or bright-winged insects. Then, when it grew light, she would be half-frightened under the arches of the long avenue of the elm-trees, though we both knew that we should find the rooks awake with their thick talking; but when the wind sighed through the branches mournfully her little hand would cling more closely to mine, and she ceased her innocent prattle for a time. Those were very happy days, and year after year went by all too quickly for me. I received a good education at the chorister's school; I liked my studies, and they said I learned easily and remembered well. Master Fleming (as he bid us boys call him) had no ambition for himself, but often said he would like to see me a scholar of the college before he died; and I felt I must not any longer be dependent on his charity. So I toiled hard, and was successful. I was elected scholar of be——; and at the end of my undergraduate's course, having obtained (to me) unexpected honors, I remained on at the old college as tutor and Lecturer.

Jessie had grown up to womanhood now, though as child-like in her simplicity and trusting innocence as when I first knew her. She was very lovely, and her freshness and delicacy made her even more so. I used to fancy, as she hung about her father cheerfully in his age and, after passing infirmities, that she was like the delicate flowers and graceful ivy-wreaths that grew in the crevices of windows of the college; he always seemed younger when she was by him. I always loved her; and I knew that I had the protecting love of an elder brother changed to the deep, passionate love of the man for one infinitely better and purer than himself, that is as changed. I never betrayed this by look or word; it was only in my most sanguine day-dreams that I hoped to win her as to love in return. How could she, so young, so far, dream of linking her fate to such as I was? It was blest enough for me to remain be with her daily—to know that she needed and trusted in me. I would not for worlds disturb her innocent confidence in "Master Stephen," as she still called me, but I inwardly vowed that the one object of my life should be to guard her from sorrow, and, if possible, to keep her as pure and peaceful as she was then; in my presumption and blindness forgetting that others might pluck my cherished flower from me.

My father had never returned to England. He had prospered greatly, and was a rich man now. His letters were always full of praise of my little brother Hugh; his beauty, his wit, his popularity were a never-ending theme. I often longed to see the boy, whom I remembered a bold, mischievous, yet winning little fellow, and now my wishes were at last gratified. He came to me a youth of nineteen, before finally settling in the colony, and meant to spend some time in Oxford, picking up what information he could from the college tutors. This news caused great excitement in our quiet household. Martin Fleming insisted upon his becoming an inmate of his house; and Jessie, in time of his coming drew near, Jessie was quite in a flutter of shy expectation. Her life had been so very quiet with her father and myself as the only companions, the arrival of an unknown guest was a great event to her. Dear lovely child! how we sat watching for him that bright summer evening; in her simple white dress and blue ribbons, as she core-always did, I had grudgingly to own, because they matched the color of her eyes) placed in her sunny hair! How timidly she shrank behind her father when Hugh at last came! I did not first to greet and bring him in, and how prettily she forgot her shyness and came forward to welcome him as a friend of friend because he was my brother! I could hardly believe he was my brother, he was so unlike me in every way. He was tall and dark, with a fine face, which was favored by the sun and long voyage, would have been almost stern in its regularity but for the bright smile of delight, laughing eyes and ready smile; his manners were frank and winning. Altogether there was a pleasant mixture about him of the gentleman and the man who has seen something of the world. We were all soon like old friends together, and in a few days Jessie was as fond of him as myself, and she was her own gay, simple self again. I could hardly believe I was only a few years older than Hugh. I never knew how little life and gayety there was about me till I compared myself with him. I was very proud of him, yet almost envious sometimes; so active, bounding, and full of life and energy, his very idle mirth, and dislike to dry books, had a certain absent charm, and he knew what to say here to those to please, I did not wonder they remained undiscovered.

During the ensuing winter and early spring I saw very little of them. I was young and inexperienced in my worldly affairs, and was dazzled by most of both myself. I could fill them, as I thought, worthily. It was very difficult to leave the pleasant little room where I sat with Jessie reading a muddy glow on the carved oak book-cases and cherished books; Martin Fleming in his easy-chair, Jessie on a stool at her father's feet, Hugh has hand playing with her curls, while her little fingers bound themselves over some bit of work, or held a frog dish to tease poor Hugh; whose tall figure looked taller in the fire-light as he leaned against the mantle-piece, amused with Jessie's naive appreciation of his pictures he told with such spirit, seeming quite content to pass his evenings in their quiet society, undisturbed by temptations in the shape of his young companions. I used to hear their merry singing voices as I sat poring over my college papers in my little study, and envy, or, harder to resist, Jessie's fresh young voice singing the grand old music her father loved, or some simple ballad to please Hugh; then Martin would move to the instrument and play fragments of Handel, Beethoven, or Mozart, linking altogether in an unbroken chain of harmony, as he alone could do; and though I could not see them, I knew how Jessie and Hugh would be standing on each side of the fire-light, subdued, not saddened, by the thrilling chords and plaintive melodies, and the music was still a friend to me, as it had been long ago and is still; and now it spoke of budding hopes and happy dreams, till the bell in the old tower, tolling the rapidly passing hours, recalled me to my books and prosaic life again.

Spring was returning again, the tall elms were budding, the meadows daily growing greener, the ivy on the gray buildings putting forth fresh sprouts. Master Fleming had been absent all the winter, and it grieved me that he did not improve with the spring. He had given up his post of organist: it was sometimes too much for him to mount the steep stairs to the organ-loft. It may have been fancy, but he never seemed to me the same afterward; and now his strength gradually declined Jessie was not unwise, she never checked him by a word, and often talked cheerfully of what he would do when he was quite well again. He never contradicted her; but he knew that he was failing, and would only smile to me in his simple, trustful way of death and heaven. I think his heart had been there ever since the young wife he loved so well died. It was from her lips he called of Jessie that he seemed unwilling to leave her world. He remembered himself only for not having thought of providing for her: he never had saved; what he did not absolutely require he threw away; and now my little one will be left a helpless orphan with none but you to care for her?" and as he said this bitter tears ran down the old man's cheek. I could not bear this: I told him all I felt, and hoped, and feared—how my love for Jessie had strengthened with my strength and grown with my growth, and now it seemed a part of my nature. He was moved. I believe he loved me more than any other human being but Jessie: and when I told him I saw how relieved he was, I was glad to have spoken so openly. He promised me faithfully not to reveal a word of this to Jessie; he had never ceased to regard her as a little child, and thought it far better at present to keep her such than to wake to a while: but he felt so sure all would be as I wished it—so perfectly sanguine of my success—I could not but be influenced by his words, and hoped more and feared less than I had hitherto done.

March and April glided away, the first of May had come. On that day the choristers of the college always assemble on the top of the chapel tower at daybreak, and certain anthems have been the custom for hundreds and hundreds of years, so I was told, for as far many years to come, for the effect is very touching and beautiful. Jessie and I had never missed going since the time we were children together—and I was so proud to sing with the other boys. Master Flemming used to carry Jessie (then a tiny little thing) up the long, dark, winding stair which she was so glad to emerge on to the high tower, and while we sang she would stand by his side with that look of rapt happy devotion which we see in children's faces. Dear as she was to me then, and fair as I had thought her she was still dearer now, and still more fair. Her pretty head stood forward a little over the snow book; her blue eyes were cast down, their long lashes resting on her soft cheek, and a beefitable smile was on her slightly parted lips. I did not wonder at Hugh's undisguised look of admiration, as he stood near us. She was evidently in some happy dreamland of her own, which harmonized with the soft yet joyful music.

It was a lovely morning, warmer and brighter than May days often are. I lingered after the singing was ended to feast my eyes on the view. The sunrise was behind clear on the numerous spires and towers of the city, showing their exquisite proportions and tracery; the gardens, with their glowing masses of bright flowers, and the sombre grey of the colleges and halls, and the river flowed at their feet, calm and rapid by turns, ever winding, through the low meadows gay with the buttercup and other early flowers; beyond lay green fields and woods, and on the hills in the far distance. I thought I had never seen it look so beautiful before, it has never looked so beautiful since to me. A shadow fell on my life that day which has never quite passed away.

I had gone behind one of the buttresses to see better some point of view, when I was startled by hearing voices near me, for I thought I had been left alone there. I listened, idly at first, but soon with eager attention and interest. It was Hugh who spoke, and he was telling of fervent love, utter devotion, and deep-felt and eloquent sympathy in misery. It was Jessie's voice that answered him. I could not hear the broken words at first; but soon, by her tone, I understood that she returned his love. Why did I not die at that moment? Words are faint to express what I felt—grief, shame, anger, woe! I felt I could not move, I could not speak, I could not listen; I could only feel that the hope of my life was gone, my Jessie lost to me forever. I had been so utterly blind and presumptuous; a good dreaming fool—and yet, he could not love her as I loved her. And then came burning indignation against Hugh, why was he there to thwart and triumph over me? what had I done that I was cast off? I deemed as other men were? was a mere idle boy indeed more worthy of her than I who had worked and waited so many years? They had grown up from childhood—by what accursed, and the rain and wind were beating against the tower but I still stood there bending over my wretched misery till the bell began to ring for morning prayers. Even then habit prevailed, and I went down mechanically through the cloisters, and took my place in the chapel. I felt as though I were in a hateful dream, but knew that from that moment there would be no waking, that my heart was full of dark, evil thoughts; but soon the organ began a low, plaintive voluntary. I tried to harden myself against its influence, but it softened me even against my will, seeming to my excited fancy as if an angel pleaded with me; and as the voluntary continued, my eyes were filled, my throat loosened, my heart was melted, and I could pray—pray for help, for strength, for comfort—pray as we should pray when our hearts' idols are breaking, what we have clung to escaping our grasp, and we find our utter inability to stand alone. At last tears relieved me, and I rose up strengthened if not comforted. It was her happiness I had always desired, should I repine because hers was not mine too? I could bear all if Hugh proved worthy, and I would not doubt him. He loved her so well could make him so, could purify him from his faults; but for me! O God how could I bear the long blank life from which it seemed to me then all the sunshine had fled forever?

I went to my usual duties that morning, doing all mechanically, seeing through every thing the fair, downcast face; hearing the broken voice murmur to another words I had madly dreamed were loving tones to myself. I went home at night so sad and weary: it was hard to bear Hugh's radiant gladness, and almost a relief that he looked pale and fearful, and was not accompanied to notice any change in me might be in his company. I went to my room, and remained there all the evening; he was worse than usual, and had kept his room for some days. I saw she had not told him any thing, for he had been absorbed by his different subjects, and he never could keep any thing from me. Dear, guileless Martin Flemming! he never could have dreamed that his scheme could; in innocence, and faith, and charity, his heart was like a little child's.

I could not sleep that first miserable night; wretched dreams and waking thoughts haunted me. I rose early, and went to the little garden Jessie tended so carefully. It was a lovely morning, the sun shone, the birds sang; the flowers I so fondly delighted in were out in their gayest colors—every thing was in such contrast to myself. I was sitting listlessly on the rude stone bench I had put there to hear Jessie's light, her light footsteps startled me, and Jessie seated herself on the grass at my feet: she put her hand in mine, as she always used to do when a child, she was too shy to look up in my face with the old wistful glance, as she said, "Stephen, dear, I want you to help me, and tell me what to do." I think I knew what she would ask me; I had seen in her anxious gaze at her father and then at Hugh, the night before, her difficulty, and her great love to them both. For a moment I felt as if I could not answer her lightly, and I was much troubled so in mine, her half-hidden face was so agitated, so thought only of soothing and helping her, at the cost of my own heart's blood. How I told her God heard the anguished prayer I offered up for help and courage, or I never could have done it, "Only be sure, Jessie," I said to me; that she and Hugh loved one another, but that she could not bear to leave her old father even to go with him; and then I left it to her to tell him herself. Was I right in doing this? Should she not have had thought of it?—the fast-falling tears and silent pressure of my hand told me I was right, and I never afterward could not blame herself for loving Hugh as she did: it was so sin." Here Jessie raised her eyes to mine with a look of confidence through her tears, and said, "Did I not wonder Hugh could care for such a childish little thing as I am?" I was very much moved, and I am sure she thought I never understood such things; and now I would make every thing straight and easy, as I always had done. Jessie's young guileless heart would have grieved had you known the pain your innocent words gave me! We talked long together. She told me how much her father would consent to his bringing out an English wife, but that he never would be induced to let him stay in England, indeed he was anxious to go as soon it possible. My heart sank as I thought of Jessie in a strange land, and after strange, but she also had no misgivings for herself. Hugh was every thing to her; but how could she leave her father? I thought of Hugh's mother, of his occupation, but I had not the heart to tell her how far I thought Master Flemming was sinking. I knew that grieving for Jessie would be the sharpest pang days if he knew how things stood; so I advised Jessie not to speak, or let Hugh speak to him, till my father answered the letter I had just written, asking for his consent to their marriage. Letters were answered but slowly in those days; "and in the Thatcher," Jessie added, with a look of sweetness "he may be so much better there will be no fear of agitating him." And she, childish, fair, and innocent as ever, and sprinkled her cheeks with water from the quaint old fountain, that Hugh might not find her "puffed pale and sorrowful," and then went like a butterfly among her flowers, to gather a nosegay for her father's room. She told me before I left her that "I had much to thank me for, and I was to tell Hugh when I talked to her;" and it lightened my heavy heart to find that I could still do so, and that I was not to be left alone in my misery with Hugh, whom I met coming in at the garden-gate, and with him joy. I sometimes think he must have partly guessed the truth, for he was so confessed, and nuttered something about my great kindness; and he always avoided talking since with which was silent and reserved if we were. He had never liked me, and I could not wonder at it. I had none of the graces which please women, and felt a natural enough that he was often ashamed of his shy, awkward, look-worn of a brother.

I had written to my father, and was writing a book, interesting only to scholars, more to forget my thoughts from myself, and to please Martin Flemming, than from any love, interest, or hope in my work. He had somewhat revived lately, and could some times sit for hours in the sunny little garden with his favorite bear, Jessie, and the dog, Hugh and choristers. He hardly seemed to care for any thing except to hold me one of the voices had sounded like his dear sainted young wife's. "How I have pined to hear that sweet voice again! and it is one of my blessed thoughts that I shall soon hear it in heaven, never to have it taken from me. I am glad the Bible says so much about music; it seems to make it right to love it so dearly and feel it a holy thing. She made me promise before she left me that I would soon write him word, and pray for her, but always love it for her sake—she knew it it would comfort me."

The organ began again, and he sat up to listen even more eagerly than before, when quite suddenly he fell back fainting. I was much alarmed, but his pulse was partially revived, and I urged to be taken into the house. He was much better when Jessie and Hugh came in, but we all saw that a change had come over him, and felt what it meant. He was quite conscious, but did not speak, except a few soothing words to Jessie, who sat to his bed, pressing her hand to his withered lips. He soon slumbered, poor child, to the unconscious of the hour, for he was dying. That day and the following evening he wandered a little, and when the chapel bell rung begged to be allowed to go and pray to God: but a few words were recalled him to himself, and he smiled joyfully, saying "he would hear music no more till he heard the heavenly choir, and that he should be singing among the angels." He then lay quite still, and we thought he slept, for the bright smile was still on his face; but it was not sleep, he woke no more to earth or this world—his guileless spirit passed away to the heaven that Jessie's love filled.

I will not dwell on the mournful days that followed; it was Jessie's first real sorrow, and her grief was terrible for a time. God forgive me that even then it made mine so much more untenable that it was Hugh who comforted her, Hugh who first won a smile by talking of brighter days to come; of a love stronger, deeper than that of a father's; and her thick dreams less pale, and her much flowed more calmly as she listened.

Now, at that time, I envied my dear master's quiet rest in the grave! He needed me no more; there was one who loved him as I never could, one who had not rarely prayed my love was gone, and now all the seemed darker than ever.

The days went on, Jessie's step was regaining its lightness, and her voice its gay tone. It vexed me to see how little she felt, how little conscious of her grief, and hardly concealed that he was sad and she, woman-like, would meekly conceal all from me, for fear I should pity or be pained. I was not sure that I could receive his wife lovingly. As the time drew near I needed all my powers of sympathy and consolation to soothe her mingled hopes and fears: and I would not fail her when she needed me most. I knew she could tell what she was in my heart to part with her—my little, tender, gentle Jessie—to part with her to prosperity, to love, to happiness more than I could bear. It was well the last days were hurried: had that wretched time lasted longer I should have broken down completely, but as it went through it all I endure, unflinching, even that most miserable day of all, when she took Hugh's wife, and was left to be lone her arrow from me forever. How she wept when we parted, and sobbed out that no one could ever be so dear to her as I was! I felt that then, and that she would never, never forget me. And though he spoke to be gently, I saw a dark shade on Hugh's face at her words, and I was glad that like face turned toward me, her loving eyes uplifted to mine, but even before she passed the door she tried to smile on Hugh's face, and that I could not think she repented going any where, leaving any thing, with him."

I never saw her more again, and never may in this world; but her every look and tone still dwells in my memory, and I have to effaced from it, till I see her again in heaven.

I had a long illness after this; the exertions I had undergone overcame my weak frame somewhat. I hoped and prayed that I might die; but God in His mercy spared me, to learn resignation and submission to His will, and in the long days and nights of pain and weary loneliness that followed, I trust I learned to submit my will to His, and know and trust Him as my friend.

I recovered, though slowly. I had to leave the familiar house, where all my happiest days were spent, to be nursed by Jessie: my book was never still with me, and after a time I found interest in them and in my duties, and even in the every life could become like a dream, and my sorrow less acute.

A due time a letter came from Jessie. What a strange thrill the writing gave me! and I thought of the time when I taught her little hand to trace that letter, how proudly I laugh when her writing would fall on the paper and blot out the strange, mis-shapen characters. It was a very happy letter, full of Hugh's goodness, kindness, and most popular he was, and how proud she felt to be his wife, and how unworthy!" and there were affectionate inquiries and promises never to forget my brotherly love and counsels, all written in her pretty, childish, loving way. I was hopeful for a time after that letter had those that followed for some months: but after that it seemed to me there was a tone of sadness in them, something more and more. "She was not so strong as she had been, and Hugh was often away, and when he was at home he was much alone, because she was not able to be as gay as he was, and he would grow dull staying in alone with only her"—then she would try to cheer herself, I heard nothing more when a letter did come in the dear hand, it was so unsteady and different from the usual clear writing that I was much surprised by it. She had been very ill, and Hugh would not let her write letters, because he said it tired her; he did not know how she liked to write to me, and think and talk of the dear old home, or he would not have prevented her; she did no long to see it again, and thought she might yet get strong again if Hugh could spare time and money to bring her back there for a little while. I wrote word and he said she was getting quite well again, but she did not think so herself." Then she went on to say "she feared she had not prized her old, peaceful, happy home, and the tenderness and care she had ever met there, as she ought to have done, and prayed me to say to her when writing myself, she understood better now how precious and rare such constant loving care was." Poor Jessie, her letters words showed but too plainly that the sorrows and trials which I would gladly have given my life to save her from had come upon her—perhaps to be borne by her alone, for Hugh was not the husband whose misery every neglect or unkindness would be to gentle, daughter heart, I almost hoped it might be so. But oh! as I sat by my window lonely, and pondered over what was and what might have been, it seemed hard that my cherished flower had been taken from me to drop and wither in a foreign land. What would I give to be near her, to help and comfort and cheer her? But God knew best as our ways, and He was preparing joy and love for her such as I could not give; for it was the perfect love and perfect rest we may only find in heaven. I watched and waited wearily through that long, cold winter for tidings from it——but my heart misgave me when the wished-for letter came, for it was from Hugh. I knew what he had to tell before I read, for at Candlemas Jessie had been at two of golden hair dropped at my feet. What fond memories turned round that sunny curl—the little head nestled trustingly to mine on her hair streaming in the wind—the fair girl resting her head on her father's knee, his hand fondly parting the thronging curls—the child's sweet rapture, her hair having disordered over her black dress—the proud young wife, smilingly bidding her busy husband relieve her of the load in her arms—the long locks under her bonnet, because it made her look less like a child!—all her winning looks and ways that had won my heart, Jessie, my own cherished darling, was this to be the end of all? Bitter tears dropped on the precious lock of hair, and for a time I could find no comfort.

I or Hugh! if his affection for her had ever grown less, his friends had certainly not. His letter was written in great grief, and bitter self-reproach that he had never seen how ill she was, and had so often left her lonely. In short the new pain once through all her sufferings, and gentleness to all. She spoke of me nearly at the last, and bade Hugh write me a lock of her hair, dear dear love. She seemed quite happy and peaceful from the time they told her that she must die, only anxious to comfort Hugh, and delighted at his tender cares for her, though they come too late to save. She said he felt so much for her sufferings that he has proved himself of the treasure that had been given to his keeping, and that he felt I never could forgive him.

When my sorrow had grown more calm, I wrote to him such words of comfort and brotherly sympathy as I thought would soothe him. He was in the sea (which was long of coming) was constrained and short—the repentant mood had evidently left him, and I saw in his misfortune only the less calculator, harder man. I did not often hear of him after this; he married again, and has grown-up sons and daughters, and is estranged to me.

Since that mournful winter my life has glided by calmly and uneventfully, and it has not been unhappy. All the sadness has faded from the old memories, and they have made many a solitary hour seem not lonely. I have not been unoccupied poor and weak; but I have been enabled to be of use to those poorer than myself, freely giving the instruction that would not sell for gold, and for the gratitude (if not the affection) of many has cheered my path. I am old and failing now, and very humbly hope that soon with my failure from still rest under the stones of the cloister where in life I so often lingered—and my spirit join those I loved so deeply and lost so long ago, in that bright world where parting and sorrow are unknown.

THE CITY OF MESSINA.

We engrave on the following page the city of Messina, which is now the centre of interest in Italy. "In a town of about 85,000 inhabitants, situated on the south side of a deep harbor I have, or used to have, a fine trade, and an active fishery. The view from the hills is very fine. It was from the point of view drawn in our picture that Garibaldi looked down on the plain, and wrote the famous bulletin:

"Kennst du das Land wo die Citronen blühen."

A late traveler thus writes of Messina:

"Messina is a lovely town, founded by Orion of the Bell, and once called Zancle, from the sickle which fell from the hand of Saturn when he was flying from Jupiter. Its streets are of very desirable size, so bright they make one the sleepier as the waters reflect them. The grounds floors: behind, the stern heights of the Annunziata, or Eagle Mount, try to soften the glare. The Annunziata stands a wondrous view, though Etna is for the present veiled by enormous clouds.

"Within, Messina, for a Sicilian town, is clean and handsome; cholera having given the inhabitants a wholesome dread of their former filthy state. The Strada Ferdinanda runs spaciously through the town, and is lined on either hand by the theatre and other public buildings; walking is a new mobile statue of the present Bourbon, stamped upon the ground wherever a facsimile had been wrecked by the Messinese in the last revolution. Every thing looks fresh and new, and bent to get rid of the original. Fortunately, the lava pavement was dry, as it was originally covered with short granite blocks, generally placed in folded triangles, and numberless trifles, which we have christened arrabattole, ready to be bought for Christmas presents. The other streets were built much in the same style on a smaller scale, quite new in appearance, and hardly one of the houses more than two stories high. In case of being shaken down at any moment. The Victoria, a good hotel, with fireplaces and table d'hôte, kept by Germans of which there are an immense number of continental travelers in the Messina, where the palaces of the rich merchants stand, overlooking the sea."

THE CITY OF MESSINA, SICILY.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

THE BAIT FOR SHARKS.

THE NEGRO'S REVENGE.

[ANTONIO, surnamed El Matador, a sea-captain, and in reality a pirate from the Spanish Main, having excited the admiration of a company of actors and actresses, in Sicily, by a sudden passionate outburst, is requested by them to narrate a story, in order to elicit from him a specimen of his natural aptitude for the stage.]

Antonio. The shark had followed us for a week. Night and day, day and night, his lack-lin glistened in our wake—fifty fathom astern, it was always there. We had none sick on board; but we had been too busy cruising in the tropics not to know that at least one of us would lose the number of his mess ere the creature parted company with the ship.

The weather belong very sultry, the sailors became irritable, until if a man but chanced to look at another it gave offense, as if each thought his neighbor wished him to clut the monster's ravenous maw, and so settle the doom which threatened all alike. At length, on the seventh day, the third mate, a scowling Portingallo, quarreled with the black cook, Zanga, who, he swore, pot cockroaches purposely in the dishes that underwent the sable preparation of his most greasy hands. Now this Zanga was a tall Ashantee, who had been a king in his native land—a laughing, merry-hearted fellow, but proud as the Prince of Darkness after his own fashion. I did not hear all that was said between them; but the negro turned the laugh against the Portingallo, who was jeered at for his unsavory complaint. That evening Zanga's son, a boy about twelve years old, a child in arms when his father was taken captive, was seen on the forecastle playing, as was his wont, with the captain's favorite blood-hound, which it was his sole charge to feed. It had fallen a dead calm, and the shark had come some twenty fathoms nearer, and its huge sides gleamed ghastly with phosphoric light. We had some thought of shooting at it with a falconet; but the captain was in a surly mood, and would brook no waste of powder to gratify our desire. The next day the boy was missing, and when we looked astern for the shark it was no longer there (pauses).

An Actress. Nay, continue, I pray you. Had the poor child fallen overboard?

Antonio. I kiss your fingers, Señorita. During the morning the dog became furious, and twice flew at the Portingallo's throat; so that we were forced to chain the animal to the capston, being alarmed at his sudden frenzy. Had the Portingallo dared to leave the captain's wrath, he would have slain the hound with a boarding-pike as he lay there securely fastened, by turns growling and whining, his head couched motionless between his paws, his tail over and anon beating the deck with quick, impatient knocks, and the fiery glitter of his deep-red, bloodshot eyes following every movement of him whom he had so strangely assailed. During the evening there was a hot and noisy altercation forward as to whether or not the dog had captured the boy overboard in anger or boisterous sport. Some, among whom the Portingallo was most vehement, swore, with oaths and curses, that it was so. Two or three declared that the dog had been shut up all in the solitudes of the hour before they last saw the missing lad busy with his fishing-lines close to the open port-hole of a culverin. As for Zanga, he spoke to none, answered none, and none cared to question his grief. Have any of you ever chanced to see a negro's face turn ashen pale—all the villainous ink of his complexion precipitated from the dry parchment of his skin by the deep inward chemistry of an agonizing breast? That night, about eight bells, being toward the end of the Portingallo's watch on deck, a cry from the still surface of the sea, and in the lee way off, which seemed to vibrate through the ship's timbers, roused us from sleep. We tumbled up from our hammocks and looked anxiously around. Scarce a stone's throw distant, on the starboard side, in the very track of the moonlight, we saw the jolly-boat adrift, and in it the gigantic figure of the negro stooping over something which lay prostrate at his feet. It was the Portingallo, locked to the waist, gagged, and bound hand and foot. As we gazed the negro detached a second rope to one of those by which the Portingallo was already fastened. In the thrilling light of the moonbeams every detail above distinct and clear, as in the picture of a mariptorium lighted by a thousand tapers at high mass. The Portingallo himself shuddered as we saw the negro make this rope well fast to the Portingallo lay writhing in the boat before him. We saw his white teeth glisten again as he grinned in his revenge, and the metallic shine of agony on the Portingallo's face, and the sweat pouring down it, and the wrinkled anguish of his brow, and the bristling of his hair in the extremity of his terror; and then, last of all, we heard the gentle plash, as of the water as the boat swung with the slight movement, and the fretting of the rope, and each touch of their naked limbs, and the gurgle in the victim's throat, and the breathing of the avenger and the doomed. Your stage-lamps, ladies, do not cast so fair and true a light as that beautiful tropic moonshine on the face. Then the negro carefully lifted his victim over the boat's side, payed out his rope, and paddled a little distance off. His purpose flashed simultaneously upon us. He was fishing with a human live-bait for sharks.

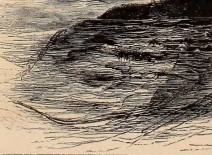
An Actor. Saints of mercy! And did none of you interfere?

Antonio. An Imperial lady at a ball-fight could not be more entranced than we were. A moment, a dark shadow rose from the water near the boat, and then another, and another, until a dozen sharks, small and large, slowly gathered their render-like tails, were poised in full sight beneath. When the Portingallo saw them he leaped half out of the water with a convulsive effort that nearly bent him double, as ye may have seen a fish on dry land jerk itself spasmodically toward ocean. The largest shark quickly turned and undersath; but Zanga twitched his line, and then a second and a third swayed to seize that living bait. Then the gag got loose, and the doomed man yelled to Heaven and to the ship for aid, and shrieked a brief and piteous prayer to be overbalanced, fell into the sea, and how but for the shark he would himself have raved him. But Zanga yelled with triumph, and they both yelled together, until you could scarcely distinguish between their cries, and untwist the sacred harmony of revenge from the howling discord of despair. Oh! revenge, I tell you, is the gift of the gods—the only joy that the grudging immortals freely share! So the Portingallo, as he fought for life, and the white man in his agony, until the ship's crew suddenly found their voices, and rushed to the culverins to them both; and the dog, who had got loose, bayed in fierce answer to all; and the sharks made a bubbling and commotion, that you would have thought hell itself had risen from the deep. But Zanga pulled his line no longer; and, like hounds in at the death, the sharks closed upon their prey, and the boat rocked to and fo, and the black danced, screeching and howling; and by the time we had lowered the gig and long-boat —both of which we found staved full of holes, as a woman's reputation when handled by a score of her own sex—we saw nothing save a few shivered planks, and a dark-red stain on the placid water, to tell us of the scene that had been there. Within an hour a breeze sprung up, within two it had freshened to a gale, within three we were scudding under bare poles. During four days the hurricane raged; on the fifth the ship struck, and foundered, and I alone escaped to tell the story of the Negro's Revenge. Be like to me, pale, ladies; there is nothing for the complexion, believe me, like sea-air.



ANECDOTES OF THE LATE SIR M. A. SHEE.

THE life of the late Sir Martin A. Shee, President of the Royal Academy, has just been written by his son. It contains little of interest.

Sir Martin's father was under medical treatment, in consequence of what appeared to be an ordinary inflammation of the eyes; his sight, however, had not been visibly impaired. On a certain day he had read the newspaper, had attended to his usual occupations, and was well enough to receive some intimate friends at dinner. While he sat at the head of his table, engaged in cheerful conversation with his guests, all around him became suddenly dark; the external world had vanished from his eyes instantaneously, and forever! His friends, however, knew him abruptly start up from his chair, and leave the room with uncertain steps, remained for some minutes in perplexity as to the cause of his departure. At length, alarmed by the delay, one of the company ventured up stairs to inquire after him, and, on entering the drawing-room, discovered his unfortunate host on his knees, audibly engaged in fervent prayer, and expressing his Christian resignation to the Divine will, under the infliction of so severe a chastisement for the sins of his past life.

Among famous persons whose acquaintance Mr. Shee made in the height of his fame, he became intimate with a certain Mr. A——, ostensibly a wine-merchant, but in reality a money-lender to the Prince Regent, and keeper of a gambling-house, whose magnificent hospitality was only a blind for the more effective pursuit of his victims.

As a curious illustration of what the King's highway was like, even in the suburbs of the metropolis, in 1795, we may mention, too, his acquaintance with Mr. (afterward Sir William) Addington, chief magistrate of police in London. "One morning, while Mr. Addington was rethrone[illegible] in the 'great chair,' and Mr. Shee was busy with his pencil, the servant entered and informed the sitter that a person, whose name he mentioned, was in the outer room, and wished to see Mr. Addington immediately, on important business. The magistrate, evidently somewhat excited by the announcement, asked leave of Mr. Shee to have the visitor ushered into the painting-room; observing that it was one of his officers, who came to him by appointment, and who had a communication to make to him, which need not interrupt the sitting. The request being of course granted, the functionary in question was at once admitted, and, anticipating the magistrate's eager inquiry, exclaimed in a tone of great exultation, and rubbing his hands: 'I have done it, Sir!—that him—stole him dead!—at four o'clock this morning!'—an announcement which was received by his chief with an exclamation of delight, and every appearance of the most lively satisfaction. After this little outburst of official hilarity, Mr. Addington, turning to Mr. Shee, who had witnessed the scene with some amazement, informed him that the individual who had been so summarily disposed of by the triumphant police constable was a certain notorious highwayman, whose depredations the magistrate had set his heart on effectually stopping, and whom he had recently taken measures to secure, dead or alive. It appeared that the unfortunate knight of the road had been, for several months past, infesting the localities of Wimbledon Common and Hounslow Heath, and levying abundant contributions upon sundry of his Majesty's lieges, who were adventurous enough to indulge in the dangerous practice of traveling post after nightfall. For a long time the police authorities had been on his track; but he had succeeded in eluding their vigilance. At length it was resolved to resort to stratagem for the purpose of securing him; and with the sanction of his chief, the intelligent official had, on the previous night—accompanied by another Bow Street officer of approved skill and nerve like himself, armed to the teeth—driven out in a post-chaise and four to the scene of the highwayman's most frequent exploits. After traversing in all directions the district which seemed most likely to attract his watchful attention, they were at length so fortunate as to fall in with him, while proceeding at a rapid pace across Wimbledon Common. Deceived by the style of the equipage, which he no doubt supposed to be conveying some traveler of importance, supplied with a well-filled purse, he boldly rode up to the carriage, as it approached, and called to the postilions to stop. As previously instructed, they promptly obeyed the peremptory order; and the robber presenting himself, pistol in hand, at the carriage window, encountered the muzzle of another pistol, pointed at his breast, and the next instant fell dead from his horse."

The celebrated Dean Kirwan, alive, although, to use the characteristic language of the Irish newspaper which chronicled the event, he had "renounced the errors of the Church of Rome to embrace those of the Church of England," was a friend of Mr. Shee's, himself a Catholic. This reverend gentleman, while in the zenith of his fame as a Protestant preacher, was one day walking in Dublin, "when an old apple-woman, with a basket on her head, who was advancing toward him in the opposite direction, suddenly stopped right in front of him, and staring at him full in the face, while she stood with arms akimbo before him, so as to obstruct his direct progress, exclaimed, with a strong brogue, and in a tone of much compassion,

"'Och, thin, it's a great pity!'

"'What is a pity, my good woman?' asked the Dean, rather amused at the exclamation.

"'Sure it's a mighty great pity, jew'l!' reiterated the mysterious fruitiere.

"'What do you mean?' again inquired Dr. Kirwan. 'What is a pity, I say?'

"The woman looked at him steadfastly for a few seconds, and then slowly replied:

"'That you'll be d——d, and you know you'll be d——d!' and so saying she stepped aside and passed on."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

VULTURES AND SHARKS.

WHEN Hardy had concluded his part of the tale he took the stump of his cigar into the wine-glass of ashes, as if he had no further use for either, moistened his throat with a bumper of toria, and almost unconsciously passed his left arm around Harry Darcentel's neck.

Scingo drank two bumpers, as if he had a particularly parched throat; but Paddy Burns and Tom Stewart, strange to relate! never wet their lips, and passed their hands in a careless way across their eyes, as if there were moisture enough there—as, indeed, there was; feeling, as they did, in the fonts of their own generous natures for their dear friend who sat opposite.

Piron's head rested, face downward, on his outspread hands, and a few drops trickled through his close-pressed fingers, but they were not wine. And as he raised his face and looked around the board, where glowing, sympathizing eyes met his, he said, in a low, subdued voice,

"I trust I may thank Heaven for avenging the murder of our child!"

Even as he uttered these words his gaze rested on the face of Durenard; and striking the table with a blow that made the glasses jingle, he started back, as he had stone on the frigate's quarter-deck, and exclaimed,

"Great God! can it be possible that that boy was saved from the clutches of the drowned Pirate?"

Not so fast, good Monsieur Piron! Not so fast.

"You shall hear more if you are not tired, gentlemen," resumed the Commodore, "though I have very little to add to what I have already related of the Coriqeole. Steward, let the servants turn in; and brew us, yourself, a light jorum of Antigua punch! Now, then," said Commodore Cleveland, "I'm your man."

"After we had sealed the guns on both sides of the Scourge, as Hardy has told you, the Captain thought it an unnecessary trouble to lower the boats to pick up the chips floating about the mouth of the channel; and besides, it would have been a bit dangerous, since the sea was coming in savagely, boiling about the ship, with a very uncertain depth of water around and under us; and, moreover, we had our hands full the best part of the night in repairing our running-gear, bending a new sail or two that had flapped to pieces when every thing was let go by the run in coming to anchor. Well, before morning we were in cruising trim once more, and ready to cut and run in case it was expedient to lose our ground-tackle, and get out of what we afterward learned was the Garote Gorge. But by sunrise the wind fell away into a flat calm, and with the exception of the long, triple row of sullen heaving in occasionally from seaward, we had no sign and spirit of our foe.

"After breakfast the quarter-boats were lowered, and Hardy took one and I got in the other, and we paddled in toward the head of the channel, between the Lion rock and the ledge on the opposite side.

"There was still a good many fragments of the wreck, which had escaped the reacting current and gone out to sea, floating about on the water; some of the timbers, too, of the hull were jammed in the black gums of the ledge, shrouded in sea-weed and kelp, as if all had grown there together. Further on, where was the foremast and topmast swimming nearly in mid channel, appeared as it were on a raft of the shrouds—twisted, perhaps, around a sharp rock below. The topsail was still fast to the yards, hoisted with reefed bonnets, and the sail was utter transversely to the masts, just as it fell under the raking fire of our first broadside, jerking over the main topmast with it.

"A myriad of sea-birds, from Mother Carey's chickens to gulls and cormorants, and even vultures and eagles from the shore, were flying over on the wreck as thick as bees—screaming, croaking, and snapping at each other with their hard beaks and claws; while thousands more were hurrying in from seaward, and either swooped down over the ledge or tried to find a place on the floating spars.

"The gorge, too, was alive with barracoutas and sharks, leaping out of water, some of the small, triangular fins cutting just above the surface, and sometimes even grazing the blades of the cutter's oars. I pulled slowly around the wreck of the foremast, and hooked on to the reef-ringle of the fore-topsail. The birds did not move at our approach; and when I had obeyed vulture snapped on the polished bill of the boat-hook, and left the marks of his beak in the smooth iron. Down in the clear green depths, too, the water was alive with ravenous fish; and we could see, as through glass, each of them with their heads fastened on to some dark object, rolling it, and biting it, and pulling every way; now low and then, but never on the clean-picked bone shining white in the limpid water as the mass was jerked out of our sight.

"The human, however, attracted our attention, and one of them sung out, as he pointed with his finger, 'I say, Mr. Cleveland, here's the captain at his post lying in the belly of the topsail!'

"I walked forward, while the men fired a few pistols to scare away the birds, and looked in. There, about a foot below the water, lay one drowned man and half the body of another, who had evidently been cut in twain, by a twenty-four-pound shot, at the stomach, leaving only a few revolting shreds of entrails dangling beneath the carcass. The other corpse was a large, burly, fat man, wrapped in a thick overcoat, with a knotted rope to confine it about midriff, and around his thick bare neck was a string of dark beads, holding a golden cross and crucifix, pendent in the water. The eyes of the one with half a body had been picked out by the gulls, but he still possessed a fine head of hair, sticking through a lace-lip under a fringe of wiry mustache, which gave me a tolerably correct idea of his temper even without seeing the eyes. The thick and shivered stump of the main-topmast, too, with the piratical flag still twisted around it, by some odd chance, as though we approached an eagle seized it in his beak, and tearing it, had tattered shreds of the cloth and the remains of the parted halliards streaming below his talons.

"The large lump rolling slowly over beside him had the crown of the head shaved, and the mouth and eyes were wide staring open, as if it was chanting forth a miserichord, for his own blasted soul. As I stood gazing at these revolting objects, and while the men were firing pistols and slashing the oars and boat-hooks around to drive away the greedy birds, a huge pelican, unmindful of power or us, but only looking swoop into the sea, and as he rose with it spread his broad pinions—nearly as broad as the sail itself—he held in his beak a small child from the Padre's neck, and as he slowly flapped his great wings and sailed away, with the beads dropping pit-a-pat-pat on the glassy surface of the water, a cloud of cormorants, gulls, and vultures took after him to steal his plunder.

"At the same time the sharks—many of them resting their cold, sharp noses on the very leech of the topsail—waiting like hungry dogs for a bone, with a thousand more diving and darting in the water beneath, at last cut through the canvas belly of the sail, and before you could think the floating corpse was within their separated jaws. In another moment the bodies rose again to the surface outside the sail and wreck; then another dash from the plunderers and a greedy dive and peck from the birds; and then a few bubbles and shreds of black threads, and that was the last of those wretches until the sea shall give up its dead.

"As for Hardy, he pulled higher up the gorge, and examined the rocks and peaks on both sides, but saw nothing living or dead, and we both returned to the ship."

Had Dick Hardy landed at the flat rock where the eddy swept in under the Lion's paws, he might have seen the footprint of a man, with a straw slipper in it, and following the track a few yards further, he would have passed his wounded comrade, Jean Bonhomme, in a mangrove thicket; and found too in his belt, snugly stowed away, a lot of gleaming jewels, with a sapphire gem of great value on the little finger of his bloody hand. But never mind, Hardy! You will hear more of that man one of these days, and you will have to thank him, though he will, perhaps; and, meanwhile, let him wander on in quest of fresh villainies over Spanish South America.

"Well, gentlemen," resumed Commodore Cleveland, "after I had made sure whether the mangled carcass we saw in the sail was the captain of that notorious Coriqeole, yet I felt confident of it from the first glance, for it was scarcely possible for him or a man of his crew to have escaped our fire and the water and rocks combined, in the channel, when the land-wind made, we tripped anchor and sailed away from the Coast of Darien."

"Come, Cleveland," said Piron, in a low, tremulous voice, rising as he spoke, "we must not push Cleveland too far to-night, for it is getting late, you know, and they keep early hours on board men-of-war."

"No hurry, Piron! I'll talk to you all night, if you have the patience to listen to me. No! Then I'll have the best manned." He touched a bell-rope that hung over his head, and the cabin door opened. "Orderly, my compliments to the officer of the watch, and desire him to call away the barge."

While some of the gentlemen in the forward cabin left the table, and stood about in groups chatting till the men were ready, Piron put his arm around the Commodore's belt, and they moved aft into the stanchioned stern-room. Little Mouse was lying sound asleep on the elegant cot, with all his clothes on, but with a smile on his face, which showed that he had not yet removed mother he would one of those days make proud of him.

"Cleveland, my old friend, tell me more of that young Durenard!"

"Hist! Piron; don't wake little Tiny! There's another thing to be done than to be an adopted nephew and the son of the gentleman who occupies that state-room opposite. But when we go out to Jamaica I'll tell you about his father, who has led a very adventurous life."

"Well, good-night! You will have young Durenard with you, and this little rogue to see here in the cot. My wife and her sister will be delighted to see you. Good-night!"

As the Monongahela's bell struck eight for midnight the Commodore's guests got in the barge and pulled toward the shore.

At the same time a light gig with handsome Harry Durenard went alongside the Roadie, and Commodore Cleveland received into his favorite cot opposite, leaving small Mr. Mouse to sleep his dream out till morning; while, as the barge ran up to the landing-place, a rocket rose, and a gold ounce was slipped into the old coxswain's locust paw, what did they all think about? Good night!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE BOYS OF THE IRISH BRIGADE.

"There has been a wonderful quantity of fine talent developed recently at Hastings, in which multitudes were freely used, and the Irish Brigade were conspicuous for their valor."—Leicester and Cheltenham Gazette from Rumor.

Oh! Larry, my ould boy, an' a pipe in my cheek,
Help Father, I'm come to rendezvous too!
But tell us why you're a-wearing such a sour-piece a day,
And divil a more—bowlin' glegry!
Then Connor and Dennis, and Sorin and Davenport,
Tisn't the Irish brogue, eh?
But the differ we'll be, if such doctrine you practice
To be one of the Irish Brigade.

Oh! the boys of the Irish Brigade, eh!

As for faction, fair, potthers—the divil a one!
I'd as lave be a Turk or Circassian,
As want my betre at divil, wid no fightin' nor fun,
Till blue-mondels for want o' diversion.
Oh my cock-tails wid Donald! They a crack at my head?
Why, Red Agent! let yourself! Who's afeard,
Or, Yes I'll do it," was the orig reply; "but it will be
Out in the Irish Brigade.

Oh! the boys of the Irish Brigade, eh!

A SERVANT ON SPIRITUALISM.—It is fortunate that rapping spirits, which seem very tricky beings, do not seem to be able to move street-knockers. Otherwise we should continually be going to answer a rap at the door, and coming back, saying, "Please 'm only a ghost."

THE PRACTICAL HOUSEWIFE.—"Sir," said, speaking of his wife, the landlord of a lofty house so tall was extremely proud of the domestic affairs—"Sir, she would have made a dumpling of the apple which revealed the law of gravitation to Newton."

A coxcomb, talking of the transmigration of souls, said: "In the time of Moses I have no doubt I was a Polish rabbi."

"Very likely," replied a lady. "Time has robbed you of nothing of your impudence."

"Mr. Smith, you said you suspected the prisoner was a rogue the moment you saw him. Why did you suspect him?"

"Becos 'e 'ired my rooms without bestin' down the price."

"Is this a rule without many exceptions?"

"Well, I can't remember any exceptions, yer worship; 'cause soon are baloneys stingy, and never satisfied himself that a man has a thousand acres of any thing for less pressure."

Sir Harry Mencrief, who was present at the marriage of Lord Meadowbank, told, as illustrative of Lord Eldon's love of money, a story told about seven in the evening, and that at a later hour the bridegroom disappeared, when, being sought for, was found absorbed in the composition of a "Form of Duties and Responsibilities."

Lord M——, with no very large portion of either wit or wisdom, was remarkable for his sarcasms, or rather cynicisms. When once in a large company, and quarrelling with his wife, he called her a "pestilent prattling pratick."

"When I happen to say a foolish thing," said Burke, "I put on a tragical face."

"I envy your happiness, my lord, then," said Charles Townshend, "for you certainly give the merriest life of any man in Europe."

"Good news, Behlool," said the Grand Vizier to a wit of Bassora, "your father-in-law, against whom you urged all the ages in his dominions."

"Long live the Padre, my father!" replied Behlool, "to obey my commands."

Whatever is done skillfully appears to be done with ease, and that, when ease matured in habit, vanishes from observation.

The wicked are always a stupid set to axe talent and ingenuity employed in their service.

Fast through a crowd of boys busy with their fire-crackers, and you will see how much more fond each lad is of his own particular cracker than of those of his companions. The same thing may be observed among politicians speaking of private talents.

Only what the mind drinks in with eagerness becomes thoroughly its own.

What is true sets the external and interior phenomena of our globe in harmony, but not so is it with error—for the extreme coldness upon the surface may exist in connection with heat in the interior.

The extreme pleasure we take in talking of ourselves should make us fear that we give very little to those who listen to us.

It is with charity as with money—the more we stand in need of it the less we have to give away.

Discontent will live and be vigorous on such slender fare that it is difficult to decide what it is to death, when it has once been brought into existence.

The Pekin Packet says: "Coming home, a few months ago, we saw a Chinese boy with a pig-tail, at the wharf-side of the street. By a skilled manœuvre we passed between them.

A gentleman, having to pass through a river which he supposed deep, told his servant to go before him. But he, to show his dexterity, replied, 'I will never be guilty of such ill manners. Pray, Sir, do you cross first, and I will follow.'

Tom, during his last tour to Niagara, in company with Sneak, saw an Indian beating a small piece of timber, and the following dialogue took place:

"Pray, Sir," said Sneak, "to what tribe do you belong?"

"The Chip-a-way tribe," replied the Indian, without looking up from the business of the moment.

A young lady has discovered the reason why married men, from the age of thirty years and upward, are more or less bald. They have to keep their hair flowing at their wives' long milliners' bills! Yet, it is certain, if we have all our hair cut off, we shall be guilty of causing a little anxiety" to her always scratches his head; and the happy pair are at once "at home."

At Volunteer Rifle captain, desiring to cross a field with his company, came to an opening in the fence large enough to admit only one person at a time to pass ahead. Unfortunately he could not remember the word of command necessary to convey information of the difficult task of filing through; but his ingenuity did not desert him, and he shouted out, "Single out, and then said—" Gentlemen, you are dismissed for one minute, and when you fall in, let the other side of them."

An Irishman entering the fair at Ballinagone, saw the well-dressed form of a large round head hanging out of the narrow slit of a dark cupboard. "Arrah! what's up wot his shillelah—down went the man. Forth rushed from the cupboard a little man, ready to avenge the onslaught. Judge of their astonishment when they found the mountain and the mole-hill were brothers-in-law! "Nicholas," said they, "and did ye not know it was himself Patheen ye'd be after knocking on the head? Arrah! be back to see for that tumor; but sure if my own father bore a brown, and a black eye, nothing to take out o'wonder, I could not have helped myself."

A popular preacher, who, like Orator Henley of old, has not only had the full introduction of a joke in his sermons, does not confine his fun merely to the pulpit. At a meeting of the Committee of a Bible Society for building of a new chapel, the list of contributors being read over, there appeared somewhere the names of "Jones, Knight, and King," the latter down for five shillings. "Dear me!" exclaimed the preacher, "I never knew before that a commoner—a duke, a knight, and a King too!—and the King but seemingly a humble individual—that a humble individual! Directly after a "Mr. Fig" was called out as having given a guinea. "Ah!" said the preacher, pointedly, "a guinea pig."

A story, which went the round of Oxford "high tables" a few years since, relates how a poor woman, having lost her husband, requested the Dean to preach his funeral sermon. He declined, but promised his consent, adding that the charge was two guineas. "Oh, your reverence," said the widow, "sure a poor widow woman, and can not have so much money!"—"Well," said the parson, "it is necessary to my usual rate to take less, but I can't afford to bring an old parishioner to trouble, and it will only make one guinea."—"Oh, Sir, but the good man has left a great deal to nothing, and there will be no funeral to pay for, and what not, and sure, Sir, you'll be having it to burial for a pound, if you'll only be after saying it."—"Yes, I'll do it," was the orig reply; "but it will be the last time I shall bury a Dean."

A gentleman was once walking in the streets, when a person overtook him and asked him the time of day. The gentleman stopped and, at sadly disappointed person exclaimed:

"Why, you've got a watch!"

"Yes, I have," replied the gentleman, "but it will never be guilty of such ill manners. Pray, Sir, do you cross first, and I will follow."

DAY AND NIGHT.—A widow lady named Day, having married a gentleman named Knight, a wag perpetrated the following parody at their expense:

"I've lost a Day, the widow sadly cries;
So took a Knight to comfort her bedside."

There are some men so morally that it is easy the fear of thwarting them our pockets that prevent us from turning our backs upon them.

Thomas Hood once admonished a gossiping Christian to beware how their piety should grow, after all, to be nothing better than Mag-piety.

Jeremy Taylor says that "a good wife should be a sweet bird, a chaste dove, a fruitful vine, a useful hive, and should make him as in her something better than himself."

A lawyer engaged in a cause tormented a witness so much with questions that the poor fellow at last cried for mercy, and said, "Sir, I tell the truth." thought you'd pump him dry!"

A country father having been charged with getting drunk the night before, and with his son's having declared that he was not drunk, but only incorrect meant to be, for it always made him feel so bad to be sober next morning.

"Will you have custard?" asked a polished gentleman of Aunt Deborah, at a dinner table. "Dear me, no!" she replied, with a shudder. "I'm fond of eats in their place, but I should as soon think of eating dog-soup."

A doctor and a solitary other were lately married of the same lady. A friend called on the latter and congratulated him on his success in the favor. She replied, that it was difficult for her to determine, as they were sure killing ones."

Smith had quite a small nose, and was short-eyed, while Jones had a very large nose. Meeting one day, Jones, offering him with a casual expression of the latter, remarked,

"Lucky for you, Smith, that you're cross-eyed; for if you won't, you never could see your nose."

"Lucky for you, Jones," instantly retorted Smith, "that you're not cross-eyed; for if you were, you never could see any thing but your nose."

The wealthy Marquis de Alegre, who died some time ago, was so parsimonious that, seeing his servant one day with a small chicken-bone, he reproved him for his extravagance.

"What is the old bat you gave me; I had it cooked for a friend."

"Fool!" said the Marquis, "but I did not know it could be restored. Here is the frame you paid—I will take the bone to the jeweller to have the removed hester to his own head.

Two London writers recently answering upon the subject of voting, when one of them inquired,

"Well, Jack, how are you to do when he don't know any thing about a matter?"

"Why," said the other, "I have got my cases about that; when any thing comes up, I look out for the case, and then I am safe. Suppose a duke I believe to be honest, or else I vote against it. I find it to be a general liking, I read over it to vote against every thing."

A good story is told of a man who went out one day to visit a former borrower, who had since fortunately grown from poverty to independence, and found him in the garden. Passing along a walk fanned on either side by the leaves of goodly looking corn, he said, by way of remark until he come to a potato patch, when he exclaimed,

"My friend, you'll have a fine crop of potatoes there!"

"Yes," was the reply, "I hope they will be so." When gentlemen and ladies pass through my garden they look at the flowers; but when a log comes in, all he can see is potatoes!"

A Paris correspondent relates the following: "I heard an amusing anecdote the other day of the power of French incompetency to master any foreign language. A young married lady, resided in Germania or a Dutchman was making purchases in the Champs d'Antin. At length she desired that the articles purchased might be sent or her address.

"And your name, ma'am?

"Beasley, Sir, I am not acquainted with my name; I have been married but a few days." "Then," said the Dutchman—Tenth 2—Tenth—o. If you will call on Sevant, who is at the door, I think he knows."

The only Magazine of the kind in the World.

THE AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, established 1838, contains Portraits with Phrenological and Biographical Sketches of Distinguished Individuals, Articles on the Science of Man—considered Physically, Intellectually, and Morally. PRACTICAL PHRENOLOGY forms a leading feature; is fully explained, amply illustrated with the portraits of the virtuous and the vicious; and its doctrines applied to all the practical interests, situations, and pursuits of mankind. The Laws of Life and Health are freely defined and illustrated, our motto being "A sound mind in a healthy body."

Young men about launching forth upon the activities of life, and anxious to start right, and understand their course, will find this Journal a friend and a monitor, an encourager them in virtue, shield them from vice, and to prepare them for usefulness and success in life. The previous acceptance will be discussed in the light of Phrenology only if necessary, and then only as may bear on what pursuit he would be most likely to succeed.

DYSPEPSIA!—DON'T GO INTO EC-STASIES about it, but if you have the remedy I have prepared will cure everything! It will cut sets a broken bone, cure "liver complaint," "nervousness," "poor blood," straighten a curved spine, nor, like most "empirical" nostrums, will it relieve the purse without benefiting an equivalent. But it will cure Dyspepsia—because the noble army of dyspeptics deserve it, and the cause of it. It is for sale at No. 863 Broadway, New York. A pamphlet describing Dyspepsia may be had free by inclosing a stamp for postage.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE believe that the present Number will be unusually attractive in those readers who desire some relief from the political discussions which form the staple of the Presidential Literature of the day. Its contents have been furnished by writers from every section of the country. The opening article on the "Red River Country" is the first of a series describing the Far West and Pacific. Life, Character, Scenery, and Adventure in that Northwestern region which is now so rapidly growing into importance. The paper upon "Japan" embodies the leading results of the observations of Mr. Lawrence, who has furnished altogether the best account yet published of the people of that interesting country. The Ballad of Vermont, which any civilized country has just left our shores. The biography of Benedict Arnold is the first study of his life in one of the most remarkable men ever produced in the political history of America. Mr. Arnold was the most lively American Story existence the writer's rare facety of depicting the Life and Character of the Yankee race, through which he has traveled. The admirers of Mr. Thackeray will find in the next Number of this work the pictures of the Four Georges, which are here for the first time published in America, and which have appeared in England.

These, with the other articles, including the varied contents of the "Editor's Drawer," form, the Publishers believe, one of the most attractive Numbers which they have been able to offer to their readers.

The Publishers would also request that they have so often said, that the Magazine will continue to maintain the sound conservative character which it has asserted. No article will be accepted or rejected because the writer of it agrees with or dissents from those views upon questions not connected with the subject in hand. But the Editors to whom the charge of the Magazine has been committed will exercise the most watchful care that nothing shall appear in its pages which shall permit it an unwelcome visitor in any household in any part of the country.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 188.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE METEOR.

WE engrave herewith three fine pictures of the METEOR which was witnessed in this section of country on Friday, 20th, from sketches by Mr. J. A. ADAMS at Saratoga Springs, by Mr. AVERY at Brooklyn, and Mr. M'NEVIN on Long Island.

The phenomenon is stated on all sides to have been one of the most wonderful of the kind ever witnessed. It was seen at Washington, District of Columbia, and in Virginia; at Buffalo, on Lake Erie, and at Detroit, Michigan; in the mountains of Pennsylvania; throughout New England; and at sea, 200 miles east of the Bay of New York.

By this time several volumes have been written and printed in the newspapers on the subject. Astronomers professional and astronomers dilettanti have all had their say; and now that we have heard it, what do we know about the meteor?

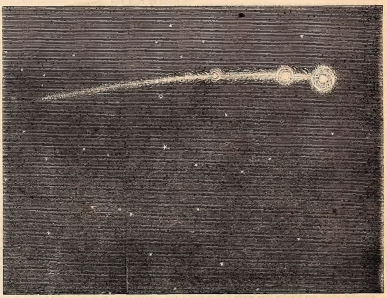
First, as to its shape. We have before us the reports of some forty observers, who declare that they saw it from various points, ranging from the Great Lakes to Norfolk, and from Pennsylvania to Boston. Most of them describe it as "two large balls of fire." But observers at Buffalo, Syracuse, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Newburgh, and Long Island say that there was but "one ball."

An observer at Washington and others say that there were two balls connected; another at Norfolk describes it as "two dumb-bells tied together;" and another at Poughkeepsie says that it was in the shape of a "bar." A sharp amateur at Brooklyn says that it was composed of five balls; or, as an observer in Orange County puts it, "five distinct nuclei," while another at New Haven is not disposed to admit that there were more than three, but allows that each had a distinct tail. At Philadelphia a leading authority saw "several distinct bodies."

Had it a tail? Several observers state that the meteor had a tail. Some, however, distinctly state that it had no tail, and was thus distinguishable from a comet. At Tarrytown a careful observer noticed a train of sparks following it, but separated from it; and most of the reports from this city confirm this view, though several do not. Those who deny the tail and say nothing about sparks, declare that it was followed by a train of smaller balls; which are variously stated at 2, 3, 5, and "several." At Newburgh, Poughkeepsie, Albany, in Connecticut, and in Pennsylvania, observers declare that the meteor threw off pieces, which were luminous—some say with a loud report, others say noiselessly.

As to the size of the meteor proper, and the length of the train, tail, or series of satellites, opinions are vastly divided. Many observers thought it was the moon, as it was about that size; a sapient watchman in Albany remarked naively that the moon was traveling more quickly than usual that night. Others report that it was the size of the planet Venus; at Newburgh it was found to measure three feet in diameter; several observers say that it was "as big as a man's head;" while two declare that it was "the size of a man's fist;" and in Westchester that it was only three inches in diameter. The length of the tail was reported at Boston to be ten feet lineal measure; on Long Island the tail measured 200 feet; at Albany, it extended "several degrees in length."

The color is as uncertain as the rest. On Staten Island it appeared red; red is also the color which met the eye of observers at New York, Buffalo, Hartford, and generally on the Hudson. But at Washington, District of Columbia, it was white; at Syracuse, New York, it was blue; in Jersey it was green; in Philadelphia, greenish; in Orange County, New York, bluish-white; on the Sound, silver and orange mixed.



It will thus be seen that, so far as the cause of astronomical science is concerned, but little advantage can be expected from the popular observations of the meteor. This will not surprise scientific students. The power of accurate observation of physical phenomena is an art only acquired by study and practice. Despite the proverb, very few men can afford to trust their own eyes. To say nothing of color blindness, which is more common than is supposed, there are but few persons in the world whose eye sight is so quick, and whose memory of perceptions so sure as to enable them to report accurately, even after a brief lapse of time, an image which has been impressed upon and then suddenly withdrawn from the retina. We do not suppose that any one of the forty observers whose reports are before us desired to mislead the public; yet, as the body seen by them all was the same (for all agree as to time and the direction taken by the meteor), it is evident that not much more than half a dozen of them saw and remembered it correctly. We are fortunate in being able to lay before the public the report of some whose profession it is to observe such phenomena, and to record them for future study. The astronomer Mitchell writes to the Herald:

"ALBANY, July 21, 1860.

"The brilliant meteor seen by your correspondent at Brooklyn was seen at this place by several persons. One member of my family saw it rise from behind a bank of low clouds, near but just above the tree tops. He thought it the fire of a balloon at first, but soon this light grew more intense, and when nearly one-sixth was above, burst, and presented a most splendid display. Two principal fragments, each followed by a train of lights, and not more than two degrees apart, pursued an easterly course, while at the distance of about eight or ten degrees several smaller fragments, less brilliant than the first two, followed in a straight line, with a faint train of lights. I was sitting in the middle of my dwelling, which faces the east. My attention was attracted by flashes, like faint lightning, which were visible two or three times. I rose, walked to the north end of the portico, to look northward for the cause of these flashes. Something, northward for the cause of these flashes. Something, I thought, in the clouds, and then saw that quite deep shadows were cast by objects near me in the yard, falling toward the north. I at once perceived the cause to be light of the meteor, as above described. I first saw it just under the northern constellation, or about 37 degrees above the horizon, and pursuing a line nearly horizontal it passed under the planet Jupiter (which it greatly exceeded in brilliancy), and continuing its course toward the east, it finally disappeared, while yet some eight or ten degrees above the horizon.

THE METEOR OF JULY 20, AS SEEN BY J. A. ADAMS, ESQ., AT SARATOGA SPRINGS.

THE METEOR AS SEEN BY S. P. AVERY, ESQ., AT BROOKLYN.

THE METEOR AS SEEN BY J. M'NEVIN, ESQ., NEAR BEDFORD, LONG ISLAND.

"As persons in Brooklyn, looking north, saw this object rise in the west and proceed in an easterly direction, and as in Albany it was seen to the south, we can conclude that the object really passed between Albany and New York, and we shall doubtless find accounts from those who saw it directly overhead, or passing from the west through the zenith to the east.

"I had time to note the hour and minutes, and found that the meteor passed at 45 h. 20 m. Sidereal time.

"I saw during the evening several small meteors, and the number was unusually large; very great, as we noticed to pass the field of the comet-seeker in the course of some twenty minutes.

"In case we can locate the meteor to have passed, as it probably did, about sixty miles south of Albany, its elevation would have been about twenty-seven or eight, and in case it was set on fire by entering the earth's atmosphere, at such an elevation it would have passed through about 870 miles of atmosphere, and, as I estimate, with a velocity of about 30 miles in one second of time. Probably any person have seen it in the zenith, the locality where it was thus seen will enable my one to compute roughly the elevation above the earth."

Mr. Lucien A. Kendall, late of the United States schooner Fenimore Cooper, on board of which vessel he was charged with the duty of making and recording meteorological observations, thus writes concerning the meteor, from Reading, Pennsylvania:

"9 45 P.M., July 20, 1860.—Wind west, and very light. No clouds to be seen, but misty to the northwest.

"Every direction where were seen nothing to rise from an angle of about thirty-five degrees, about west northwest, and extending about ten degrees. We witnessed a rapid course in an east and southerly direction.

"The first two were of a brilliant and pale olive, leaving a wake or train similar to that of a rocket. The other two, a little distance astern, were of a purplish color, and without a train.

"The whole thing lasted one and a half minutes, and formed a beautiful appearance, creating in the minds of some of our good people here the impression that all hands were about to be 'piped up' in a very short time."

Mr. J. A. Adams, whose sketch appears on the preceding page, writes:

"The double comet or meteor, as it appeared at Saratoga Springs on the 20th inst., moved apparently about as fast as a locomotive, and seemed to be only about a quarter of a mile distant. It traveled from west to east, and was seen looking directly south. I suppose there were only a little way above the tops of the trees. There were two balls, and the nucleus or one-half appeared to be large as a full moon, and as bright or brighter than that orb. The outlines of it were remarkably distinct and clear. Sparks appeared to shoot off in the rear of the balls, and follow in a train of considerable length; but I think it was not so, they were the sparkles of it following after, and not masses. I saw no change of color, or any explosion."

Mr. M'Nevin, who supplied us with another of the sketches given on the preceding page, writes:

"From my point of observation (Greene Street, near Bedford, Brooklyn, New York) a broad, brush, sword-like space opens gently toward Pacific Avenue—between which and Atlantic Avenue a line of houses will flourish. The avenues run from west to east, and this appeared between the ends of the sailing lines, at the proportioned altitude you perceive in the drawing.

"The meteor sailed slowly and horizontally, or against the wind, which was blowing then pretty freshly from the east. This circumstance dissipated my first idea, that it was an effect of Ex-rocks. But no sailing night could ever imitate the wonder of the heavens. The light was indescribably soft and pearly-diffused around, filled each moving globe; and they actually seemed intelligent —like spirits. And the reflected light upon the waters now was like that wonderful description of the Fairy Heroes of Hugo, in the scene of Bonny Kimony, in the 'Queen's Wake.' A startling, dazzling splendor which you breathless as it passed by; and a painful sigh followed its departure, for we beheld that not as a mere palpable intelligence pursuing its eternal messenger mission through the vast unknown spaces.

"It was so long in passing—so stately, silently, and slowly—that one had time to command thoughts and keep not to the gross, I followed it with my eye, and, instead of vanishing in a noiseless flash, it actually assumed the proportions of being foreshortened, and passed all the trailing globes into one reddish ball of distant flame, once by its amazing distance from us, and by the entrance into a cloud; and I believe that it passed in this manner all over the land. And this deepened the feeling accounts for the appearance, at first, of only one globe, and its seeming separation into many."

Much has been written about meteors, but very little indeed is known on the subject. The popular theory, at present, among astronomers is that they are substances of immaterial bodies, whose origin is unknown, and which revolve in space in obedience to the laws of gravity. Their number is supposed to be infinite. The law of their origin is undiscovered; we only know or believe that some 400 or 700 of them approach every year so near the earth as to enter the province of its attraction, which fall, and are called "meteoric stones." Their size most of course be various; Olbers thought a mile in diameter a fair average. From the meteoric stones which have fallen from them, their substance is supposed to be chiefly iron, nickel, and silicia. It is conjectured that their rapid passage through the atmosphere, when they approach the earth, ignites their substance and gives them the fiery appearance which is often observed. According to these theories, the meteor of 20th July is supposed by some astronomers to have been rather over a mile in diameter, and to have passed within twenty-five or thirty miles of the earth. To lay observers it did not appear to be over 500 feet from the ground.

It is rather disheartening to think that, after all our study, and all our observations, we have so little of such common phenomena as meteors; but when we reflect that, only a couple of hundred years ago, the appearance of the comet of July 20th would have been followed by general alarm, and that people throughout the country would have regarded it as the forerunner of pestilence, war, or famine, it will be perceived that the world has moved after all.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1860.

THE CROPS OF 1860.

THE farmers are harvesting their wheat as far north as the southern counties of Wisconsin. From Southern Illinois to Southern Wisconsin, and throughout Iowa, Indiana, Ohio, and New York, the crop is the largest ever harvested. Little or no mischief has been done by the fly in this and the adjoining States; and in the West, for the first time for many years, there has been no rust. In Missouri, Kansas, Illinois, we are informed on good authority that lands which have yielded, of late years, seven or eight bushels to the acre, have this year given eighteen or twenty; and nearly as large an increase is reported in the yield of wheat lands in New York and Ohio. Altogether, we presume that the amount of wheat harvested this fall in the North and Northwest will be very considerably more than was ever garnered in any previous year. In Missouri, Kansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and the Southern States, the want of rain has operated unfavorably on the wheat crop, and the harvest will be short. Happily, the country does not rely on these States for its wheat.

With regard to corn. Corn is a crop which does not require much rain to mature. What it requires is an open, fair season for planting in the spring, and a late frost for ripening in the fall. The former requisite has been vouchsafed: hence, since the first planted in the Northwest had the farmers so fine a spring as in 1860. Hence the area of land planted was largely in excess of the previous year. The crop is now fully one month in advance of that of last year. In Illinois and Iowa farmers count upon fifty bushels to the acre, and say that they will have nearly twice as much to sell and send to market; in other words, they will be able to supply all the Southern States with corn, will have enough to make it cheap at home, and will have, besides, a handsome surplus for export.

Cotton has looked uncommonly well till lately. The land planted would, under favorable circumstances, have justified the planters in expecting a crop of five million bales. Unfortunately, the drought has done much to check damage on the high lands, and a corresponding reduction must be made from the estimate. What extent of damage has been done to cotton by the dry weather nothing but the actual receipts at the ports can prove. The planters can afford to lose ten per cent. of their crop without falling much below the average crop of 1859. Should the full frost be early, the picking season will be abridged, and a further reduction from the estimate will be the result. We should it be late, as late as it was last year, the cotton crop of 1860 will yield more money to the Southern planter than even the crop of 1859.

Altogether, the prospect for the country of the United States, both North and South, is going to astonish the world this year. There are those who explain this by the studies of ours we will not realize the profit they should, because the foreign demand is not as active as it was four and five years ago. Those who argue thus forget the first principle of political economy, which is, that the development of commerce and industry are in exact ratio to the cheapness of food. Cheapness of food means commerce thrives, industry expands, prosperity becomes general; where food is dear, trade languishes, manufactures decline, and poverty and want suffers. An advance in breadstuffs in Europe implies a crop failure there, and involves an advance in the cost of food here, and also an increase of want and a diminution of commercial and industrial activity among the nations which are our commercial partners, and whose well-being is indissolubly linked with ours. A decline in breadstuffs secures cheap food not only to our own people, but to foreigners, and is the natural precursor of increased commercial energy and enlarged industrial enterprises.

Let no man dare to hope for higher prices for food. What the country wants is cheap food, and plenty of it. Should the bank God, we shall have this full and next spring.

THE OUTBREAK IN SYRIA.

We devote a good deal of space this week to illustrations of the recent anti-Christian outburst in Syria, which has cost the lives of several thousand men, women, and children professing the Christian faith, and laid waste the fairest valleys of Lebanon. The agressors are that peculiar race called Druses, whose faith is a mystery, whose origin is doubtful, whose morals of late years have been in fact as bad as is certain about them is that they are lawless, faithless, and blood-thirsty. The victims have been Maronites, members of a Christian guardian to that region—members of the Greek Church, Catholics, and Protestants. The only sect assailed has been the Christians; but all branches of the Christian Church have suffered alike and, for the time, the various anti-Christian sects seem to have forgotten their mutual hatreds to fall their common prejudice against Christianity.

It is impossible to read the accounts of the affair without recalling to mind the premonitory symptoms of the outbreak of 1857 in India. There, as in Syria, the Brahmins and the Mussulmans forgot their mutual strife to engage in a crusade against the Christians; there, as in Lebanon, no distinction was made among the Christian sects, but all were assailed alike. From what has been written on the subject of the Indian outbreak it would seem that the prevailing idea of the mutineers, before the outbreak, was that they were going to be proselyted by force. In Syria, too adverse opinions are said to prevail, and that the great European nations are indifferent to the fate of the Christians of the East; the other, that those nations have long had their eye on the country. The former notion rests on the basis of the Crimean war, in which, according to Asiatic notions, England and France saved Turkey, a Moslem power, to beat Russia, a Christian power, and thus took the side of Islamism against Christianity. The latter rests on the Hatti-Humayoun, or edict of toleration, which was extorted from the Sultan shortly after the Peace of Paris. It is well known that the edict is very unpopular among the Turks. A clear-headed missionary wrote some time since that they regard it as the beginning of the downfall of the Mussulman faith, and predicted that they would not submit to it peaceably. Furthermore, it is rather curious that, according to the most authentic accounts, the first idea of the massacre originated in Syria and not Arabia. It was from thence, we are assured, that those messengers started who traveled throughout Hindostan in the early months of 1857, calling upon their Mohammedans to rise and slay the infidel.

We are inclined to think that the Druse massacres will be found to have a common origin with the Indian mutiny. The worn-out religions of the Asiatic races are yielding on every side to the advancing march of civilization and Christianity; these violent outbursts of bloody rage are the natural precursors of the end.

In the mean time it may be hoped that France and England—which are mainly responsible for the defenseless position of the Christians in Syria—will now set to work with energy and vigor to protect those who are left. A few more weeks of inaction, and Beyrout and Damascus will share the fate of Zeyleh and Rayshiya, and there will hardly be a handful of Christians alive in Syria.

THE AGONIES OF THE JAPANESE COMMITTEE.

IT is reported that Aldergnan Boole is going to perform the "Happy Dispatch." The cause of the catastrophe is an application lately made by Mr. Gunnybags for an injunction to restrain the Controller from paying $105,000 for the entertainments given to the Japanese, in which so many rowdies and shoulder-hitters are said to have participated. We presume that Mr. Chatfield is an impertinent person, and that the memory of Boole should be kept fresh in our civic records.

Why should not the shoulder-hitters be fitted at the public expense? They bear the weight of our municipal government. They elect Aldermen, Councilmen, and Congressmen. While Gunnybags and Cotton Pork, Esq., are lounging in their drawing-rooms, or footing up accounts in their offices, the shoulder-hitters are busy with the affairs of the city. You find them at primary meetings, at ward committees, at ratification meetings, and, other twice or thrice than once, at the polls. If any man have the public interest at heart it is they. Who, then, has a better right to the public moneys?

But one thousand and five thousand dollars!

'Tis a large sum, doubtless; but then think of the number of shoulder-hitters who rely upon the city for support! Why, the whole sum will hardly pay for a coat and a week's drinks for each of them.

This Chatfield says that the Aldermen not only sold tickets for the Japanese Ball, but bargained for a commission of thirty-three per cent. on their expenses here. It is time we began left to stop this Chatfield's mouth! It is to be endured that such scandals as these shall go abroad in an official form? Why should not the Committee sell the ball tickets? They covered them, and every body knows that they wanted money. It is all very fine for Gunnybags and Cotton Pork to growl now, but where was their growl when Boole and his fellow-committeemen wanted votes on the day of election? Was Gunnybags at the polls that day? Did Cotton Pork register his vote like a man? Nowhere were both "too busy." Gunnybags never votes: he considers that sort of thing beneath the dignity of a bank director, and a man whose paper sells at six per cent. Let them eat the leek.

We hope, for our part, that the Committee will compel the Controller to pay the bill, and that the shoulder-hitters will get the reward of their labors. We are sorry for Boole; but we can promise him a handsome funeral, and some tax-payers, at all events, will drop a tear on his tomb.

WEST POINT SATURNALIA.

We have heard of no inquiry into the rumors mentioned in our last number with regard to the diet of the West Point cadets. We reiterate our statement that it is currently reported that the food supplied to the West Point cadets —the flower of our youth—is not nutritious, and often not wholesome; that the business of supplying to them is one of those contracts which require incessant supervision. Is any one going to look into the matter? Or are the authorities so busily engaged in politics that they have no time to inquire into a matter involving nothing more important than the health and life of two hundred of the finest young men in the country? Has Colonel Delafield nothing to say?

THE STEAM PLOW.

On a recent tour through the Western prairies we were rather surprised to find that the steam plow was comparatively unknown. The farmers had heard of such an implement; but they believed it was a mere ingenious toy, and broke their hands as of old with the horse plow.

There must be some mistake somewhere in this matter. Several dozen steam plows are, we believe, patented here and abroad. It intends to review in full the mechanical genius of the West, steam ought to be a much better servant for the farmer than horses. Either the plows which are now patented are more than incapable of doing real work, or the Western farmers are neglecting an invention which they would save money by using. Where is the flaw? In the farmers or in the plow? We leave this agricultural authority will take up the subject and let the public know the facts of the case.

THE LOUNGER.

THE SEASON.

THE pleasant part of the year is pleasantest every where. Even the city is never so really agreeable as it is in summer. Of course I do not mean the actual dog-days and July and August, but the end-quarters—the city as residence—the city as a point of departure for the sea-side and the hills—and also the city as a place to stay in on summer evenings, when the people sit at their doors, and there is a murmur in the streets—a scuffling of young women, and a hum and talk—a flowery fragrance in a distant street—the cry of the ice-cream merchant—and a little way down town and a little way up the sunset lingers—and Jersey City, the Winter Garden—and the bright shops and loitering people.

The great point of the city in summer is comfort. You have your spacious room with the draught blowing from the front to the back of the house—you have the well-known sofas and lounges and nuzzeas—every thing is in its place, and that is a great deal of it. You have, as it were in comfortable drawers: they are not jammed and folded into a trunk or bag; and the events of your stirs in your life all that have any value. Every thing is still and at ease. There are no calls. The bell rarely rings. The parlors are dim and cool, and smell of distant gardens from the door of the straw matting. The candelabras—the chandeliers—the pictures frames, are all softly silvered by cool-colored light. And the whole air has the sated, languid, actually smoking in the sacred fragrance of the cigar. And there is that exquisite flavor of stolen fruit, you look around at the pretty masquerade, and the events of "society," the ball, the dinner party, the "first night," all float away into a dreamy distance, and you can smile at the good but deluded people who have carried all these things with them out of town, and are busily repeating a New York January in a Newport August. As you lie, lost in your own cloud, Edith over the way has her side staid at home this summer, seats herself at the piano. The windows are all open. The moon shines full and clear, and the shadows of the trees checker the sidewalk. Across the street the rich chords of some of Liszt's translations of Schubert's songs float into your parlor. They are the songs of the summer night. They have all its fullness, its pathos, its mystery, its power. Do you understand German? She is playing "Du bist mein bester Ich!" How charming a summer evening is in the city! How invisible they are over the way not to go out of town!

In New York, indeed, we have no proper "season" in the summer as they have in London—but no charmingly described in a late number of Once a Week by the gay humorist who signs himself Gamma. In London the season of "society" is at wide summer. Then Parliament is met, and Gladstone makes speeches—then the opera usually doubleheaded, opens its street mouth and sings—then fashion gives its prettiest fêtes by daylight upon English lawns ("Sir Walter Vivian, all a summer's day") and Hyde Park Row is crowded with fair horsewomen and brave men—then the great concerts call to you, and at Chiswick and Kensington and Harman's Park the flower festivals unveil their gorgeous faces—then the pictures, including Mr. Holman Hunt's last, for which forty thousand dollars has been paid, take the field and the town —then that wonderful, delightful London "life" rises to its highest sparkling point, and the man who stands upon it no city in the world is half so intoxicating and agreeable. "Oh no!" exclaimed a famous Englishman to the Lounger, as they sat dining at the Century one perfect May-day at the end of the month—"oh no! it is the end of May, and I am not in London!"

No; we are out of season when London is deepest in it. And in our climate, which has something of the ferocity of the Tropics, it is precisely that it should be so. The city is given over to comfort and coolness. The streets swarm by day, indeed, and you might laugh to hear that every body was out of town. But at night all so many dispersed by water and roll that the harpy fly, who stay at home have a sense of relief which is itself a refreshment. You others, you poor fellows who are upon active duty at Saratoga and Newport—you have the sympathy of those who stand at ease. We are in undress here—and hope your dress-coats it comfortably. We lounge about in slippers, and hope you find the snug boots pleasant. Yes, Tom smokes reclined at length in the cool airy parlor, and he Edith playing upon the piano in the street, and hopes that Dick and Harry are satisfied as they prance and the lively Aurora down the shining crest of the "Ocean."

Doubtless they are. Certainly they ought to be. Let those have that who. But we confess to agreeing that all pleasant places are pleasanter in the summer.

SHORT SKIRTS.

WALKING up Broadway the other morning I met a very pretty modest-looking young woman who wore a "Bloomer." She was accompanied by a young man who carried an umbrella, which he held over her head. As they passed every body turned and laughed. The young clerks in the stores and offices winked at each other and smiled good-humorously. The whole street was attentive and amused; but the pretty young woman passed along—it was in the very shadow of Trinity—not without blushing, but undoubtedly with the profound conviction that she was in good Sod service, and that, if she were martyred by the light look and laughter that followed her, she was at least martyred in a noble cause.

Nobody knows, who has not tried it, how hard it is to do what that young woman was doing; to make yourself conspicuous by some unaccustomed air of appearance or conduct that the whole street stops to stare and smile. But what has a young woman gained who wears a short skirt and long trousers in a day and country where every body wears long dresses? Is there any thing really heroic in heroically protesting against a fashion which can not seriously involve principle or health? Granting that the flesh hoops have—is not the whole crinoline style of the street heavier? Granting that there may be a little more comfort of body in short skirts, does not the whole mental discomfort of such a public attention entirely outweigh it? There is something which may justly be called ludicrous in exposing there feet? Is there not a point when a protest becomes disproportioned. A man may gravely think that, as a matter of grace, the old Roman toga or the Greek tunic is preferable to our body-coats, and he may hold that grace is a visible index of civilization and of Christianity if he should, for that reason, go to Wall Street to draw his July dividends, clad in a toga and wearing sandals of classic fas hion—the effect and refinement which he had in view would be entirely lost in the extreme ludicrousness of so unusual an effect. The abstract argument would not avail a moment against the hearty laugh of common habit.

In non-essentials, uniformity is the golden rule of wisdom and charity. A man who considers the cut of a coat or pantaloons a matter as sin and shame he deems a false faith may be a very good and honest man, but he is certainly not a very sensible man. A man who would stand all day in the pillory rather than wear a blue felt hat, when he wanted to wear a brown felt, may be a very obstinate, but he is not a very wise man. His conduct indicates a want of common sense which would weaken his whole moral character and vitiate his influence.

Of course the case would be changed the moment the color of a hat or the shape of a coat became symbolic. If in Naples the friends of the little Bomba were blue felt hats, and those of Garibaldi brown felt, and the distinction were recognized and understood, then the color of a hat is no more a non-essential—it is of the first importance; and the Garibaldian who should wear a blue hat would be guilty of falsehood and treason to liberty. He would be precisely as guilty as if he advocated the cause of Bombetta, and gave it his moral support. By encouraging the Government he incites it to shoot his comrades, and he is so far guilty of their death by wearing a blue felt hat.

But, oh pretty young woman in the short skirt and the long trousers! walking, as you do, in prison, under the umbrella, there is nothing of all this in your case. Do you not observe the immense disproportion between what you are doing and what you wish to do? Do you think hoops ugly? Yes, but remember that fashion or habit is as potent as any other law, and you must withstand it by fun and ridicule or by serious argument. It is not enough for you to wear skirts without hoops, because that does not make hoops seem ugly, but it makes you seem supremely ludicrous. Observe, dear young lady, that long or short skirts, hoops or no hoops, are equally fashions, and a person who deliberately outrages a fashion does not hurt that but harms himself.

SICILIAN MATINS.

GARIBALDI has a hard task. To rouse an oppressed people to recover their liberty, and to lead in the way, is not so hard for a man with a heroic nature. But to teach a passionate people, who have been degraded by that long oppression, to govern themselves, or to maintain a patient waiting, without exasperating jealousies, is a work for the choicest and wisest of men.

Our own revolution was permanently successful because, by a happy combination of conditions, the government into which was thrown off had not been, upon the whole, an oppression. It was the effort to make it so that precipitated the movement against it. It was by no fault of Jefferson that Washington himself could have extricated us safely from the hands of Britain and set us upon our own feet, if we had not had the habit of self-standing on them, and kicked only when Britain tried to lift us off.

Moreover, to complicate the difficulty for Garibaldi, the great Powers are jealous. France wants Naples to be content with the Constitution of 1812. Austria has announced that the first Italian war marches again to the Mincio she will not march alone. Prussia nods assent to this threat. The Government is zealously watched that what she does must be done secretly. To help him, Garibaldi has notified the people of Sicily, the sympathy of Sardinia, and Lord John Russell, who recently said in Parliament that England would not interfere from the principle that the Italians had a right to choose their own government without interference. This, of course, is the true principle; and Louis Napoleon would be glad to see it when he gives him Savoy and Nice. But when it may give Sardinia Naples, he is not fond of it.

Yet why should Naples not give Sardinia, if it wishes, as much as Savoy to France? The Emperor is stringent upon the point of natural boundaries. Can that be any reason for the natural boundary of Italy? Russia complains of a new and inconvenient state, and threatens the exercise of power. But the Viennese doctrine of the balance of power can not be maintained in a new age. The Italians have a language, a history, a people, with the same language and traditions; and if they choose to bury sectional differences and unite the parts in a monarchy, there is no right reason for any other nation to interfere.

Garibaldi's action agrees with Kossuth's principle. They are both democrats, but both friends of nationality as the basis of states. Their idea of the natural boundaries is truer than Louis Napoleon's, for it is not arbitrary. There is no reason why the world more distinctly defined than the Italian. The effort of Garibaldi to unite with the world hungry with each eager attention and kindling hope, is only an act in the great drama of the revolution of liberty which is to be the closing scene, ing in Italy for many years; but with every successive effort it reaches further forward. Each successive effort is also more "free" and each step before the breach; but his body is the helping stepping-stone of the one who follows, and at length the breach will be forced.

THE GEORGES.

THE reader of the August Harper will find the first of Thackeray's lectures on the Georges, which he first delivered in New York in the autumn of 1855, and which is now publishing in the magazine. It is the most delightful of the course upon the English Humorists, in which he touched up the fading portraits of writers who were to be more permanent than their subjects. He was kindly and fresh a color, there was great curiosity to hear the new lectures. The delivery of the first was followed by some slight feeling of disappointment. But when the necessary scope of the subject was remembered, there was greater pleasure, because there was no call for disappointment.

The Georges were not heroes, nor were they saints, as Macaulay has made them. Thackeray's personal tread of some of the most eminent men who adorned the Georgian era, and in his second the subject was treated with the same ease as the full title he now gives to them explains, "Sketches of manners, morals, court, and town life." As such they are to be read and studied. For you do not care to read about the Georgian morals and manners, very well. But it is marvelous good reading for all that. The style is so easy, and the tension as detestable food because you have no stomach for it. The lives of saints are by no means the most useful reading, nor is Gordon's Search of a Wife to be classed in that category. In pictures of the times the lectures upon the Georges are delightful; and the clear, house-thrusts of satiric humor are most racy, as in the supposed case of the fashionable lie-detector which was invented of George. A few touches, a few facts picked out of that extraordinary pile of rubbish and riches, that memoir of Horace Walpole, suffice to build up a dozen lumps judiciously disposed in a dark room; they light it up, and every thing becomes visible.

Lectures like these are invaluable in destroying any foolish prestige that may chance to surround royalty. As a rule, kings are undoubtedly worse than other men. But they have great excuses. I remember once hearing Thackeray, in one of these lectures in New York, it was said that he would not dare to read them in England; that it was an unworthy task for a man to speak ill of kings to Yankees of English kings, and some Canadian papers were especially furious. Now, not only did he return to England and deliver them at home with a success which no lecturer has ever rivaled, except Albert Smith; but long before he came to this country he had put upon record his estimates of the Four Georges; and I will quote three of them here, omitting the Third George, which is too long. They appeared in Punch, as follows:

"THE GEORGES. As the statues of these beloved monarchs are to be put up in the Parliament palace, we have been favored by a young lady (connected with the court) with copies of the inscription which are to be engraven under the images of those stars of Brunswick:

GEORGE THE FIRST, STAR OF BRUNSWICK.

He preferred Hanover to England;
He preferred his mistress to his wife;
To a beautiful and innocent Wife:
He hated Arts and despised Literature;
He liked train-oil in his salads,
And gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters:
And Architecture as well as a Minister,
Consistent in his Preference for every kind of Corruption.

GEORGE II.

In most things I did as my father had done:
I was false to my wife, and I hated my son.

My spending was small and my avarice much;
My Kingdom was English, my heart was High-Dutch.

At Dettingen fight I was known not to blench:
I snivelled and fled from the field, and I funked a French.

I neither had morals, nor manners, nor wit;
I wasn't much missed when I died in a fit.

Here set up my statue, and make it complete—
With Pitt on my right hand, and Fox on my left.

Thackeray was kinder to the Third George in his inscription, as he is in his lecture. Here is

GEORGIUS ULTIMUS.

He left an example for age and for youth
That were better avoided and shunned:
He never acted well by Man or Woman,
And was as false to his Friends as he was to his Wife.
He deserted his Friends and his Principles.
His was as Ignorant that he could scarcely Spell;
But he had Wit enough to Keep Sporting out Creats,
And an indomitable Taste for Cockney.
He built the Brighton Pavilion and Buckingham;
And for these qualities and Proofs of Genius
The Prince Regent
Christened him the "First Gentleman in Europe."
Friends, respect the King whose Status is here,
And the proper way to respect him is to be admired.

A man who had talked paving stones was not very likely to be afraid of talking pebbles. When he came to write the history of our history as impartially as Thackeray writes these of the Georges we may call him to account. Who will dare to tell the whole truth of the First Franklin in the style of the lecture upon the First George?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A "DANIEL"—A "cute Yankee lawyer, pleading for a burglar against whom the case was clear, contended that it was impossible that the prisoner had introduced more of his person than the upper part into the house in question, namely, the head, for he said to enter a house was only one half of his body is in and the other half out?"

Not bad. "I shall have the whole matter to the jury. They must judge of the law and the facts as proved," said the Judge to the counsel for the prisoner. "I am on one half of the body from the waist up, and "not guilty" as to the other half." The jury pronounced the guilty half to be two years' imprisonment, leaving it to the prisoner's counsel to have the "not guilty" half tried for itself. Each one of the two halves was sentenced to one year.

DOES IT?—In his "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character," tells us of an old lady who liked a party of squabbles, for the reason that it nervously over-excited and invite the ladies required to make up the game, and her directions were as follows: "Noo, Mrs. Tamson, ye're to play Lady Curragy's, and soak my compliments, and ask the Lady Curragy if she remembers how kind she was to Mrs. Carmiggs, to tea this evening; and if they canna come, ye're to tak' the Lady Curragy's and the jolleens to the company; and if they canna come, you may gang to Miss Jean's below, and ask her if she'll play Lady C.," also canna come, ging to Lucky Speat's, and but her come."

A little girl, showing her little cousin, about four years old, a fish, asked her if she can see up there? "Yes, more than this world." "No, it ain't," said he. "Yes, it is." "No, you don't it crep tha tail off!"

I once heard Lord Brougham, who was a fast man, ask dear old Mr. Justice Mellor, of convivial memory, "Have you ever been in the habit of saying, 'A sober as a judge.' It was a good hit, and we all laughed heartily at it. "Well, then," said Mr. Justice Mellor, "as soon as I hear of those old saws are. They are characteristic. at least; and I shall say to my wife, 'I'm a Judge, as loudness' is nobleman. Thus we say, 'As sober as a Judge,' and as drunk as a Lord."

A harangue in Parliament or Congress in favor of decency and order is a rare occurrence.

We are told that in making a fashionable lady's dress the needle of the seamstress must travel a thousand feet.

The ladies need not take it for granted that he who is always trying to be cheerfully to them across the street is always a "right lower."

A wag, being asked the name of the inventor of buttons, replied that it was probably Cadmus, as he first brought letters into Greece.

When Mr. Harris, of Salisbury, made his first speech in the House of Commons, Charles Townshend asked, with an affected surprise, who he was? He had never seen him before.

"Ah! you must at least have heard of him," was the reply. "That's the celebrated Mr. Harris, of Salisbury, who has written a very ingenious book on grammar, and another on virtue."

"What, then, brings him here?" said Mr. Townshend. "I am sure he will neither find the one nor the other in the House of Commons."

* Thackeray has changed this opinion, as he shows in his first lecture.

NOW HELL KNOW!—Hayman, a famous artist one hundred years ago, was a wit. One of his associates was always complaining of ill-health and low spirits, without being able to assign any particular malady as the cause. One evening at Hayman's club it was mentioned that this malade imaginaire had been married the day before. "I bet!—and he hanged to him!" said Hayman. "Now he'll know what ails him."

"Why do you always walk with a stick?" said a gentleman the other day to a friend, on meeting him in the street. "I keep off dogs and infirm, I am not well regarding those who make use of walking-sticks as idlers, or persons having nothing to do."

"Now I think quite the reverse," replied his friend; for I always take them as indications of the most active and industrious character, who, you see, always like to have something to do."

A friend of ours says that he has been without money so long that his head aches, "ready to split," when he tries to remember what a five-dollar-bill looks like. The notion that "we live in a world of change" is a great fallacy.

If a man attacked my opinions in print would I reply? Not I. Do you think I have understood what my friend, the Professor, long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy? Do you think I would waste my time? Well, I'll tell you. You know that if you had a boot-tree, one side of which was false, and a pair of pantaloons, the false leg enough to hold the seam, water would stand in the same height in the one as in the other. Truth is opposition facts and wise men in the same way, and the fools know it.

Dr. Buckland rode a favorite old black mare, who was frequently caparisoned all over with heavy bags of fossil and prehistoric remains. The old mare once journeyed her duty, and seemed to take an interest in her master's researches; for she would remain quiet whatever was to hold her, while he was examining sections and strata, and then patiently wait to be loaded. She was becoming but weighty specimens. Ultimately she became so accustomed to the load that she would stop of her own accord at a stone quarry, and nothing would persuade her to proceed. If any one had got off and entered the quarry, or a stranger to her, pretended to examine the quarry, the one sure method by which he was to expedite from the falling stones as he was climbing up the side of one of those quarries. He was told of the danger by one of the by-students. "Never mind," said he: "the stones will spare me."

"It will be more expense repairing that its original cost."

"I don't mind that," said the tar, "so you give me a receipt to double the original cost, for I have a vexatious of the watch."

"What might you have given for it?" said the watchmaker.

"Why," replied the tar, "I gave a fellow a blow on the head for it; and if you repair it, I will give you two."

"My child, take these eggs to the shop, and if you can't get sixpence a dozen bring them back." Jemmy returned with the eggs, and quietly saying, "Mother, let me alone for a trade; they all tried to get 'em for a shilling, but I screwed 'em up sixpence."

A traveling tinker lately put up at a country inn where a number of gentlemen were assembled to dine. He was at the same time, and attentively listening to their discourse, when he suddenly turned and asked the company if they supposed he had been offered for his dog, Ponto? They all said, "No." "Then you are wrong," said the tinker, and pointed to know. One guessed five shillings, another a ten shilling piece, another a pound, till they had named their patience, when one of them seriously asked how much he had been offered. "Not a half-penny," he replied.

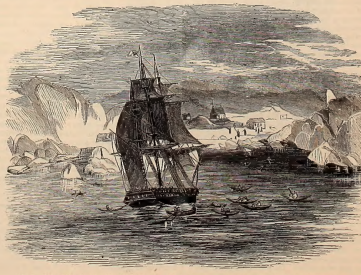
A TELEGRAPH LINE ROUND THE WORLD.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH ROUND THE WORLD.

WHILE the Atlantic Telegraph Company are working slowly to ascertain why their line won't work, other proprietors are developing new schemes for telegraphic communication between the Old World and the New. Col. Tal. P. Shaffner, an engineer of experience, who has spent several years in Russia and Denmark, obtained, in 1854, a concession from the Danish Government of the right to lay a submarine wire between the Danish islands on the north of Europe and the adjacent continents. He has lately formed a company to carry his scheme into execution; and we publish herewith a map which shows the line on which his wire will be laid.

He connects with the telegraphic system of Europe in the north of Scotland. Thence he proposes to lay a submarine wire to Thorshaven, in the Faroe Islands—a distance of 225 miles, with a maximum depth of water of 1000 fathoms; from the Faroe Islands the wire will be laid to Reijkiavik, Iceland—a distance of 300 miles, with a maximum depth of water of 1000 fathoms; from Iceland the wire again traverses the ocean to Greenland—a distance of 600 miles, with a maximum depth of 1540 fathoms; it travels across Greenland in the usual way on poles, and from the western shore crosses to Hamilton's Inlet, on the coast of Labrador—a distance of 600 miles, with a maximum depth of 2090 fathoms; from Labrador the line would connect with the Canadian system of wires.

COL. SHAFFNER'S TRANSATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.



The chief advantage of Mr. Shaffner's project is that the longest circuit operated continuously would be 600 miles. It will be remembered that, three years ago, grave doubts were entertained by scientific men whether the magnets used by the Atlantic Telegraph Company could send a spark through the whole length of the wire—say 2000 miles. Before the wire was laid experiments were stated to have been made which proved that the spark could be sent swiftly and surely through more than 2000 miles of wire. But since the actual laying of the cable its performance has revived the old doubts. It is certain that the currents were from the very first quite feeble, and soon became imperceptible altogether. Mr. Shaffner's scheme obviates this difficulty. The longest stretch on his line would be 600 miles—a distance which opposes no serious obstacle to the transmission of the electric spark. The chief obstacle in his way is the prevalence of icebergs on the shores where he will land his wire. Many fear that the bergs, in grounding, would infallibly injure the wire. Mr. Shaffner states that he does not apprehend any danger from this source. He intends to run his wire into inlets where no icebergs penetrate.

The British Government have granted a steam vessel to the promoters of this enterprise for the purpose of re-examining the soundings. Another vessel, owned by Mr. Schaffner, has also been dispatched on the same errand; and we may shortly expect to hear of the result of the expedition.

Meanwhile an enterprising German has gone still further than Cyrus W. Field or Shaffner, and proposes to girdle the earth with a net-work of telegraphic wires. He suggests that wires for this purpose may connect Europe, by way of Siberia and Behring's Straits, with North America; and that a line from the African coast to St. Paul and Fernando Fo, and thence to Pernambuco, would connect Europe and South America. A vast line would connect Tunis with the Cape of Good Hope. Sicily would connect with Tunis. South America would be connected with the United States by way of a ramification of lines running through and connecting in one circuit the principal West India islands. From the Siberian and West American line branches would reach China and the isles of Japan. The lines already established by the British throughout Hindostan need only a trifling subterranean extension to reach Aden, Suez, and Europe. On the other hand, they would be led by way of Mirzapoor through the Malayan Archipelago, and by a continuation of links, of growing commercial importance, to a point which would make an easy connection with Australia.

He calculates that all overland lines should have five wires. His estimate sums up the construction at $7,344 English geographical miles of land telegraph, and 19,972 miles of sea lines. The total cost of construction is estimated at $23,490,000; to which must be added the expense of constructing stations, general observatories, and two steamers necessary for repairs, etc., which make the total outlay equal to $28,000,000. The yearly expenses of management, interest account, repairs, etc., are estimated at $7,500,000. At this rate, and with the capacities of the various lines, it is estimated that 20 words can be forwarded in any direction, or to any part of the world, to the distance of 3000 miles, for the charge of $7 50. He considers it quite possible, counting in the delays of relays, to get a message from London to Rio Janeiro, from Paris to the Cape of Good Hope, from New York to Yeddo or Canton, or from Constantinople to Calcutta, and a reply back, in twelve hours.

TOO LATE.

BY C. H. WEBB.

Too late thy honeyed words—
Too late thy tears:
A life is told by grief,
And not by years.

And I have lived the woe,
In one brief day,
Of twice three score and ten—
My heart is gray!

You can not thrill its pulse
With hope nor fear:
The Day is well-nigh done;
And all is near.

Thou, in thy selfish thought,
Wouldst have me live,
When Life were worse than naught,
But—I forgive.

Go! bathe no more the brow
Thy lip once pressed;
For I am weary now,
And fain would rest!

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TOMB OF PUTNAM.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

In your publication of yesterday, July 30, 1860.

DEAR SIR,—In your account of the visit of the Putnam Phalanx to the grave of Putnam you give a version of the epitaph on the tomb which differs greatly from the original. Mr. Staart, in his address, repeated the inscription as it appears in Barber's Historical Collection of Connecticut, and the newspapers published the same. The Hartford Courant afterward printed a version, correct as to the wording, but not as to the lettering. How Barber accounts for his rendering of the epitaph I do not know, but here is a literal copy, verbatim, syllabation, et punctuation.

Yours respectfully,

W. H. COLEMAN.

XII.

It was between nine and ten o'clock before I reached Fulham, and found my way to Gower's Walk.

Both Laura and Marian came to the door to let me in. I think we had hardly known how close the tie was which bound us three together until the evening came which united us again. We met as if we had been parted for months, instead of for a few days only. Marian's face was sadly worn and anxious. I saw who had known all the danger, and borne all the trouble in my absence, the moment I looked at her. Laura's brighter looks and better spirits told me how carefully she had been spared all knowledge of the dreadful death at Welmingham, and of the true reason for our change of abode.

The first removal seemed to have cheered and interested her. She only spoke of it as a happy thought of Marian's to surprise me, on my return, with a change from the close, noisy street, to the pleasant neighborhood of trees and fields and the river. She was full of projects for the future—of the drawings she was to finish; of the purchasers I had found in the country, who were to buy them; of the shillings and sixpences she had saved till her purse was so heavy that she proudly asked me to weigh it in my own hand. She thought me the better which had been wrought in her during the few days of my absence was a surprise to me for which I was unprepared; and the sight of the unspeakable happiness of seeing it I was indebted to Marian's courage and to Marian's love.

When Laura had left us together, we could speak to one another without restraint, I tried to give some expression to the gratitude and the admiration which filled my heart. But the generous creature would not wait to hear me. That sublime self-forgetfulness of women, which yields so much and asks so little, turned all her thoughts from herself to me, and made her first interest the interest of knowing what I had left on receiving her note that morning, and what difficulties I might have encountered in hastening my return to London.

"I had only a moment left before post-time," she said, "or I should have written less abruptly. You look worn and weary, Walter; I am afraid my letter must have seriously alarmed you?"

"Only at first," I replied. "My mind was quieted, Marian, by my trust in you. Was I right in attributing this sudden change of plans to some threatened annoyance on the part of Count Fosco?"

"Perfectly right," she said. "I saw him yesterday; and, worse than that, Walter, I spoke to him."

"Spoke to him! Did he know where we lived? Did he come to the house?"

"He did. To the house, but not up stairs. Laura never saw him; Laura suspects nothing. I will tell you how it happened: the danger, I believe and hope, is over now. Yesterday, I was in the sitting-room at our old lodgings. Laura was drawing at the table, and I was walking about and setting things in order. I passed the window, and, as I passed it, looked out into the street. There, on the opposite side of the way, I saw the Count, with a man talking to him—"

"Did he notice you at the window?"

"No—at least I thought not. I was too violently startled to be quite sure."

"Who was the other man? A stranger?"

"Not a stranger, Walter. As soon as I could draw my breath again I recognized him. He was the owner of the Lunatic Asylum."

"Was the Count pointing out the house to him?"

"No; they were talking together as if they had accidentally met in the street. I remained at the window looking at them from behind the curtain. If I had turned round, and if Laura had seen my face at that moment— Thank God, she was absorbed over her drawing! They soon parted. The man from the Asylum went one way, and the Count the other. I began to hope they were in the street by chance, till I saw the Count come back, stop opposite to us again, take out his card-case and pencil, write something, and then cross the road to the shop below us. I ran past Laura before she could see me, and said I had forgotten something up stairs. As soon as I was out of the room I went down as the first landing and waited. I was determined to stop him if he tried to come up stairs. He made no such attempt. The girl from the shop came through the door into the passage, with his card in her hand—a large gilt card, with his name, and a coronet above it, and Hampshire underneath in pencil: 'Dear lady' (yes! the villain could address me in that way still)—'dear lady, one word, I implore you, on a matter entirely to us both.' If one can think at all in serious difficulties one thinks quickly. I felt directly that it might be a fatal mistake to leave myself and to leave you in the dark where such a man as the Count was concerned. And I felt the doubt of what he might do in your absence would be ten times more trying to me if I declined to see him than if I consented. I told the gentleman to wait in the shop,' I said. 'I will be with him in a moment.' I ran up stairs for my bonnet, being determined not to let Laura see me in-doors. I have his deep ringing voice, and I was afraid Laura might hear it, even in the shop. In less than a minute I was down again in the passage, and had opened the door into the street. He came round to meet me from the shop. There he was, in deep mourning, with his smooth bow and his deadly smile, and some idle boys and women near him staring at his great size, his fine black clothes, and his large cane with the gold knob to it. All the horrible time at Blackwater came back to me the moment I set eyes on him. All the old loathing crept and crawled through me, when he took off his hat with a flourish, and spoke to me as if we had parted on the friendliest terms hardly a day since."

"You remember what he said?"

"I can't repeat it, Walter. You shall know directly what he said about you, but I can't repeat what he said to me. It was worse than the polite insolence of his letter. My hands tingled to strike him, as if I had been a man! I was obliged to check my temper by tearing his card to pieces under my shawl. Without saying a word on my side I walked away from the house (for I felt that nothing else in the world would prevent me from striking him), and he followed, protesting softly all the way. In the first by-street I turned, and asked him what he wanted with me. He waved two things. First, if I had no objection, to express his sentiments. I declined to hear them. Secondly, to repeat the warning in his letter. I asked what occasion there was for repeating it. He bowed and smiled and said that would explain. The explanation exactly confirmed the fears I expressed before you left us. I told you, if you remember, that Sir Percival would be too headstrong to take his friend's advice where you were concerned, and that there was no danger to be dreaded from the Count till Sir Percival's marriage was threatened, and he was roused into acting for himself?"

"I recollect, Marian."

"Well; so it has really turned out. The Count called to remonstrate; but it was refused. Sir Percival would only take counsel of his own violence, his own obstinacy, and his own hatred of you. Count Fosco left him have his way; first privately ascertaining, in case of his own interests being threatened next, where we lived. You were followed, Walter, on returning here, after leaving the country to Hampshire, by the lawyer's men for some distance from the railway, and by the Count himself to the door of the house. After he contrived to escape being seen by you he did not tell me; but he found us out on that occasion, and in that way. Having made the discovery, he took no advantage of it till the news reached him of Sir Percival's death; and then, as I told you, he acted for himself, because he believed you would next proceed against the dead man's partner in the conspiracy. He at once made his arrangements to meet the owner of the Asylum in London, and to take him to the place where his runaway patient was hidden; believing that the results, whichever way they ended, would be to involve you in interminable legal disputes and difficulties, and to tie your hands for the purposes of defense, so far as he was concerned. That was his purpose on his own confession to me. The only consideration which made him hesitate at the last moment—"

"Yes?"

"It is hard to acknowledge it, Walter, and yet I must! I was the only consideration. No words can say how degraded I feel in my own estimation when I think of it; but the one weak point in that man's iron character is the miserable admiration he feels for me. I have tried, for the sake of my own self-respect, to disbelieve it as long as I could; but his looks, his actions, forces on me the shameful conviction of the truth. The eyes of that monster of wickedness melt, indeed while he was speaking to me—they did, Walter! He declared that, at the moment of pointing out the house to the doctor, he thought of my misery, if I was separated from Laura—of my responsibility, if I was called on to answer for effecting her escape; and he asked the worst that you could do to him, the second time, for my sake. All he asked was that I would remember the sacrifice, and restrain your rashness, in my own interests—interests which he might never be able to consult again. I made no such bargain with him; I would have died first. But believe him or not—whether it is true or false that he sent the doctor away with an excuse one thing is certain, I saw the man leave him without so much as a glance at our window or at the near side of the way."

"I believe it, Marian. The best men are not consistent beings; why should the worst men be consistent in evil? At the same time, I suspect him of merely attempting to frighten you, by threatening what he can not really do. I doubt his power of annoying us, by means of the owner of the Asylum, now that Sir Percival is dead, and Mrs. Catherick is free from all control. But let me hear more. What did the Count say of me?"

She spoke last of you. His eyes brightened and hardened, and his manner changed to what I remember it in past times—to that mixture of pitiless resolution and mountebank mockery which makes it so impossible to fathom him. 'Warn Mr. Hartright?' he said, in his loftiest manner. 'He has a man of brains to deal with, a man who snaps his big fingers at the laws and conventions of society, when he measures himself with me. If my lamented friend had taken my advice the business of the Inquest would have been with the body of Mr. Hartright. But my lamented friend was obstinate. See! I mourn his loss—inwardly in my soul, outwardly by my hat. This trivial error expresses sensibilities which I summon Mr. Hartright to respect. They may be transformed to immeasurable enmities if he ventures to disturb them! Let him be content with what he has got—with what Laura unconsciously, for your sake, to him and to you. Say to him (with my compliments), if he stirs me, he has Fosco to deal with. In the English of the Spanish Dungeon, I inform him—Fosco sticks at nothing! Dear lady, good morning.' His cold gray eyes settled on my face; he took off his hat solemnly, bowed, bareheaded, and left me."

"Without returning? without saying more last words?"

"He turned at the corner of the street, and waved his hand, and then struck it theatrically on his breast. I lost sight of him after that. He disappeared in the opposite direction to our house, and I ran back to Laura. Before I was in-doors again I had made up my mind that we must go. The house (especially in your absence) was a place of danger instead of a place of safety, now that the Count had discovered it. If I could have felt certain of your return, I should have risked waiting till you came back. But I was certain of nothing, and I acted at once on my own impulse. You had spoken, before leaving us, of moving into a quieter neighborhood and purer air, for the sake of Laura's health. I had only to remind her of that, and to suggest surprising you and saving you trouble by managing the move in your absence, to make her quite as anxious for the change as I was. She helped me to pack up your things, and she has arranged them all for you in your new workingroom here."

"What made you think of coming to this place?"

"My ignorance of other localities in the neighborhood of London. I felt the necessity of getting as far away as possible from our old lodgings; and I knew something of Fulham, because I had once been at school there. I dispatched a messenger with a note, on the chance that the old house might still be in existence. It was in existence: the daughters of my old mistress were living in it on for hire, and they engaged this place from the instructions I had sent. It was just post-time when the messenger returned to me with the address of the house. We moved after dark; we came here quite unobserved. Have I done right, Walter? Have I justified your trust in me?"

I answered her warmly and gratefully, as I really felt. But the anxious look still remained on her face while I was speaking, and the first question she asked, when I had done, related to Count Fosco. I saw that she was thinking of him, more than changed mind. The sudden break of anger against him, no new appeal to me to hasten the day of reckoning, escaped her. Her conviction that the man's baleful admiration of herself was really sincere seemed to have increased the dread-cold fear inspired by his unfathomable cunning, her inborn dread of the wicked agency and vigilance of all his faculties. How could her low, her unassuming estimating, her eyes searched into mine with an eager fear, when she asked me what I thought of his movements, if I meant to do next, after hearing it:

"No many weeks have passed, Marian," I answered, "since my interview with Mr. Kyrle. When he and I parted, the last words I said to him about Laura were these: 'Her marriage shall cease to receive her, in the presence of every soul who followed the false funeral to the grave; and in that records her death shall be publicly erased from the tomb-stone by the authority of the head of the family: and the two men who have wronged her shall see that their crime to me, though the justice that sits in tribunals is powerless to pursue them.' One of those men is the vilest moral wretch . . . The other remains—and my resolution remains."

Her eyes lit up; her color rose. She said nothing; but all her sympathies were gathering to mine in her face.

"I don't disguise from myself or from you," I went on, "that the prospect before us is more than doubtful. The risks we have run already are, it may be, measure ourself against the man as the Count before I am well prepared for him. I have learned patience, I can wait my time. Let him believe that his marriage has produced its effect; let him know nothing of us, and hear nothing of us; let us give him full time to feel security: his own knowledge tells, unless I seriously mistake him, will hasten that result. This is one reason for waiting; but there is another, more important still. My position, Marian, toward you and toward Laura, ought to be a stronger one than it is now, before I try our last chance."

She leaned near to me, with a look of surprise.

"How can it be stronger?" she asked.

"I will tell you," I replied, "when the time comes. It has not come yet: it may never come at all. I may be silent about it to Laura forever—I must be silent now, even to you, till I see for myself what I may hastily and honestly speak. Let us leave that subject. There is another which has more pressing claims on our attention. You have kept Laura, mercifully kept her, in ignorance of her husband's death—"

"Oh, Walter, surely it must be long yet before we tell her of it?"

"No, Marian. Better that you should reveal it to her now than that accident, which no one can guard against, should reveal it to her at some future time. Spare her all you can; gently break it to her very tenderly—but tell her that he is dead."

"I to have a reason, Walter, for wishing her to know of her husband's death besides the reason you have just mentioned?"

"I have."

"A reason connected with that subject which must not be mentioned between us yet?—which may never be mentioned to Laura at all?"

She dwelt on the last words meaningly. When I answered her, in the affirmative, I dwelt on them too.

Her face grew pale. For a while she looked at me with a sad, hesitating interest. Her accustomed tenderness trembled in her dark eyes and softened her firm lips as she glanced aside at the empty chair in which the companion of all our joys and sorrows had been sitting.

"I think I understand," she said. "I think I owe it to her and to you, Walter, to tell her of her husband's death."

She sighed, and held my hand fast for a moment—then dropped it abruptly, and left the room. On the next day Laura knew that his death had released her, and that the error and the calamity of her life lay buried in his tomb.

His name was mentioned among us no more. Thenceforward we shrank from the slightest approach to the subject of his death, and in the same scrupulous manner Marian and I avoided all further reference to the subject of our secret, which, by her consent and mine, was not to be mentioned between us yet. It was not the less present to our minds—we neither had alive in them by the restraint which we had imposed on ourselves. We both watched Laura more anxiously than ever—both waiting and hoping, sometimes waiting and fearing, till the time came.

My decision, we returned to our accustomed way of life: it was the best, the only means in our power of helping Laura to look over again from this past sorrow and suffering which the inevitable disclosure had recalled to her mind. We all wanted the quiet and regularity which we had now found. I resumed the daily work which had been suspended during my absence at Hampden; and my companions were more than the smaller and less convenient rooms which we had left, and the claim thus implied on my increased exertions was strengthened by the doubtfulness of our future prospects. Emergencies might yet happen which would exhaust our little fund at the banker's, and the work of my hands might be, ultimately, all we had to look to for support. More permanent and more lucrative employment than had yet been offered to me was a necessity of our position—a necessity for which I now diligently set myself to provide.

It must not be supposed that the interval of rest and seclusion of which I have spoken was entirely suspended, on my part, all pursuit of the one absorbing purpose with which my thoughts and feelings had become so closely engaged. That purpose was, for months and months yet, never to relax its claims on me. The slow opening of the door by the slow process of precaution to take, an obligation of gratitude to perform, and a doubtful question to ask.

The necessity of precaution related, necessarily, to the Count. It was of the last importance to ascertain, if possible, whether he actually committed him to remaining in England—or, in other words, to remaining within my reach. Continued absence on his part was the only safe means. His address in St. John's Wood being known to me, I inquired in the neighborhood; and learned that he had left it early in July, and the disposal of the furnished house in which he lived, I asked if Number five Forest Road was likely to be let for the autumn season. The reply was in the negative. I was informed that the foreign gentleman there resiling in the house would be glad to make a composition for another six months, and would remain in possession until the end of June in the following year. We were then at the beginning of December only. I left the agent with my name and retired from all present fear of the Count's escaping me.

The obligation I had to perform took me once more into the neighborhood of Hampden, and I promised to return, and to confide to her those particulars relating to the death and burial of Anne Catherick which I had, for the present, withheld at our first interview. Changed as circumstances now were, there was no hinderance to my trusting the perfect secrecy of the object of the story of the conspiracy as it was necessary to tell. I had every reason that sympathy and friendship could suggest for confidence in the speedy performance of my promise, and I did unhesitatingly and cordially perform it. There is no need to burden these pages with my statement of what passed at the interview. It will be enough to say briefly that the result of interview itself necessarily brought to my mind the one doubtful question still remaining to be solved—the question of Anne Catherick's parentage on the father's side.

A multitude of small considerations in connection with this question—considerations, in themselves, but strikingly important when massed together—had latterly led my mind to a conclusion which I could not, for the present, transmit Marian's permission to write to Major Donthorne, of Varneck Hall, in Cumberland. The Major had lived in service for some years previous to her marriage), to ask him certain questions. I made the inquiries in Hampden myself, and described them as relating to matters of personal interest in her family, which might explain and excuse my application. I could not, for the life of me, let her know my certain knowledge that Major Donthorne was still alive: I dispatched it on the chance that he might be found in a mood more willing to reply.

After the lapse of two days proof came, in the shape of a letter, that the Major was living, and that he was ready to help us.

The aim in my own mind I wrote to him, and the nature of my inquiries, will be easily inferred from his reply. His letter answered my questions by communicating these important facts:

In the first place, "the late Sir Percival Glyde, of Blackwater Park," had been a guest at Varneck Hall. The deceased gentleman was a total stranger to Major Donthorne and to all his family.

In the second place, "the late Mr. Philip Fairlie, of Limmeridge House," had been, in his younger days, the intimate friend and companion of Major Donthorne. Having refreshed his memory by looking back to the letters and other papers, the Major was in a position to say positively that Mr. Philip Fairlie was staying at Varneck Hall in the month of August, eighteen hundred and twenty-six, and that he remained there, for the shooting, during the month of September and part of October following. He then left, to the best of the Major's belief, for Scotland, and did not return to Varneck Hall for after a lapse of time, which appeared in the character of a newly-married man.

Taken by itself this statement was, perhaps, of little positive value; but taken in connection with certain facts, every one of which either Marian or I knew to be true, it suggested one plain conclusion that was, to our minds, irresistible.

Knowing now that Mr. Philip Fairlie had been at Varneck Hall in the autumn of eighteen hundred and twenty-six, and that Mrs. Catherick had been living there in service at the same time, we knew also—first, that Anne had been born in June, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven; and, secondly, that she had presented an extraordinary personal resemblance to Laura; and, thirdly, that Laura herself was strikingly like her father. Mr. Philip Fairlie had been one of the notoriously handsome men of his time. His disposition, entirely unlike his brother Frederick, he was the spoiled darling of society, especially of the women—an easy, light-hearted, pleasure-loving man, more generous to a fault; constitutionally lax in his principles, and notoriously thoughtless of moral obligations where female influence was concerned. Such were the facts we knew; such was the character of the man. Surely the plain inference that follows needs no pointing out?

Read by the new light which had now broken upon me, even Mrs. Catherick's letter, in despite of herself, rendered its mite of assistance toward strengthening the conclusion at which I had arrived. Her assertion that Mr. Fairlie (in writing to me) as "plain-looking," and as having "entrapped the handsomest man in England into marriage with his sister," was grossly and gratuitously male, and both were false. Jealous dislike (which, in such a woman as Mrs. Catherick, would almost inevitably be petty enough to shun not express itself at all) appeared to me to be the only assignable cause for the peculiar insolence of her letter. Mrs. Fairlie's personal circumstances which did not necessitate any reference at all.

The mention here of Mrs. Fairlie's name naturally suggests one other question. Did she ever suspect me? Did the little girl, brought to her at Limmeridge might be?

Marian's testimony was positive on this point. Mrs. Fairlie, she said, had her husband's book read to me in former days—the letter describing Anne's resemblance to Laura, and acknowledged my interest in discovering the little stranger—had been written, beyond all question, in a perfect innocence of heart. It even seemed doubtful, on reconsideration, whether Mrs. Fairlie himself had been nearer than his wife to any suspicion of the truth. The disgraceful circumstances connected with Mrs. Catherick had married, the purpose of concealment which the secret of Anne's birth had to answer, might well keep her silent for caution's sake—perhaps for her own pride's sake also—even assuming that she had not left home in my absence, of communicating with the father of her unborn child.

As this surmise floated through my mind there rose on my memory the remembrance of the Scripture denunciation which we have all thought of, at one time or another, in our lives: "The sins of the fathers shall be visited on the children." But for the fatal resemblance between the two, the whole progress of the conspiracy, of which Anne had been the innocent instrument, might, in the innocent eyes, could never have been planned. With what unerring and terrible directness the long chain of circumstances had risen from the thoughtless wrong committed by the father to the heartless injury inflicted on the child!

These thoughts were for me, and others with them, which drew my mind away to the little Cumberland church-yard where Anne Catherick's poor lay buried. I thought of the place more than once when I had met her by Mrs. Fairlie's grave, and met her for the last time. I thought of her poor helpless home, of the tomb-stone above it, and her weary, yearning words, murmured to the dead creature at her perpetual rest: "Not there, not there! Oh, if I could die, and be hidden and at rest with you!" Little more than a year had passed since she found the rest she longed for—friendless, baby, how awfully, it had been fulfilled! The words she had spoken to Laura by the shores of the lake, the very words, had now come true. "Oh, if I could only be buried with your mother! If I could only wake at her side when the angel appears, and the dead arise, and hear her up their dead at the resurrection!" Through what mortal crime and horror, through what darkest windings of this world, they were dead now, the lost creature had wandered in God's leading to the lost home that, living, she never hoped to reach! There (I said in my own heart)—there, if ever I have the power to will it all that is mortal of her shall remain, and share the grave-bed with the loved friend of her childhood, with the dear remembrance of her love. That shall be her sacred—last companionship always undisturbed!

So the ghostly figure which has haunted these pages as it haunted my life, goes down into the impenetrable Gloom. Like a Shadow she first came to me, in the loneliness of the night. Like a Shadow she passes away, in the loneliness of the dead!

* * * *

Forward, now! Forward on the way that winds through other scenes, and leads to brighter times.

THE END OF THE SECOND FAUT.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MR. BUCHANAN'S POSITION.

MR. BUCHANAN has made a speech at Frankfort, Kentucky, on the 4th, from which we quote as follows: "I leave it to others to say whether I have been true to the interests of my nomination. Perhaps, also, I may be allowed to say that the claim that I stand before the country as a sectional candidate can not be true, whether reference be had to the number of the States which cooperated in the nomination or to the character of the principles which animated them. When you find the democratic organization aided by large conservative elements of other parties in all the Southern States, and in those two States upon the borders of the Union which are so far removed from the borders of the Atlantic and Mississippi valleys that their judgment as to what is sound ought to be conclusive, and when you find that a majority of the whole democratic organization of the United States, and a supposed majority of New Jersey, have declared in favor of my election, I think I may appeal to you to all the other States co-operating, how much soever they may differ from each other, to sustain themselves. A majority of the States of the Union secured, and at war with the principles of the Union, it would be treason to my fellow-citizens, as to the charge that the Convention by which I was nominated was composed of men who had assembled together to form a party, have abused in order to subvert it, to say that I stand before you in this character. I am no American citizen who might take a second step. I am an American citizen who has taken his first step. I have devoted to the Constitution and the Union—who feels that he has no other standpoint than perhaps to defend the Constitution better, but to defend and in mine, if I had refused to accept the nomination. Gentlemen, this is my privilege, the last time that I shall have an opportunity of addressing you as fellow-citizens and friends. The history of this canvass. While, therefore, I shall enter into no argument upon the particular topics of the day, you will not pardon me for making two or three observations which it seems to me, should commend themselves to all parties every where. Fellow-citizens, we live under a form of government on earth. We are truly unique in the world where the experiment is demonstrated that the foundations may be established upon a great principle and a large area of territory and be consistent with public order. It has been demonstrated for the first time in the history of the world. How are we to preserve these institutions? Only by preserving intact that double form of government, State and Federal, that has been handed down to us by our fathers. My answer is, that we can only do it by clinging with unswerving fidelity to the principles of the Federal Constitution they bequeathed to us. I hold that fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, in its letter and in all its obligations, is the condition of the American Union, and of all its properties. That Union was formed by compact, and terminated by the wisest generation of men that ever lived in the world, by all of times. It was formed by a sacred instrument. It answered them at an early day. It has conferred on our progress. It is good enough for our posterity to keep it pure."

FRENCH INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

It is clear that the question of a European armed intervention by France in Mexican affairs is now settled. M. Dubois de Saligny, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mexico, is expected to arrive in Washington about the 1st of September. He is charged with instructions from the Government prior to proceeding to his destination. It is further understood that the object of the French envoy has been to interfere in Mexican affairs has been already communicated to the French Government, and that the cooperation of our Government has been solicited; but such co-operation was promptly refused, and declined by our national policy. England will join France in the intervention, and the occupation of the Mexican capital will be the basis of any settlement that may be made.

POLITICAL DISTURBANCES IN VIRGINIA.

The town of Wheeling, Virginia, has been the scene of considerable excitement for some days, in consequence of an attempt by a negro fugitive slave to escape. A slave, a liberty-pole erected by the Black Republicans, from which floats the Black Republican flag, and the Democratic Presidential nominees. The Republicans of Ocoquan determined to prevent the removal of the obnoxious flag-staff or die in the effort, and accordingly dispatched messengers to neighboring towns for aid and assistance. They also notified Governor Letcher of the state of affairs, and requested him that the flag-staff must be protected. The Governor ordered General Hatten to call out his command to aid the Sheriff in the discharge of his duty. The Democratic Convention, which was called to meet at Ocoquan on the 17th, and was attended by a large number of delegates from all parts of the State. Under-wood was a delegate to the Chicago Convention, and, unlike some others who left that Convention in a body of Virginia, who contemplate emancipating her slaves, which could only fall in common with the indignation of his political opponents.

DEATH OF JOSEPH GALES.

Joseph Gales, the veteran editor of the National Intelligencer, died at Washington on 31st, of paralysis. He was born in England in 1786, where he was established for seven years the Sheffield Register. The elder Gales, during the prosecution for libel permitted against the Philadelphia with his family in 1794, where he purchased and established the Independent Gazetteer. Subsequently, Having sold this to Samuel Harrison Smith, he removed to Raleigh, North Carolina, in 1798, and established the publication of the Raleigh Register, which he continued successfully for thirty-four years. Early years of patriotism in 1841, Samuel Harrison Smith started the National Intelligencer, and in 1824, and subsequently he was deposed, entered into office as assistant in 1833. In 1809 Joseph Gales married Miss Winnifred Marshall, and died in 1812 by Colonel Seaton, his brother-in-law, in its management. Gales purchased the first of the paper, and changed, and the publication of the Intelligencer has never been absent from its office. In 1834 he succeeded, and sole advocate of the Madison war policy, according to Judge Story, and was a member of the select circle and was a friend of John Quincy Adams. At the outbreak of the British troops, entered the capital city of Washington, the office of Gales, being the only one in the city retained, Capitol, the President's house, or the departments, but on the intercession of neighbours and the fact that the establishment demolished, causing a short cessation in the regular publication of the paper. Mr. Gales was remarkable for dignity, courtesy, and ability; as a citizen, by his kind and benevolent disposition, and as a journalist by his zeal in behalf of every elevating and judicious improvement, and as an unflinching champion of freedom and liberality. His political principles are part of the history of the country. They were those of the old Whig Republican and Whig parties, conservative and patriotic. His intellect was of a high order, and he was deeply cultivated, and may be classed with those of Clay, Webster, Fisher Ames, and a few others, who were among his friends.

We published Mr. Gales's portrait in No. 55 of Harper's Weekly.

ESCAPE OF CONVICTS.

Upward of fifty convicts escaped from the penitentiary at Cape Girardeau City, Missouri, on July 14, by breaking open the prison gate. In the walls deputy-warden Hubbin was slightly injured. Three convicts were killed, and seven seriously wounded. All the prisoners were recaptured excepting seven.

ANOTHER DEFAULTER.

Another defalcation is reported from Washington. Major Gardner, paymaster in the marines of the Navy Corps, we learn, had his name stricken from the roll of the service by order of the President. He is supposed to be a sum rising of $20,000. He was suspended some three months since, and time given him to return the money, but without effect.

POLITICS IN NEW JERSEY.

According to previous announcement, no less than three Conventions for the nomination of Presidential electors for the State of New Jersey assembled at Trenton on Tuesday. Union Democrats, Douglas Democrats, and Bell and Everett. The Union Democratic Convention nominated two electoral tickets, with three Bell and Everett nominees, two Douglas, and two Breckinridge, and a series of resolutions expressing their views. The Union Democratic vote of the State for any candidate opposed to Lincoln and Hamlin who can be chosen by the electoral Colleges. The Douglas Convention and the Bell and Everett Convention both nominated straight electoral tickets; but it is understood that both of these parties will be brought into the arrangement by their leaders, as both have made provision for filling vacancies on their tickets.

HOFFMAN SAILED.

The case of Frederic Hoffman, the alleged defaulting clerk of the Pacific Mail steamship Company, came up in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, on Friday, when Mr. Leonard Kip made an effort to ring the bell of the defendant's counsel, Mr. Brady, who was not expected before the Court and entered into recognizances for his appearance. Mr. Brady, however, was not to be found, and one of the proprietors of the Fulton Ferry Hotel, Mr. Hoffman said, had gone to Europe with the defendant, and left bonds in the sum of $5,000 for the charges of defendant.

SUIT AGAINST THE NEW YORK CENTRAL.

We understand that Mr. Myers, Attorney-General of our State, has commenced an action against the Central Railroad for the recovery of the tolls amounting to about $9,000,000 received by them since the 1st of 1851, which, it is to have been unconstitutionally passed, in which case he is confident he will express opinions of some of the ablest lawyers of our State. The case will be brought to trial, it is believed, in September. Nobody believes that the thing will come of the suit; it is a mere political trick.

THE SOUTHERN CLIMATE AS COMPARED WITH THE NORTHERN.

The Montgomery (Alabama) Mail of the 10th says:

"We learn that the thermometer marked 105° in several spots between Montgomery and Selma. One gentleman, who has kept a diary of the weather for thirty odd years, says that the ground is the hottest moment since 1838. We have not known the mercury to range as high as 97 for several days in Montgomery, and then only to believe, in 1858. Similar accounts are given by newspapers published in the cities of the Northern States. From the seaboard to the Mississippi the thermometer ranged from 95° to 105° for several days last week. The Vicksburg Prompter says that the heat is almost unprecedented. In several cities the heat has been accompanied with unusual mortality—deaths from sun-stroke having been frequent. In Memphis the highest point the mercury has attained is shaded locations, unaffected by the rays of the sun, was 98°, and at 3 P.M., three to four and three or four degrees higher in the afternoon where the sun strikes the glass. The heat has been, for the most part, oppressive, and, indeed, quite intense. The country is suffering, and may be called dry for the season."

TWO LADIES IN A TIGHT PLACE.

A short time since (says a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press) two ladies, one from New York on a visit at the residence of the Superintendent of the Great Fermat Limestone Quarry's Estate, in the Lehigh valley, fell coal region, and determined upon exploring one of the mines. Accordingly they set out, and at some distance in, it was discovered that the earth had caved in, hindering their egress, and rendering their position quite. Upon examination it was found that it would take three days to effect a passage out, and as a level connected with their position, one of the three men (miners who were with them, was dispatched off on a hand, through the darkness, possibly, they might make their escape. He went to make an examination, and soon returned to the ladies, reporting that it was in very bad condition, and that it would require more than three days to clear it. They then, by accepted the task and in two hours more succeeded in reaching the light of day. When at their residence, and after a full consideration of their peril, they very naturally, and at the same time, sank into a swoon.

A SUSPECTED HUSBAND-POISONER.

A correspondent in Cloversville, Delaware County, New York, writes that a young, wealthy man of that place, having recently suddenly died, his body was exhumed and subjected to a post-mortem, a coroner's jury summoned. No traces of poison were discovered, and the jury decided that the disease to have been of a purely natural cause. The remains were accordingly reinterred; but the physicians who were not satisfied with the other clouins were called upon to analyze parts of the body. They declared that the presence of arsenic was clear, though in small quantities. Consequently another jury had been summoned, and the widow of the deceased has been committed to jail to await the result. She is but seventeen years old, and is said to be in appearance guileless.

A SUCCESSFUL HOPEMENT.

The other day, a young man, having fallen in love with a damsel residing in Royal Oak, Michigan, and finding some difficulty in obtaining the favorable consciousness of the father, eloped with her, making his way to Sandusky, Ohio, where they got on a steamboat for a future home. Just as the boat was about to start the father arrived on the scene in a hurry, and proposed to liberate the daughter of his daughter with a caning. Blinded by the rage, he made a desperate attempt to get on board the boat, but missing his footing, fell overboard, thus presenting the unique spectacle of a married elopement. It is understood that the father was induced to give away his child with a good grace, by reminding him of what he was paid his return passage-money by the son-in-law.

FATAL MISTAKE.

Mr. Andrew Horton, Chicopee, had been on a spree for about four weeks, and came home on Thursday night with a rear load of liquor, which his wife destroyed after he had gone to bed. In the morning, as usual, he was very sick, and his wife made him a cup of tea, which she had thrown it out. He did not believe her, and continued to do so until his daughter, who had started to go to work in the factory, heard him calling for it, thought a little liquor would settle his stomach, so she ably did, and hearing him begging so hard, she thought she would get him some. She looked in vacancy cup, and at last, in the exact behind the door, she found a small bottle, which she took out and smelled its contents. Found it contained liquor, poured out about a gill, carried it to her father, who drank off, as the last was ringing, to go to work. It proved, however, to be bedbug poison, a strong solution of corrosive sublimation, soon her father died within three hours.

THE DEATH OF A CENTENARIAN.

Mr. Felton is the twentieth President of the University at Cambridge, and the second native of Newbury who has filled that high office. Mr. Webber, the fourteenth President, was born in Newbury in 1759. The late Simon Greenleaf, LL.D., the celebrated Professor of Law, was also of Newburyport. President Felton has two associates to be colleagues in the University, Newbury's Professor Parsons, LL.D., Dane Professor of Law, and the Rev. Alvan Lamson, D.D., Professor of Intellectual Philosophy and Christian Literature.

Mr. Ampère, a member of the Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries, held at Copenhagen in May, the King of Würtemberg, who is a distinguished Sanscrit and Celtic scholar, with several distinguished men of Europe and Southern America, were enrolled as honorary Fellows of the Society.

The Hon. George A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, has been elected a Congressman from Saratoga, for some days past, seeing to compound him, for his fatigues and enjoyments of the late session, and in preparation for the fatigues of the coming campaign, which is to be commenced in earnest about the 20th of August. The gentleman solicited by many friends to give one public talk to his constituents, which he expected to do on Saturday or Monday evening.

Among the articles brought up from the wreck of the Hungarian by the submarine operators, was a card of a young lady, one of the passengers, found on the fatal night of the wreck, on the back of which was written in pencil, in a firm hand, "Little dies to-night."

The Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser learns, on good authority" that the author of "Rutledge" is Miss Rachel Lyons, a belle and resident of Columbia, South Carolina. Miss Lyons is one of the most accomplished young ladies in the Southern country, is the Creole—and a belle of great and rare beauty. She is the friend of Miss "Beulah" Evans, to whom rumor existed as the author of "Rutledge," and we take it that ere long Miss Lyons will have achieved high rank in the literary world, should she continue to use her facile pen.

The rumor in regard to the Hon. John Cochrane's marriage applies to a daughter of Shelby Parker, Esq., of Washington, but is only a rumor—current in all circles for the past two months. "They say" the marriage will take place next November.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

In the British Parliament the Ministers were questioned as to the intentions of the Government relative to Garibaldi's line. Mr. Gladstone said the Government did not intend to sanction the invasion or to any responsibility, and whatever course might be taken would be submitted to Parliament.

Sir Robert Peel called on the Government not to assent to the annexation of Savoy to Piedmont. Lord John Russell replied that the Government could not depart from the great principle that the people had the right to choose their own government without interference. Lord John Russell explained the position of the proposed European Conference relative to Savoy. England had changed the proposition to suit the views of Austria besitates. The Government had no knowledge of the reports as to other governments.

It was stated in Parliament that the British forces in China number 17,000 men.

Lord John Russell intimated that an agreement had been made between England and France relative to the Newfoundland fisheries.

BANKRUPTCY OF THE SON OF A PEER.

Lord Viscount Lascelles, the son of the Earl of Harewood, recently made his appearance in the Court of Bankruptcy, Basinghall street, London, to be examined at £1,661 6s. 11d.; his creditors including tailors, coach-builders, jewelers, a livery stable-keeper, and a college tutor. The insolvent said he was twenty-four years of age, was dependent on the bounty of his father but only allowed him £12 a year. He had, however, received £1,000 on coming of age. The Judge condemned the conduct of the insolvent, drawing his attention to the enormous debts he had incurred, not to say vices. The insolvent had been contented on credit to the amount of £1,000 in a single year; him as he would with other persons; and under the present law he could not be sent to jail, but would be poisoned for six calendar months from the date of the vesting order.

FRANCE.

ANOTHER WIFE OF PRINCE JEROME'S.

It is reported in Paris that the death of Prince Jerome will occasion the disclosure of a romance in which a large better portion of his past life to be brought to light; that the Countess Matilde, Princess Demidoff, the wife of an English society of Provence, means to bring her claims before the Emperor Napoleon. The Paris correspondent of the London Times professes to know that the fact of the marriage has to appear in the Court of Chancery, the existence of its having been constructed without the consent of the Emperor, and that the Emperor refused. This is according to the precedent established by the elder Napoleon.

THE FOURTH IN PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald relates some curious and a trifle unfavorable to a fashionable gathering the Prix Champêtre in honor of the fourth of July. He says:

"The invitations were issued in perfect, white and blue, being so predominating as almost to be a uniform. Whatever was not white and blue was left to the tasty handsome morning dress of richly-embroidered muslin. The ladies themselves were in the most fanciful costume, but generous department to all who were present. The ball was originally announced for 2 P.M., but the anxious solicitude the toilets of the younger ladies, among the most prominent of whom were the Misses Mason, Miss Slidell and the steel panoply which supported that violet cloak and robe was unanswerable. Nothing but the best and dearest are such triumphant attributes that they bid defiance to any white of the Rubicon. Miss Slidell, with only the the latest portion of creation be more content with nature's own darling, the rose, than the fair Louisiana, who be forever distorted into positive monstrosity? One could think that some hands of the Graces had been at work in some gigantic extinguisher as the large silks of bend to, by an extravagant use of the crinoline, assumed the broken oblique line from the point of the shoulder to the edge of the skirt. Miss Slidell, with her violet cloak and green one of the fashionable hats on the head, and the low bow for the head, and the bell, and the contrast between three and four o'clock. It was a little worn for such events. Miss Mason, however, was equally with the silver on the score of temperature. Foreigners seemed struck with the extraordinary beauty of the American ladies whose hands were so eagerly sought after. There they stood, in the broad glare of day, in the broad gay, setting their affair with such patient cavalier as, will, and in short, be offered and accepted on the spot, before others were in heaven. Their chaeks never blanched, nor did their voice fail them. The consciousness of beauty in their occupied nor refused the various solicitations till their gentle-men had time to recover from the first fatigue of admiration, for many doubtless thought that to say aside their self-possession, and to show that they were not to be had done its proper exercise, was unnecessarily to degrade themselves in the eyes of their lovers. The fete is well known, the maternal supremacy is never relaxed, and even when the daughter is married she remains the mother's side. There is more liberty in England, but apparently much less love in France.

ANOTHER BONAPARTE IN TROUBLE.

Another scandal threatens the Imperial family of France, according to the Paris correspondent of the Times. on de Chanvires, desiring an amicable separation from his wife, for whom he has a dislike, "which, indeed, he has been able to effect this; therefore the aid of the law is to be called in to separate by judicial authority the two partners in life's joys and sorrows, who reciprocally accuse each other of unfaithfulness. The husband's part appears to be the party most open to reproach; but in such affairs all is not clear.

ROSSINI TO WRITE ANOTHER OPERA.

A French paper says that a party of friends were recently assembled at the house of Rossini, and that they were talking of the approaching production of "Semiramide" at the Théâtre Italien. Rossini, who was in a melancholy, began to rally the musician. "Bravo did Rossini say to one of his friends, "I will write for the Honour of music, sleep continually. You have no right to deny the world something of value to it, and I promise you still have in your hand and heart." "It is a good age for you to compose, replied Rossini, "you are old," "every body has a right to reproach me with my twenty-five years of age, said Rossini. "Well, I will," "Because you are so indolent as myself. I no longer have the courage to write. Ah, if I were only young as either." "I could if I pleased." "I defy you." "If you defy me, I will compose." "If you do not succeed, I will write an opera in return." "I take you at your word," said Rossini, "I will write you a new opera. To-morrow you shall have your caricature." The next day the book was really finished, and Rossini devoted it laughingly to his friends. The manuscript is represented in the middle of a drab of Marzocco, which overflows on all sides. He is sleeping with folded arms, and pressing to his heart a voluminous manuscript. The numbers are evidently occupied by harmonious dreams, and the face of the musician is seen through a veil of gauze. A noble, at once benevolent and satirical, is playing on the harp. It is a charming picture, and the execution of the figures are so cleverly portrayed that it is more like a miniature than a work of genius. It is a recreation to be seen whether Donizetti will get Rossini's opera.

ITALY.

STATE OF AFFAIRS AT THE SEAT OF WAR.

The Paris Patrie asserts that the siege of Messina is decided on, Garibaldi having declined to assist the Neapolitans unless they gave similar proofs of confidence to the Sicilians by an unconditional insurrection.

At latest dates Garibaldi's Ministry had resigned.

A dispatch from England says the Marquis of Normanby, Queen Victoria's late envoy to Florence, has been appointed Minister to Garibaldi in Sicily.

Several measures have been asserted thereto. Sir England hostilities.

ADVANCE OF GARIBALDI ON MESSINA.

Advices from Messina to the 8th state that Colonel Medici was at the village of Barcellona awaiting volunteers. He had crossed over the height of Meri, Milazzo and Mellazzo. The attack on Melazzo was fixed for the 19th. Garibaldi's headquarters were at Messina on the night of the 7th. The Neapolitan army was demoralized. The Neapolitan officers had left for Naples, and letters from Piedmont states that the French Consul there had received a letter to which he was a true gentleman.

DISTURBANCES AT NAPLES.

A telegram, dated Naples, July 14, says: "Patriotic demonstrations are of daily occurrence.

"The moderate party is full of apprehensions concerning the situation, and the effect of the former policy, in the 12th, in the Strada de Toledo.

"A proclamation of Garibaldi against the Bourbon dynasty has been distributed. He says: 'I am a royalist, but prefer Victor Emanuel to the Pope and to Austria.'

"There has been a conflict between the troops and the people in consequence of popular manifestations in favor of Garibaldi. Several persons were killed at Naples. Several persons were killed.

The Minister has been dismissed, and a new Cabinet formed.

NEAPOLITAN CRUELTY.

A letter from Palermo contains some scarcely credible stories of Neapolitan cruelty. "As at Catania, the Neapolitans exhibited, during the struggle, inconceivable traits of ferocity. Not only did they fire on the flag of truce, but they fired on the wounded. The sanitary ambulance attached to the interior of houses that were kept closed. Among these were the Hospital of the Incurables; and the number is more than 600. The details are horrible. It is an unknown fact that, when communicated to each of his colleagues, and a copy of which I have before my eyes, the day was appointed for the massacre, he left himself to book after one of his countrymen, a wine merchant, whom he had known and been massacred, and whom, individually, they had taken aid to torture at their ease, we could not help thinking that the Neapolitans are that to them behold the still smoking ruins of the building. The scenery was indeed terrible. The soldiers had set fire to and set up all the neighboring inhabitants that had fallen into their hands in the refectory of the convent, and had then burned them alive."

THE IRISH AT ROME.

The London Times has a letter from Rome, which states that a serious disturbance had taken place among the Irish Zouaves. The occasion of a discussion as to who were the best Catholics. When an armed force was sent to prevent a duel, and the Irish fell on the soldiers out of the windows. One Irishman has been sentenced to death by drowning for the part he played in the affair, the sentence to be executed.

The Advices from Rome state that the Pontifical troops stationed at Pesaro were ready for departure. Five hundred and fifty Papal troops had arrived at Ancona, and consisted of soldiers at Sinigaglia, which were reposed by the Piedmontese.

ENUITE AT ROME.

A letter from Rome, in the Patrie, says: "An unusual event took place here on the 14th inst. During the drawing of a lottery, or tombola, which had been got up here, two men began to quarrel, and soon drew their knives, and a desperate fight took place. The crowd soon became excited, and a general disturbance might become more general, took to flight in all directions. The gendarmes were soon dispersed, when a body of eighty gens d'armes, who had been assembled at Frascone, in readiness for the fête of the 15th, made their appearance, thought that a riot had commenced with the revolutionists, and charged upon the pursuit of the fugitives, sabred all they came up with. According to a report sent to Rome by the officer in command, more than a score of all ranks and ages were wounded, some of them severely."

SYRIA.

THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN WAR.

At our last advices the French Government had announced in Parliament that they had ordered a squadron to be ready to sail for the coast of Syria, and that no one regret against Christians, and that France had done likewise.

The insurrection in Syria continues. Fund Pasha had gone there on a mission of conciliation to the Druse people, and in view of that fact England and France have agreed on certain measures of intervention. If Turkey approved, proves inescapable, these two Governments have agreed on identical instructions to their Ambassadors at Russian sucres. At the destruction of the villages the Druse chiefs had issued orders to prevent unarmed men to be shed blood.

There was great alarm at Beyrout, and the Franks and Christians had taken refuge on board the foreign men-of-war.

RUMORED OUTBREAK AT DAMASCUS.

The British Government is said to have received intelligence of a massacre of 5,000 Christians at Damascus. Five hundred were killed, among whom was the Dutch Consul. The Christians had fled to the citadel.

Fund Pasha has left for Syria with full powers. He has with him 12,000 infantry 16,000 men, the commander of whom is Hafiz Pasha.

CURIOUS LETTER FROM ABD-EL-KADER.

The following letter from Abd-el-Kader to the Disrpia Europa (Castle of Paris) has interest at the present crisis:

"Glory to God alone! I have received the letter that you have written to the Disrpia on the subject of the Mussulmans of Syria. I see with joy that you given good advice, and you would be heard if you had spoken to the living. But it is to the dead that you have addressed it. You have based your remarks on two points. You might have remained silent on both. The first, that Mussulmans are a prejudice, and that the Christians are a people. You might have spared me the pain of reading such monstrous assertions. Is it then so high that little ones should look for advice? Alas! we are far enough from doing so.

"The present state of the Mussulman and Christian Empires, even if they do not take place, will be more predicted by Mohammed in his time, and that is what gives the Mussulmans the right to say that he announced the annihilation of the Christians, and there are no more Christians; he has said that there would be no more Christians. Mussulmans themselves in power till the end of time; and that the Christians would be abandoned by God by reason of their injustice and love of the world's goods; that they would be given up to the wrath and hatred of the Christians have become the majority of the human race.

"And that event can not fail to arrive, because, as Mohammed, the authorized interpreter of Mohammed, has said, they have, above all, four qualities which insure them future preponderance—their love of supremacy in defeat, envy in retaliation, and charity to the poor, the weak, and the unfortunate. It is by the union of these four join to these gifts one still greater, viz.: skill in withdrawing themselves from all sorts of danger, that the ruin and oppression of their king.

"I say, then, that we look for the annihilation of Islamism. We are from God, and to him we return.

"At this moment dreadful disorder prevails among the Maronites and the Druses. The evil has deep roots every where. Butchery and murder are going on in all parts. God grant that things may have a better ending.

"Greeting to God, the Mighty, from his poor servant,

"DAMASCUS, June 27, 1860." "ABD EL-KADER.

THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales and suite arrived at Halifax on the 24th inst. The Prince was received with a salute of twenty-one guns from the Citadel, and the harbor was crowded with vessels of all kinds, which were decorated with flags. All business was suspended, and the entire population assembled on the wharf. The Prince, after the usual ceremonies, the presentation of an address of welcome, and a military, civic, and Indian procession, left the wharf, and was greeted with enthusiastic demonstrations of delight.

A SPEECH FROM THE PRINCE.

On 26th address were presented to the Prince, to which he returned the following answer:

"I sincerely thank you for the addresses presented to me, and for the cordial welcome you have given me on my landing on the shores of this, the earliest colonial possession of the British crown. I value such a welcome the more regardless of your zealous loyalty if I acknowledge the more indebtedness to you. It will afford me the highest satisfaction to report to the Queen the devotion to her crown and person unmistakably evinced by the reception of her son, eloquently expressed in the addresses from various bodies in this town and Hochet Grace. I am charged by the Queen to convey to you the assurance of her continued care as she has ever felt in the welfare and protection of her dominions. I shall carry back a lively recollection of your loyalty and attachment of your sentiments myself personally; but, above all, these hearty demonstrations of your loyalty, which prove your continued attachment to the great and free country of which we all glory to be subjects."

THE STATE BALL.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs: "A grand ball was given on 25th at the Colonial House. A gorgeous and brilliant assemblage of the elite of the province, with many colonial flags, banners, and ribbons. Some thousand persons were also here and there present. The bands of her Majesty's ship Hero and of the various regiments here on duty were in attendance, and the success of the demonstration. The whole city was again brilliantly illuminated. A dais was erected in the ball saloon for His Royal Highness. This was occupied with the Prince and suite of the Right Hon. Lord Mayo, Lieutenant of arms, and the ancient motto 'Ich Dien'—I serve. The Prince, in the course of persons of the province. The Prince arrived at about ten o'clock, and was greeted with the National anthem, and immediately opened the dancing 'God save the Queen.' The Prince was dressed in the uniform of a British colonel, and was accompanied by the East of St. Germain, who was dressed in the uniform of a British officer. The ball room was set in his full uniform. The Prince danced six times during the evening, and was attended with the greatest zeal. The past two o'clock this morning. The dancing, on the part of the Prince, was with the ladies of the suite. The Prince very ably and good-naturally corrected some of the mistakes in the dances, and every one of the ladies got out the different figures of the dance. He is himself a most accomplished dancer, and went through the dances in the way he whirled through waltzes, polkas, and quadrilles. He also danced in some of the specially charged, and he took a new partner whenever he stood up to dance.

"The people every where are greatly delighted. The Prince's affable and kindly disposition and good humor has gained him the affection of many true and worthy hearts. The Prince's visit to the city of Halifax, however, did not mingle in the festivities of the dance. The ball was closed at o'clock this morning, and a half hours leaving the Prince and suite expressed themselves greatly pleased at the cordial and affectionate reception accorded them."

APPEARANCE OF THE PRINCE.

He adds:

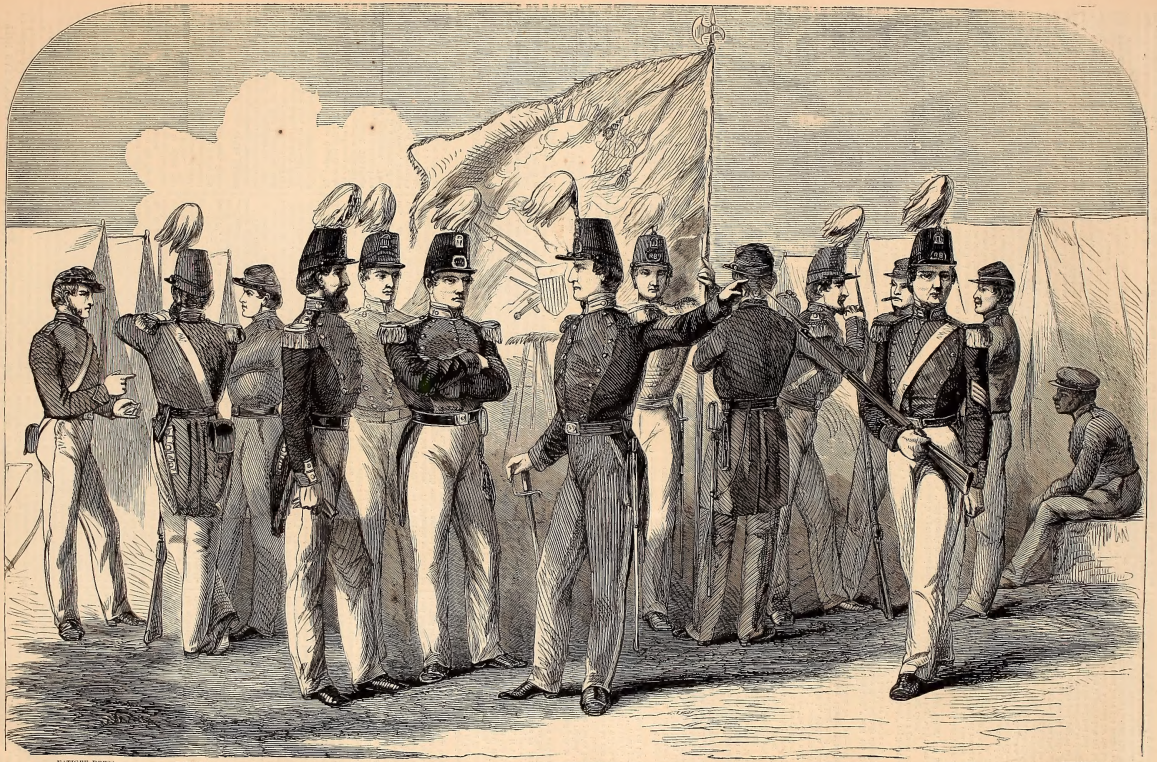
"The Prince pleases the populace immensely by his handsome appearance and his affable demeanor. Although

"The Prince stands about five feet six inches in height, he appears taller from his slender figure. His figure, his handsome eyes, small mouth, large nose, reminding one of his mother dear, his fine appearance, and generally resembling his mother at about the age of twenty-one. He has a fine, manly bearing hands and feet, is very graceful in his movements, unostentatious, and affable. He talks a little through the rather a loud and somewhat harsh tone of voice. His ordinary conversation is in a quiet and low tone of voice. As I said before, the citizens are charmed and delighted with his fine appearance. At the luncheon given to-day to the Prince, dressed in plain clothing, rode through the city in an open carriage, and was received with the heartiest cheers. He is a very good rider."

On 26th the Prince and his suite left St. Johns for Halifax, Nova Scotia. They were heard of on Friday last, and were then well. They were to leave Halifax themselves in a fog.

THE CONSTRAINTS IN LUCK—MORE TITLES.

The London Court Journal says that it is understood there will be a liberal contribution of honors among the Queen's subjects in the colonies after the Prince of Wales's visit. As no Royal Highness is to represent the Queen in the Dominion of Canada, it is considered probable that another incompatible that no should have the same power of conferring honors as the Governor-General of that land, especially under the surveillance of a Secretary of State and a Great Officer of the Household.



MEXICO.

MIRAMON'S LAST THROW.

From late files of Mexican papers we hear of the impediments, some unexpected, which have met Vega and companions by the Constitutional Government, immediately after the evacuation of Guadalajara by Generals Degollado and Miramon. This latter individual is most probably now in the Guadalajara, where it is likely that last act will soon be played, with every chance against the Church champion.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES IN THE UNIFORM OF A COLONEL IN THE BRITISH ARMY.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

OUR VISITORS, THE REPUBLICAN BLUES OF SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE SAVANNAH BLUES.

We publish on the preceding page a fine picture of the Savannah Republican Blues, a volunteer military company from Savannah, Georgia, which has been enjoying the hospitalities of the city during the past week. The blues are one of the oldest military companies of Savannah, having been organized in 1808—fifty-two years ago. Since then it has had but four captains: Archibald Clarke, deceased; Judge Richard Wylly Habersham, deceased; and the present captain, Augustus Schley, who has been in his post twenty-three years. Among the gentlemen on the excursion is one who has been in the company forty-seven years. The Blues are also seen service, having been engaged in the war of 1812, and, later, in the war with Florida.

The uniform of the Blues is a dark-blue coat, with light-blue facings, trimmed in white, and light-blue pantaloons with white stripe. The whole is surmounted with the old-fashioned military hat and feather. They are not accompanied by a band, as none exist in Savannah, but in lieu thereof are provided with a couple of snare drums and fife.

Most of the officers and many of the privates wear what are called among military men service chevrons, which are bars of lace or worsted on the left arm of the coat, each bar indicating five years' service. The captain and first lieutenant each wear six of these, indicating thirty years, and one of the privates seven, eight, indeed forty years' service. Others wear five, four, or less—all indicating the length of time they have continued to be members of the corps.

On Wednesday, 25th, the Blues departed for home in the steamship Florida. Prior to this they had been entertained to a collation by the City Guard, their hosts, when speeches were made and appropriate sentiments expressed. The troops then marched down Broadway, and attracted the attention of a large crowd of spectators. They embarked at five o'clock, and in a quarter of an hour after the steamer got under weigh, amidst cheers, firing of cannon, the strains of Dodsworth's band, and other demonstrations of enthusiastic farewell. We have seldom been visited by a military company which has attracted more attention or won higher respect among our people.

WILLIE MAYHEW.

CHAPTER I.

One, two, three, four, five, six! As the last stroke of the church clock over the bright, green meadow where Willie Mayhew was at play, be dropped the bat from his hand with boyish relief, knew he had till the 11 day by his side, and resumed the cap and jacket he had laid away while heated by his merry game.

"I say, Will, you're a good one! Won't you play any more?" said his companion, in a mingled tone of reproach and entreaty.

"I can't, Jem; Dame does not like me to play at all; but once a week he lets me play until six. Then I must go home." A sigh! Will, the merry, glowing with exercise, and his brown curls tossing idly in the evening breeze.

"But suppose you hadn't heard it strike six? You couldn't have gone in time then, could you?" said his tempter, with that shrewd expression of face to which childhood should be a stranger.

"No, if I hadn't heard it. But I did hear it; so I must go," rejoined Will.

"How will your father know you heard it? Can't you say you did not notice the time, and for once have your play out?" argued his wily comrade.

"That would be false. I did hear it; and I can not tell a lie," cried Will, a glow of honest anger at the mere thought mounting to his broad forehead.

"Oh, of course not. We boys never tell lies—we love truth so well; that is, we are so afraid of a licking. I'll bet you my knife—and it's a treater—yer afraid to tell. Ha! ha! afraid to tell, if you didn't think your father would thrash you when he found you out. Go home, sweet Willie Mayhew, the girl-boy, and tell your mother I'm sorry you're."

Simon, if you talk that way I'll not be the girl one that gets licked. I am no coward, and I am not afraid of a whipping. I don't care half as much about that as I do about my mother grieving mother, and she never struck me in her life; but her sad face, when I do wrong, hurts me more than blows can. But I'll stay with you, Simon, and stay and play till night, and when I go home I'll tell the truth, and say I wouldn't come, although I heard the bell, because you begged me; and then you will believe I am not a poor coward that is afraid of a whipping!"

As he spoke his dilated eyes and contracted brow told of the spirit that dwelt in that fair and delicate temple—a spirit prone to good or evil, and too easily swayed by the idle words of another. False shame has many an untold story of destruction to answer for. The childish taunt of a playmate, the sneers of a boon companion, have won many a young man from the house disobedience made hateful, and the unnatural orgies of a game, to end his weary life in the cell of a prison or on the scaffold of a murderer. "And after death comes the judgment." Ah! that frail spirit's trial! How often is it the sure forerunner of a career headlong down the steep abyss of crime! Pause, little pilgrim on life's pathway—pause while there is yet time. Stumble, even fall, on stony track—much will be forgiven to the young—but never willfully turn aside from what conscience whispers to be the right road; for each step takes you leagues away from honor, truth, and virtue, and when, worn out and weary, you strive to retrace your steps, the footprints have been effaced, your neglected guide has left you forever, and, shudder-ing and hopeless, you sink into the gulf that yawns to receive you! Willie Mayhew, where was the gentle angel that watches over childhood when, with feigned alacrity, you seized your discarded ball, and made the meadows ring with simulated laughter as it sped swiftly through the air, leaving your discomfited comrade, sat in hand, wondering at the strength of his late companion? Had some angel laid your shoulder arm? Again and again the ball flew swiftly across the meadow, and through the air, never with the desired effect to her—for cheerily did their laughter and boyish jests mingle with the sweet murmurs of a summer evening. Some one has well sung in olden time, "Love and long remembered are those sounds, made more precious by their contrast to the harsh din of the crowded streets. The song of the birds, of the insects—a deeper hymn of praise to Him who gave their brief day of sunshine; the lowing of the cattle, driving herds of cattle, and the returning laborer; and the echoing strokes of the axe, blend into a mingled harmony of sweet sounds—gentle melody which, once heard and loved, can never be forgotten.

"Hark!" said Will, "what is that strange sound?" And as he spoke a swell of harmonious music greeted the ears of the astonished children, and rocket after rocket blazed through the grey mantle of the twilight.

"The circus! the circus!" shouted Simon; "O, come here!"

Away they flew over the green fields, until they reached the village street on which the tent was erected. Here a crowd had assembled, who watched the rockets and listened to the band, who made pulses and manners merrily out, awakening the unaccustomed echoes of the little New England town. Among the rest Will separated from his companion, entranced as he did not know he could be at what, to his childish imagination, seemed celestial harmony. A painter would have wielded no feebler soul than he could have found words to describe one of the ropes that surrounded the tent, his mind intent upon the music, and his fair young face expressing the depth of ecstasy at his strange delaying. At length the music ceased; the "show" was about to begin; and Will, with a heavy sigh, turning away, paid his ticket-seller, attracted by his uncommon beauty, called the child, and, inclosing the child in the crowd, was lost to sight.

A flash came to Will's check; he paused, and was about to decline the proffered kindness, when the band struck up a march, and with childish fascination so new, so delightful, he passed into the tent.

Oh how gorgeous, to his childish vision, was the scene before him! Lovely ladies on steeds of white, cream, and parti-colored—pranced up and down the arena, while the ring of their hoofs was nicely mounted. Their white plumes waved in the air, the trappings of their horses glistened with jewels and gold, and Will thought never upon earth contained any thing so beautiful. He remembered what he had read of Queen Mab, Titania, and Oberon, and he imagined the scene must have resembled this that was spread before his astonished eyes. Each time the fairy cavalcade passed the notes of the music wrapped his senses in a sort of intellectual intoxication; and it was not until the band paused to play, and the horsemen having and retreating crowd aroused him from his trance, that Will, dazzled, confused, bewildered with delight, passed out from the tent, and returned homeward to the well-known street of the village. Since night had come a storm had arisen. The rain descended in thick sheets, and after flash of lightning shed its lurid flame upon his homeward way. Like one in a dream he passed through the fast-increasing tempest of the storm, until a sudden thought affrighted him as he approached his father's door. What would his father say? Could stern duty, the fear of punishment, of rigid restitude, and hated sinners as he hated sin. A shudder passed through his frame, and an awful dread fell as ice to his heart. He rather wished to ring in his ears, "The son of Deacon Mayhew at the circus, among profligates and castaways!" He remembered to have heard his father denounce, the inspiring music, the bright lamps, the fairy vision of his excited imagination, all in one sweeping clause that aroused in his father thought an accursed place struck his affrighted soul. His disobedience in overstaying his appointed time, and had to the fearful sin he felt he had committed in his father's eyes by going to the circus. And then his mother would plead in vain for him. Her love at such a time he had willfully overstaid—what would to her anguish when she knew that her boy was all unworthy of that love? The old elm before the door tree and the unprofitable servant seemed to be his doom as, drenched, pale, and trembling, he raised the latch and stood before his father's face.

CHAPTER II.

Deacon Mayhew was no common man. His piety was of the most rigid order, and the church where he was born, in such entire rectitude that when, about fourteen years before, her dying father had placed the hand of his daughter Ruth Gold in that of Deacon Mayhew, on the very day after her betrothed lover sailed on a three years' cruise, even those who pitied her sad fate envied him the unmerited union, could not deny that "the Deacon had been a lucky man to have married the girl who could make her a good home." A good home! Words how often profaned; a home where fear was always and love was not, until the feeble wail of an infant voice broke the spell, and the girl-mother spent the wealth of her young love upon the babe so delicate, so beautiful, that came like a mockery from the frozen earth into that chilled and desolate heart, a harbinger of joy, and hope, and gladness to come. But the child grew, and with it grew that tiny infant face, he hated the child he felt was worshiped by the mother who had never loved him. A man and a child in a sickly life for sixty years with the germ of every vice hidden in his breast. Deacon Mayhew had never swerved from the right, and his heart was hardened and strong with self-reliance. He would have been a better man had he loved more. The charity that "bears with all things and is kind," knew him not; the gentle humility remembrances of past error gives us, was not in him. It was his pride to say that he had had ever seen him stumble; he paid every man his due; worked late and early; fulfilled to the letter his duties as a husband, father, and he married so late in life it was in a spirit of self-assertion, as he said all the neighbors thought, to save the anguish of his friend from a marriage with the sailor lover to whom her heart was given, and from whose wild power so illimitable had her dying father received by this union eternally to separate her.

"How good of the Deacon," said all men, "to take a foolish young girl, that her father might die in peace!" "And how well he treats her!" echoed the women. The pale wife looked little paler when, a year after their marriage, news came that his ship was lost, and the lover, her father's harsh command had forced her to forsake, would trouble her no more. Let us hope the Deacon never knew how stern and cold his heart was when he prayed that very night, "May hope proclaimed to eternal truth be swiftly and suddenly cut off in their sins, nor be suffered to corrupt the wavering sinners who may yet be saved from the wrath to come!" As when the cruel words went like a keen knife to the heart of the woman who knelt beside him; poor heart that had loved, and suffered, withered, yet like a stern Nemesis he pronounced, as he believed, Heaven's doom upon the man she had loved without one pitying thought for the wife. Let us pause the infant face bore a strange and marked likeness to the drowned man did Deacon Mayhew but recognize it. But he did not know it, or he hated him. As he grew up his clothes were of the best, yet always a size too small that Will might emulate and imitate other boys—that shame and sorrow to a boyish mind. His food was of the best, but unappetizing because, but if he had a natural appetite, that article was forbidden; if he expressed an aversion, that article was chosen. He was sent to school from infancy, and was to him if a mere childish fault he merited, as he but seldom did, the reproof of his teachers. Punishment so severe as to endanger life was rarely awaited him, and then when his extreme youth rendered the trivial fault excusable. And for all these things the wise world praised him more and more, and said—"a wise child, a world—" What a good man is Deacon Mayhew! He does not dress his boy in gay clothes, although he can afford it; he does not pamper his stomach with delicacies; he does not indulge his son as a mamma!; he is indeed a father!" And thus the harsh cruelty was called a virtue that was in truth a blending of selfishness and envy, hatred, and deceit, black and monstrous in its hidden strength. Nor was this unsuspected by its victims. He had named the child a grace as the babe came down upon his blood-stained shoulders, and knew the punishment was more a pleasure than a penance to his cruel father. The boy grew older the boy's pride taught him to affect indifference; and he would bear the most unsparing chastisement with such firmness, with such pride, powerless to help, would stand beside him wringing her hands in unavailing grief, feeling every stripe, and praying for the day she knew was a stranger to her husband's heart.

CHAPTER III.

When the last chime of the bell had sounded Mrs. Mayhew opened the sitting door, and looked eagerly for her boy's return. A stranger passing by would have paused to admire the trim garden, the neat white palings, and its rustic porch gay with roses and honey-suckle, and the cozy simplicity of its interior arrangements, as the wind lifted the white curtains that shaded the windows. The house was indeed the model of a rural home; and the sweet pale face and mourning dress of Mrs. Mayhew seemed in unison to a scene that shadowed forth a world of homely beauty. Yet, had the stranger known the history of the woman who reigned in that humble cottage—could he have gazed into that woman's heart and read the dark history of every thought, would every fair theme he might well have changed his admiring glance for an averted one, and his envy of the happy inmates for a feeling of deep sympathy. As twilight deepened into nightfall the mother's anxiety grew momentarily, and, putting her apron over her head, she hastened to the door to fear nothing intelligence of her absent one. A kindly neighbor, of whom she inquired, told her he had seen Will playing on the green, and draining down his last glass of milk, and placing the rosy girl he was nursing at the door, he told the pale mother that he would go and seek him.

"For I know the Deacon is a pretty hard man," said the neighbor, "and doesn't love a boy much patience with boys. Now, I haven't forgot I was a boy once myself, so if he is playing ball in the moonlight, or has gone to see at the circus, I'll bring him home and beg off his whipping this time, any way."

Off went the peacemaker on his friendly mission; and Mrs. Mayhew, afraid to be absent from home when she expected her husband's return, watched from the open street, straining her eyes to discover, in the shades of evening, some trace of the wanderer.

CHAPTER IV.

The clock had long been spread, and the comfortable meal prepared, no footsteps sounded on the gravel-walk that led up to the door. The woolen clock ticked lonely, and seemed, to the excited nerves of Mrs. Mayhew, to utter words of terror. She tried to drown the sound by attending to some noisy household duties; but shrill and distinct above the clatter of tea things or hum of her spinning-wheel rose the voice of that unsparing monitor, that marked the lapse of time since Will's hour of play had expired. Every evening at nine the Deacon read prayers, and the orderly household retired for the night; it lacked but little of that hour when his wife heard his step without the door. Firm and unfaltering was that step as were his resolves—the voice of the clock was silenced by the thick pulsation of her throbbing heart. She started from her seat; then, following her resolve to call if the tremors absence, and her forgiveness, or at least mitigation of his punishment, she sank back in her chair, caught her bonnet, and with eager haste and trembling limbs to be buried as, raising the latch, her husband entered the door.

"You need not have waited for me—I have had my supper," was his salutation as he sat down in his large arm-chair.

Then a dark cloud swept over his brow. "I am a fool, and am not hungry," said his wife, rising hastily, glad to escape observation by busying herself about the table and the cupboard, while her agitation increased every moment. She saw that in her husband's face that made her tremble. She knew that his eyes were fixed upon her—that he read her inmost thoughts; yet, when he turned suddenly and asked, "Has William gone to bed?" she answered, "Yes," while the crimson flush of shame mounted to her forehead. The falsehood was useless as it was natural. Spirits are ever the fathers of liars. Under gentle sway 'tis easy to confess a fault, more like to grieve than to offend; but the mantle of unconsciousness—and the scourge create the very vices they affect to punish. The false moneychange had scarcely passed her white lips ere she felt the trembling woman knew that its untruth must be patent; but, as she turned to explain, a look of lightning met her eye. The stern old man had risen with a bound, ghastly glare, and a deafening peal of thunder drowned her faltering explanation.

"Listen!" said the stern old man, rising. "That is God's sentence upon liars!" and as he stood, the vivid light flashed in varying hues from heaven, and his long white hair streaming to his shoulders, he looked indeed like an inspired prophet, with power to pronounce the doom of the Most High. What wonder that the faint and shrinking mother cowered before her husband's glance, and sank back terrified into her chair. At this moment Graham, the pleasant-faced farmer, who had gone in search of Willie, entered the room.

"Good evening, Deacon. Mrs. Mayhew was right uneasy about Will, so I've been to look where the little fellow had got to, and where do you suppose I found him? Why, in the circus, just fairly carried away. I tried to call him; but there was such a crowd there was no getting near him, and as he wouldn't have heard me, bless you, if I'd had a voice like the thunder, he was so wrapped up. The show goes on pretty late to-night, and as he'll never have a chance to go again; so let him off this time, Deacon, just to favor me and his mother."

One glance did the stern husband give to the appealing face of his wife, and then replied, "Mark me, Graham, for the trouble you've been at, but I can't change the rule of my household to please a whim of a boy, even though he adore. That boy has a hardened spirit, and will be an outcast and a prodigal if the evil one is not driven out of him." "Come, Graham, I'll see you to stay and have prayer with us; it is just on the stroke of nine?"

"No, thank you, Deacon; it's just beginning to rain, and I'll get a ducking if I don't hurry home. Good-night; don't blame, Mrs. Mayhew; the Deacon won't be more than he thinks must be done: he knows he was a boy once himself," so saying, with a pitying glance at the poor wife, he left the cottage, thinking that heaven had in war not of his neighbor's household.

As he closed the door the large Bible was opened and the evening lesson read, and then a fervent petition offered that those predestined to eternal wrath might be swept from the earth. What a contrast did that fearful supplication offer to the sublime prayer that followed—a prayer common to all creeds brought to the mercy seat by Him whose tenets were breathe love and forgiveness! The rain that falls alike upon the just and unjust poured in torrents as the Deacon rose from his knees, closed the large Bible, while a light step passed the window, a trembling hand untied the door, and the poor mother, half-dead by terror, fell, rather than saw, that it was her boy—her Willie who entered the room.

"So you have come back," said the Deacon, with a stolid composure that scarcely disguised his inward agony. "What have you to say?"

"That I am sorry, father."

"Because you dread the lash," replied the stern old man, rising and taking down the cane from the shelf of an adjoining closet.

"No, father," replied the boy, with a firm voice; "sorry, because I have done wrong, and grieved my mother."

"You should have thought of that before."

"I did think of it; but every one knows how you whip me, and the boys taunted me and said I was afraid as I said at play long ago, and then we heard the music and followed it. We did not think of going to the circus, but a man let me in, and I forgot every thing until it was over—was all so beautiful. Beat me if you please, father; but believe me, for I have told you the truth."

The boy's manner no reply, but motioned the boy to take off his jacket and shirt, while he rolled up his sleeves and prepared for the punishment.

"Forgive him! he has told the truth: forgive him this once, as you have just prayed to be forgiven!" gasped the wretched mother, as she grasped the arm that brandished the uplifted lash.

"It can not be. He is given into my hands to be saved from becoming a child for the burning. Unloose your hold and leave the room; or, no—stay—he will suffer in seeing the affliction his sins have caused." With the lash upon his back after stroke upon the naked and bleeding back of the high-spirited boy, who never winced or murmured while the lash descended upon his shoulders, until, faint and deathly sick, he could endure no longer, and, with a groan of anguish, he sunk senseless to the floor.

CHAPTER V.

DEACON MAYHEW was asleep. The candle, which his wife studied with her hand, showed her the stern features at rest, while his regular breathing showed his nature to be deep and strong. Swiftly and noiselessly she stole from the apartment, and creeping to her boy's bedside, leaned over him and kissed him.

"Is that you, mother? Oh, I have been so sick!"

"My darling! my darling! I thought you would die!" said the wretched woman. "But it shall never be again, Willie—never! never!"

"I am asleep now, mother. Let me go, mother. How could I be tempted to commit a fault that would bring you such misery? Forgive me, mother! oh, forgive me!" she cried, repentant tears welling up fast into the eyes his recent punishment had never moistened.

"It is I who need forgiveness, Willie—I alone. It is my sins my husband scourges in my child. Listen, darling! You shall hear your mother's story, and then my selfish love shall keep you here no longer. Do not despise me while you listen; for if my sin was great my punishment has been hard to bear. My father was poor—so poor that sometimes we wanted bread—when my mother was taken ill, and Malachi Mayhew came to pay with her. I worked hard, and strove to keep her from suffering; but she often needed things we had no money to give her. He bought them to her. On the day she died promised that he would always be a friend to me. He had never been kind but a few years when a neighbor's son, who had been my play-fellow, came back from sea. I was sixteen now, and he too was no longer a boy, but had become a mate of his ship. He loved me, Willie, and asked my father if I might be his wife. His ready hand had always helped my father, and we doubted the liking of his consent, and were so happy, when he told us he had promised I should marry Deacon Mayhew. I think I could not have been induced to urge him to spare his child; but he had been taught to think that I was sinful, and for his marriage alone I could be saved. He rejected our tears and prayers, and swore a dreadful oath that I should be the Deacon's wife. The day was to wait one day. There seemed no hope for us. I wept—I prayed—I implored my father to pity my despair. He refused me—declared my lover dead—said he was not live, and that if I disobeyed him he would curse me with his dying breath. Then, in my agony of love and grief, I believed it right to disobey—to yield—to think that my duty to my lover was paramount; that as he was the husband of my heart, and before Heaven the rightful claimant of my hand, it was no sin I committed when next I saw my father's cold face, and told him—oh, hour of horror!—that I could never be the wife of Deacon Mayhew; that I had placed a dishonorable bar between us; that there was no longer, but was the mistress and affianced wife of George Sanders—of your father!"

"My father!" said the boy, starting up in the bed.

"Hush! and the wretched woman quailed in terror lest that word had caused the slumbers of the adjoining room; but the silence remained unbroken, and the trembling voice continued: "He was gone when I looked at the dead face. I was left less in their hands. I told the Deacon all. My father painted the disgrace that we must suffer. They told me George was a sailor never returned—I must be an outcast. They showed me letters proving him a villain who had seduced others. I was mad, bewildered, and, like a drowning wretch, caught at any thing to save me from the shame that seemed inevitable. He said—that story will man—he would forgive my fault. Willie, he does not know the world! When I knew that you, the proof of my shame, were to be born, I had begged that he would let me go and leave him forever; but no—he said the child should be as his, and no one should know the truth; and when I saw his eyes first rested on your face, he saw whose features that face bore, and hated you; and from that hour till now you have been one scene of agony. He could not forge a helpless tale, but he could punish me with all that must attach to it, and while I still, trembling, hoping, prayed your father would return and claim me—forgive my sad belief of his cruelty—he could bear me because of far distant country, news came that his vessel was lost, and he who alone could save me, he was drowned. Ah, Willie, then did the debt we owe rise in you. Judge now I have felt each pang, inflicted for what I knew were trivial faults. But I will not complain. I will not grieve. I will not, my darling, my darling child." And with convulsive sobs she clasped the boy to her heart.

"You shall go with me, mother. I can work for you. We may not fare so well as we do now, but we will be much happier."

"No, darling, I have been selfish long enough. You can steal away, and no one will find you; but were I to go, would be followed, caught, and you would feel again that horrid lash. No, no, no. You must go alone. I will wait here for you, Willie, to pray for, to think of you always, always, darling, until they lay me in the churchyard." And mingling their sobs of anguish, the poor mother and her child, clasped in each other's arms, wept bitterly, while the calm breathing of the Deacon sounded audibly in the adjoining room.

"Now, Willie, try to sleep. I will go and get such things as you most require."

"Don't leave me, mother; I can not bear to have you from my side."

"I will not leave you, darling; it will be but a short separation." And with the thoughtful care a woman seems to retain even in the deepest extremity of grief, she selected the clothes and food most easily conveyed in a small bundle, returning ever and anon to kiss his brow, to press his hand, or whisper some low word of fond endearment, while the tears streamed down her pale cheeks, and blinded her swollen eyes as she passed noiselessly from room to room. At length her preparations were completed—the bathing and dressing the wounds inflicted by the lash, she raised the poor child from his bed, and, with his stiff and trembling limbs in the task of dressing. When all was done she drew a little purse from her pocket—the fruits of her own industry—for the Deacon never, and begging Willie again and again to be good and careful of himself, to write to her when he should be so without being discovered, and never to come back until he could do so safely—all, all the anxious charges love could prompt.

"Don't think of me, my poor wretched, Willie. I shall try to be so contented and happy when I know you are safe. Think of me in your prayers; they can not help but love you, my pretty, darling boy."

The child, with earnest protestations, promised all—how good and obedient he would be—how he would work and strive for her sake—how she, too, must strive to be well and happy for him. With tearful eyes he looked around the little room her love had endeared to him; long did he remember each object in every recess; and then, unbolting the door, unclosed the door—the sky was inky dark, and not one star was to be seen. The clock struck loudly, as on the midnight air, and as it struck three the mother clasped her boy for a farewell embrace. Her heart grew cold and dead within her; she felt that it was now or never that she could bear. To close the door, perhaps forever, on her child—to hear the last faint cry that stairway his loved feet might never pass again—to look upon the little bed where he had lain, the little child seat with those dear hands had been by the side of him who had caused all. No, no—he must not go; they must be together. But then the scene of last night— His must go—he must go!

"Bless you, darling! Be good. God will be your father—I am your friend. Do not follow me to thirty, darling; I can not breathe. Go, Willie, go! God's blessing go with you, and all my mother's love!"

"I will come back, mother, a man. I am thirteen now, and soon I shall be a man, and can help you. I will be good—indeed, indeed I will. God bless you, mother!"

She could not speak. With one fond embrace he goes out into the dusky night. She hears the sound of the loved footsteps grow fainter and less faintly; and when they have quite ceased she fastens the door, ascends the stair, and falls senseless across the blood-stained bed of her lost darling.

CHAPTER VI.

OUT into the darkness, he passed along the well-known streets, unheeding the cries of anguish or objects, his way was easily found. Silence reigned unbroken; and the thought of the past night—of his punishment—of his mother's love—seemed to have seemed like a horrid dream, had not his weakness and suffering from the effects of his fearful chastisement been too plainly felt for him to doubt that he was really an outcast wanderer, with no plan for the future, save to escape the tyranny that held so fearful a dominion. The young to fully comprehend his mother's story, he was well content to bear the stigma of his birth rather than the pain he had endured from the hand of father. He was free! That sweet thought gave the other much of its bitterness. He was free—free as they; and when daylight broke, and he saw how short a distance Lay between him and pursuit, he felt how hopeless was the struggle, and how vain the weary and sick at heart was the boy as he sat down by the road-side, with no kind mother's care to minister to his wants, and wept—he desolate only know how bitterly.

A cheery voice close beside him caused him to raise his eyes, to see his fellow of the circus driving a close wagon, filled with bundles.

"What's the matter, my lad?"

"I am sick and faint, and can not go to the next town, as I was desired to do by my master."

"She must be a hard mother to send a sick boy on such a journey. Why, it is fifteen miles at least! Jump in here; I'll give you a lift on your way."

So saying, he helped the boy into his wagon, and driving his own horses, and those of the ostrich age, he was soon fast asleep; and it was not until his kind driver arrived at the village, put up his horses, and ordered him food, that he shook Will kindly by the shoulder.

"Oh, please, sir, don't use me hurt me!"

"Why, is your shoulder sore?"

"Yes, Sir," said Will, with a blush of shame, and his interrogator comprehending the meaning with horror, as, turning back the boy's shirt-band, he saw his blood-stained and disfigured back.

"Did your father do that? Then I need not ask—no man ever whipped his own child like that."

"It was an old man who has always taken care of me: it was not my father—he never cared a sight."

"Poor boy! So I got you into that scrape, did I? Well, I'll be more sure to get you out of it. You still here in the wagon, so no one may see you. I'll bring you some breakfast, and as soon as the horses are fed I'll drive right on to Boston with you. You give three shows there next week, and then we sail for Panama. You shall go with us if you like, and be a circus boy."

Grateful for the kindness of his rough protector, fearful that he might be overtaken, yet dreading not his acceptance of the proposal, and glad to be forever from his mother, the poor child sobbed out his thanks, and, covering up his head, sank again to sleep. Sweet slumber of youth, you visit us no longer when that golden time is past; but how tranquil and blessed art thou! The lacerated back, the aching limbs, the sad heart filled with fond thoughts of the absent mother, all were forgotten in the gentle sleep that stole with peaceful spell over all his senses and weary frame.

CHAPTER VII.

IT was a signal for rejoicing among the redskinned natives of the country on which the loud horses of the "Great Mammoth Circus" of Lee and Marshall came winding down the circuitous road that leads to the town of Placerville. Their advent had been duly placarded on numerous bills of red and blue, so monstrous in their proportions that it seemed impossible that a lucher any one wall in this town of shanties could contain them. Be it remembered, when we speak of shanties, that we speak of them in the most just but its lipsticks title of Hangtown. The hills had a due effect, and curiously enough, managed to witness the wonderful feats thereon depicted. This curiosity was nothing dulled when beautiful horses, ponies of fabulous stature, and a car full of musicians paraded the street, and gave abundant promise how grand a show might be expected. Children were almost an unknown thing at that time in California: but the men were almost childish in their desire for something to break the monotony of life in that new region; and when the circus canvas was pitched, and the band stationed without commenced to play, hundreds of representatives, of all ages and nations of our American population, thronged around the door eager for admission, but beguiling the tedious interval of time by tossing up heads or tails who should pay for tickets, or enjoying an impromptu game of poker, played on the head of a barrel by the crown of a hat. The fatiguing journey over, the troops hastily busied themselves with preparations for the performance that lay before them; and those who, an hour hence, roared at the jests of the clown, or shouted in tumultuous admiration at the daring of the athletes, little knew how wearily the men who uttered the jests, or performed the wonderful "feats of agility and strength" for which fifty dollars and plaudits were required, had crept along the dry and dusty road as they entered the town. Journey after journey—performance after performance—made their nomadic life a hard one. Arriving in a town at sunset, they had to work night, and by two the next morning the tent was struck, the gaudy trappings exchanged for sober harness, and away they went to the next, perhaps twenty miles distant—where they must perform again at 12 M., and then repeat the toil of the night before. Was it any wonder that the strongest felt the burden of such a life as being almost intolerable, or that the young and weak sunk beneath its weight? Yet those who beheld the performance would never have dreamed that the smiling, graceful figures before them were suffering from fatigue; and the white teeth that flashed their greetest can be ridder, whose feats seemed always to surpass those of his predecessor, was the first to fall sick, in his own peculiar way, announced "Master Willie," and a beautiful boy, whose long, fair curls touched below his shoulders, giving a feminine delicacy to his features, sprang lightly into his saddle, and paced slowly around the arena, his white horse circumscribing it and pawing the earth, seemingly impatient to begin. The boy was dressed as a sailor, and when the ring-master announced "The Shipwreck Boy and Lost Cruise," the clown's response that he never wanted to see the last of such good-looking crews met with a hearty reception from the audience. And now he began the act. Obedient to the crack of the whip, the white horse circumscribed around the arena, while the young horseman, with the very eloquence of grace, told the story of a young sailor's life. Now rocked by, delighted with the novelty of all around him; anon it was the home-sick child, yearning for the mother he might never see again. And when the clown seemed to rise, you could imagine him mounting the shrouds, and swaying on the tall mast, backward and forward, over the fearful waters. Then the tempest struck the ship with redoubled fury—she was lost—and the form of the brave boy seemed battling with the billows. Borne out and overwhelmed, he addressed a last prayer for pardon, and lay upon his back in floating corpse.

So truly was the scene depicted—so engaging was the air of the little ride—that many of the young children present, in their excitement at the sight, and a storm of applause, and a tumultuous recall, summoned the hero of the night back to his scene of glory. Scarce a moment elapsed when he returned, but no longer as the sailor boy. A suit of flesh-colored silk developed the fine proportions of his form, a tight skirt, confined around the waist by a blue scarf, completed his attire; and again the voice of the master announced him as "The Equestrian Child," and now his performance most wonderful in its graphic power, portrayed the life of a boy who had no restraint to check him. Now he seemed to swim through the blue waters; now to gain a prize, secrete it in his girdle; now taunt the monarch of the deep; again his strength seemed to give way. He struggled to return—it was too late—and, tossing his arms wildly, he fell across the back of his horse. So naturally was this done that no one dreamed it to be a real exhibition of suffering until, as to a solemn strain of music, he was led through the arena, a bloody foam was seen issuing from the mouth of the boy. In unistant the audience sprang to their feet, and a murmur of voices proffering help, or demanding what was the matter, filled the place of the music. Nor was their tranquillity restored when it was announced that the boy had had a fit, to which, they added, he was subject. Many left the tent, and the remainder of the performance was hurriedly given; and the dispersing crowd bestowed to their homes saddened and depressed, they scarce knew why.

Poor Willie Mayhew—for the youthful rider was no other than the little ball-player of the New England village—had been placed upon a shutter and carried over to the "Saint Charles," where he lay on a netter in the bar-room, one of his companies holding his head, another bathing his brow—on which the deathdamp had settled, and mother fanning his hands; while even the rudest of the motley throng around him subdued their harsh, loud tones of their voices, and stepped softly, lest there should disturb the dust means of the dying child.

"Make way for the doctor!" cried a dozen voices, and the tall form of the only medical practitioner the place could boast might be seen towering at eve the crowd who surrounded the boy. Of his skill in the healing art fame highly, and a long term of service in the Mexican war had taught him how to compel the prompt obedience of his patients, a chief ingredient in the cure for that wild state of society where intemperance was the chief cause of disease. "Room!" at his was ever disregarded; and when he demanded "a room where this boy can be quiet," the landlord unclosed the adjoining parlor, and in a moment four stout fellows had borne the little fellow within, and, in accordance with the doctor's instructions, had left him alone with his patient.

Drawing a small phial from his pocket, the physician introduced it between the clenched lips of the child, and in a few moments the ball-opened eyes closed, the jaws relaxed their stiffness, and the rigid limbs grew pliant, while a long sigh told of returning consciousness.

"Well, my little man, are you better?"

"Most better, thank you, Sir."

The doctor took the feeble fluttering pulse, went to the bar-room door, gave some instructions, and returned.

"You have worked too hard—traveled too much."

"Yes, Sir."

"Are you very tired?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, my poor boy, you are going to have a long, long, quiet rest now." The child did not quite catch the meaning of the words, but smiled faintly, and thought he was very good, as he was side too long he would not be able to make any money.

"Bah! money already! How old are you?"

"Fourteen next June, Sir."

"Where is your home?"

"In New England, Sir."

"That's best—too far off by half for a job like this. Have you any parents living?"

"A mother, Sir," and tears filled the large blue eyes. "I was for her I wanted to make money."

"Ah, well, you can't do that now, and it is a pity you had no one to advise you to take care of yourself. My poor boy, you are very ill."

"I know I am as bad before, Sir. I don't mind it. You can tell our people I will be ready to start with them when they are fixed for starting."

"Yes, my child; you will be ready, I hope, for an easier journey. Think of your mother. You would like written to your mother. You can not live, my boy, more than an hour."

"My mother! my poor, poor mother!" gasped the boy; and seizing the doctor's arm, he said, "an nothing be done so that I might live to reach home?"

The doctor shook his head.

"See, I have diamonds here sewn in my clothes. I have hundred and forty cent to the dollar to take them home to her. Will you send them to her?"

"I will, my poor child, safely and surely." And with both hands he wrote down name and address, and transferred them, with the valuables, to his side-pocket. "What shall I tell your mother?"

"That I was not afraid to die, Sir; that I trust my sins will be forgiven, for I forgave him all—she will know, Sir, what I mean. Tell her I never forgot her last words—that I have tried hard to be good." The boy's head fell upon his pillow, and the ticket-seller, pale and haggard, his eyes filled with tears, uttered hastily and knelt by the side of the dying child.

"Don't mind me, Simpson. You have been very kind to me always. I have told the doctor what to do with the money"—and here the weak voice trembled. "Perhaps you may go to our village, Simpson, sometime. And you, my lad, her, please, I was a good boy, and tried to do what would make her able to come and live with me. You won't tell her I was the only sorry to die for her sake, and that I had no hard thoughts about the past."

A locket was the only answer.

"Don't be unhappy about me; it is better so. Tell her, please, I did not grow much; she will know me again when we meet in heaven."

With a smile upon his lips, and the feeble hand pointing upward to the soul of the wondering circle, they returned to Him who gave it.

Letter and package were duly sent, and a narrow grave dug under one of the pine-trees that grow by the Sierra Nevada, where the little form was laid to rest. The doctor read the service, and there were few present who did not shed tears over the lonely grave by the hill-side. With no temple inscription—the last words of the dying child—"Tell mother I did not grow much; she will know me when we meet again."

On a Sunday afternoon, while Deacon Mayhew is exhorting, many a rough-handed, red-shirted miner forsakes the festivities of the fare bank, the cock-pit, or the bar-room, and sits silently by that little grave, while the wind moans sadly through the pines and hemlocks, and, with his face buried in his hands, recalls the image of the dead boy, and wishes that his own life may hereafter be so blameless, that he will not so incur his fearful curse.

"In the land of the hereafter."

THE MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN SYRIA.

We have given from time to time, of late, in the news department, accounts of the recent massacres of the Christians of the Lebanon. We now publish on this page pictures of the three principal cities which figure in these accounts—to wit: Tyre, Sidon, and Beyrout.

Lebanon, which forms part of Syria, and is under the Turkish dominion, contains about 400,000 inhabitants, gathered into something like 600 towns and villages. Of these the largest are Zayleh, with a population of 11,000; Dheir-el-Kamar, with 7000; Hasbeiya, with 6000; and Rasheiya, with 2500—all four of which have been scenes of frightful massacres within a few weeks. The inhabitants of Lebanon are Druses, Maronite Christians, Jews, Greeks, Moslems, Arabs, etc., etc.—a heterogeneous assemblage of opposite races, professing hostile creeds, and, as a general rule, all hating their neighbors bitterly, and only restrained from making war upon each other by the strong arm of Government. Ten and twenty years ago the Arabs and Druses used not unfrequently to molest the Maronites and Greek Christians; but the laws of that day were so strict that the evil-doers seldom escaped punishment. The very individual to whose treachery the present outbreak is ascribed—Said Bey—on one occasion made prisoners of all the Arabs in a whole district, because one of them had robbed the house of a Maronite priest. The Crimean war altered all this. The object of Russia in making war upon Turkey was to compel the Sultan to adhere to treaty stipulations with regard to the protection of the Christians in Syria, in Asia Minor; France and England, by exposing the delusion, and wresting the Russians, defeated that object, and left matters, so far as the Christians are concerned, in a worse condition than they were before. True, the Sultan has issued a Hatti-Humayoun, or proclamation, commanding all his officers to protect Christians against molestation; but the Beys and Pashas pay very little attention to the document, and practically it is understood throughout Asiatic Turkey that the Christians were beaten in the war, and that the other creeds are at liberty to maltreat them. The outbreak at Jeddah, some months since, and the recent massacres in Lebanon, may be regarded as the natural consequences of the victories of the allied army in the Crimea.

The Druses, who have been the authors of the recent massacres, are a race of robbers, of Arab origin, who inhabit Southern Lebanon: they are said to number 100,000 souls. For some months they have been on bad terms with the Christians; in the end of May last they took the field openly, and attacked the principal Christian villages. One of the first places assailed was Dheir-el-Kamar, a place (as above mentioned) of 7000 inhabitants, most of whom are Christians, and containing a convent of Maronite nuns. This place could not be defended, and when the Druses attacked it, the inhabitants surrendered on condition that their lives should be spared and no outrage committed. The Druses were no sooner in the place than they commenced their fiendish work; the women (including the nuns) were violated, the men murdered, and the town laid desolate. A few survivors fled toward Lebanon, were butchered on the way by a band of Moslems and Druses. Similar scenes took place at Hasbeiya, Rasheiya, and elsewhere.

Of the massacre at Hasbeiya, a correspondent of the London News says:

"The village was attacked by an overwhelming body of Druses on Saturday, June 9. The Christians armed to repel them, and for two days held their own, on the third driving back their enemy. Hitherto the commander of the Turkish troops had stood aloof, although—as was the case at Sidon, at Dheir-el-Kamar, and at Rasheiya—he had troops enough at his command to repel and defeat the Druses, had he so wished. When he saw that the Christians were gaining the day he called them back, and in the name of the Sultan ordered them to retire within the seraglio (a large building covering nearly an acre of ground, and containing the residence of the commander as well as the barracks), and to give up their arms, as he, the local representative of the Government, would conduct them all safe to Damascus, where they would be better than in the Hasbeiya, while the civil war lasted. The Christians obeyed him, returned, gave up their arms, which were immediately packed up and sent toward Damascus, but with so slenderly small an escort that the Druses took possession of half the muskets and the mules that carried them within an hour of their leaving the place. The Christians asked again to be sent with their families, as promised, to Damascus. For nearly a week they were put off with some pretext or other, until, on the sixth day after their being disarmed (during which time the Turkish soldiers had prevented any of them from leaving the precincts of the seraglio), two Druse sheiks of great influence arrived, and had a conference of several hours with the Turkish commander of the troops. No sooner was this conference ended than the Christians observed that the harem (wives, women, and children), as well as the property of the commander, was removed from the seraglio, and that the Turkish soldiers also removed their baggage outside. Suspecting treachery, many of the Christians tried to escape from the place, but were prevented by the bayonets of the troops, while their women and children were ordered and compelled to remove to the large upper chambers of the buildings, the men being forced to remain below. By this time it was known that many hundreds of armed Druses were close to the town. The troops had hardly made the aforesaid arrangements when the Druses were admitted into the seraglio, and rushed like hungry tigers upon the unarmed mob in the court-yard. No mass was spared. In ten minutes the very stones were inch-deep in human blood. No butchery ever known in history equaled this in ferocity and cowardice. Half an hour upward of a thousand strong men were hacked to death. Some few tried again to escape, but were driven back by the bayonets of the Turkish soldiers (regular troops, not Bashi Bazouks), and the Druses had their revel of blood undisturbed—mothers, wives, daughters, and young children witnessing from above the massacre of their relatives. I could enter into more details, but sicken at the task. Would to Heaven that it were a fable or a dream. In the slaughter some few hid in out-of-the-way chambers; others escaped notice from being heaped over by the dead, and then, by God's mercy, managed in the night to escape, wandered down to the coast, where one Ali Bey, a Metuali chief, protected them, and so to Tyre.

BEYROUT.

TYRE.

At Deir-el-Makhallis the Druses attacked the celebrated Greek monastery which has made the place dear to all travelers; tricked the monks into a surrender, murdered most of them, destroyed their inestimable library, which contained priceless manuscripts, stole their plate, and in a few hours gutted the richest religious establishment in Syria. Those who have read Dr. Thomson's description of this monastery (in "The Land and the Book") can realize the extent of the mischief done.

On 1st June Sidon was attacked. Fugitive Christians from Southern Lebanon were dying thither for refuge; the Druses, joined by some equally savage Moslems, attacked them near and in the city, and butchered most of them in sight of the Turkish garrison, which (obeying upon the lesson taught by the Crimean war) carefully abstained from interference. But for the appearance of a French and a British vessel of war in the harbor, it is probable that no Christians would have been left to tell the tale. Tyre, it is said, was saved by an Englishman, who sailed his yacht into the harbor, landed his guns, and made preparations for fighting; this peaceful act did not suit the Druses, and Tyre escaped.

Last of all we hear of the fall of Zayleh, which was besieged by the Druses early in June. The besieging army consisted of Druses, Arabs, and Moslems—all robbers, greedy for booty, bloodshed, and sensual license. The little town resisted several days, fighting a battle each day, and defending their homes bravely; but on the 9th they won the place. Every one was given up to the sword, and from the reports it appears that neither age nor sex were spared. The only wonder is that which the brutal conquerors made their way back to Dheir-el-Kamen. Some noble deeds were done by the garrison. A correspondent of the Boston Traveller writes:

"The defense of Zayleh, the most warlike town in Lebanon, was conducted with much spirit. As an illustration of the manner in which the desperate furious hope of the Christians behaved in this last battle, in which about seven thousand Druses and Arabs were engaged in the siege, we will refer to one case only at present.

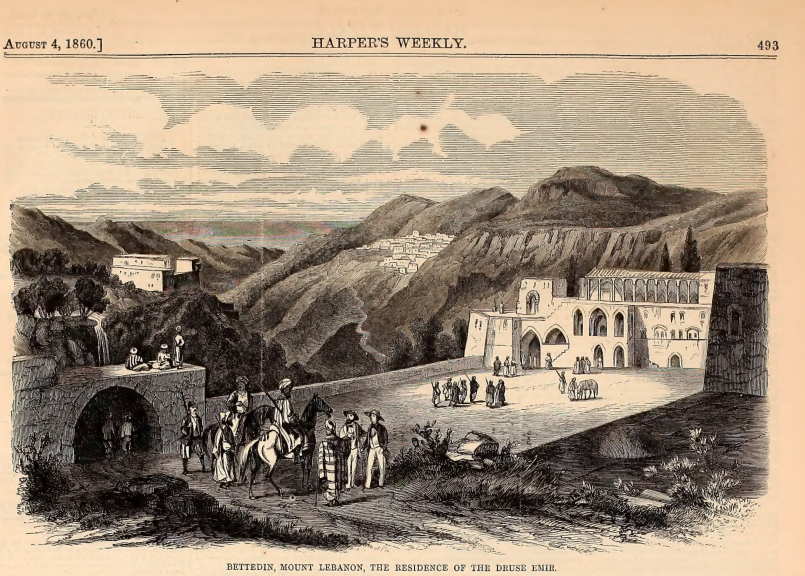
"The Druses had gained the suburbs of the town, and had succeeded in setting fire to about a score of houses, when the Christians rallied and drove them out upon the plain. The Druses were led by a most ferocious and bloodthirsty chief, Kasge el Amad. In the Christian army was a lad of fourteen years of age, who determined to die in defense of his home. He rushed into the ranks of the enemy, and, shooting the chief, fell, pierced by spears and bullets.

"The chief was killed, and the little hero shared his grave."

What renders these outrages more pitiable is that the towns and villages had desolate were prosperous and happy; their Christian inhabitants produced wine, oil, silk, and corn in abundance; they were the nucleus of a thriving community. All is now destroyed; the work of a generation has been swept away. Hasbeiya, which is mentioned above, contained a Protestant community of two hundred souls—only two of whom survive. They had been energetic and prosperous enough to build them a church.

Beyrout is the present refuge of the Christian fugitives. The town is full of starving men, women, and children from Southern Lebanon. Trade is suspended; there is no demand for labor, and the fugitives are mostly supported by the foreign consuls. One writer says it is like a deserted city. Vessels-of-war of each non-dl war, signaling each other, and making preparations for active service as if in a state of war. Some residents think that the city is soon to be attacked, and assert that the Druse army numbers twenty thousand men. Others look to Damascus as probably the next point which will be attacked.

We hear that England and France are about to interfere actively on behalf of the Christians of Lebanon. It is to be hoped that they may do so soon. 'Twould have been perhaps better, however, to have thought a little more of them, and a little less of the "balance of power," five and six years ago.



At latest dates we hear that Fuad Pasha had been sent as a special envoy to Syria, to stop the massacres, and that, in view of this step, France and England had agreed to abstain from interference. This news will hardly be regarded as satisfactory by those who sympathize with the Christians of Syria. The Druses have now ascertained their superiority to the Christians, and their power to massacre them when they choose. With this knowledge it is not likely that they will refrain quite for any length of time. The bitterest hatred animates all the rival sects, and Turkey has not the power to keep them in control.

We mentioned above that the Maronites, like the Greek Catholics and the members of the Greek Church, are Christians, though professing many doctrines unknown to Christianity as we understand the Druses were reinforced by a number of fugitive Africans and Moslems eager to avenge the late defeat. Every one was given up to the sword, and from the reports it appears that neither age nor sex were spared. The only wonder is that which the brutal conquerors made their way back to Dheir-el-Kamen. CHAPTER XXXIX.

ESCONDIDO.

THERE were pleasant sounds—the low, sweet tones of women's voices—inside the villa of Escondido. Two lovely matrons were sitting within that lofty saloon, hand clasped in hand, and gazing with glowing pride upon a lovely girl, who waved lithe as a lily on its stem before them.

It is about seventeen years since we last saw this charming trio. And now look at them, old bachelors, and tell me if, while old Time has been scraping the hair off your own selfish heads, and pinching the noses, too, of the ancient maids beside you, the scything old wretch has not spared these lovely matrons? Look at their rounded forms, those soft dimpled cheeks, and those bands of brown tresses, kissing the pear-shaped ears before they are looped up in one magnificent knot of satin at the back of the head. Look at them, you miserable old procrastinators, and then kneel down before the ancient damsels you have sneered at, even if they have the pelican gout and a crow's-foot at the corners of their eyes! They are better than you are, any day; so bear a hand, send for the parson—and now stand back.

But come here, my young gallants, and take a peep at that Bordelaise damoiselle standing before those fair matrons. Strange to say, she is nearly a blonde, with large blue eyes, so very blue that—fringed with lashes that cast a shade over the cheek—they seem almost black. Then, too, that low, pure forehead, with great plaits of hair going round and round her elegant head, like a golden turban, and thin hoops of rings quivering in the pearl-tipped ears. Tall and waving in figure, as maidens are; with slim, arched feet, dimpled at the ankle; and round, dimpled, tapering fingers, too; with a wrist so plump and soft that no manacles of bracelets could press it without slipping off the ivory hand. Dressed she was in a light muslin, coyly covering in loose folds around her budding bosom to the slender waist, where, clasped by a simple buckle of mother-of-pearl, it fell flowing in gauzy, floating waves to her feet. Look at her, my gallants, for she is Rosalie!

"They are coming to-day, my aunt; and Uncle Jules says that our dear old Captain Blunt has just arrived at Kingston, and is coming with them."

"What else, my daughter?"

The girl held a letter before her face, maybe to hide a little blush which suffused her cheeks.

"Why, maman, he writes that the springcart, with Banou, was to start overnight with the 'traps'—that means trunks, I suppose—and that—"

"What, Rosalie?"

"That there is a handsome young officer, the nephew of Commodore Cleveland—merci, maman! some of Uncle Jules's nonsense!"

No such great nonsense, after all, mademoiselle, when your Uncle Piron tells you to keep that fluttering little heart safe within your bodice, for there are thieves in blue jackets in the island of Jamaica. Strange, too, as she spoke—with her animated face, large blue eyes, and graceful, wavy figure—how much she resembled both those lovely women, with their darker coloring, who sat smiling sweetly upon her.

"Oh! here comes Uncle Banou. Well, my good Banou, what news of your master?" said Madame Piron, as she put out her hand to the black, who raised it respectfully to his lips.

"He will be here with his friends at sunset, eh! And Mademoiselle Rosalie must place the gentlemen's things in their rooms, and see that the billiard-house has some cots made ready in it."

"Nothing more?"

"No, Madame."

Through the brilliant vegetation, along the uneven road, came the sound of horses' feet, with hearty shouts and laughter; and presently appeared a cavalcade, mounted on mules and horses, all making the forest ring with merriment.

Ahead came Tom Stewart, on a small, surefooted pony; and beside him Mr. Tiny Moose, reefer, on a high mule, with a scrubbing-brush mane, looking like a fly pennant at the masthead of the frigate—kicking his little heels into the old mule, as if that mule mindeel it even so much as to shake his long ears! Then, straggling in the centre, were Daunsel, Stingo, and Paddy Burns; and behind them came a tall, muscular man, on a mettled barb, which he controlled by a touch of his little finger. And at his side, on the most diminutive of the donkey breed, with feet touching the ground, clung stout Jacob Blunt, the sailor, in a more dreadful trepidation than he had ever known on board his old teak-built brig, lying there in the roads of Kingston; while the rear was brought up by Piron and Commodore Cleveland.

"Now, you little mad-cap, look sharp when we turn the curve of the mountain, and you'll catch a peep at Escondido; and don't you pinch that old mule again on her rump, or she'll pitch you up into that silk cotton-tree."

"If it pleases Providence to restore me safely to my dear old Martha Blunt, I'll take my davy never to sit astride of any darn brute on four legs again!" This mild vow came from the lips of Jacob Blunt, and he honestly meant every word he said.

"Give us another jolly song, Stingo! it will keep your throat clear for the claret. A Creole one, my lad, it will make the cattle move faster."

"For the sake of my old timbers, Sir, and as you vally my wife's blessing, don't sing! There, you infernal beast, you've yawed sharp up into this ere bush, and put my starboard glim out forever! I say, Don Spanisher, don't sing—I'm going fast enough!" shouted the poor skipper, as he passed his paws around the little brute's neck, with his hat over his eyes.

"Colonel"—said Burns, as he reined up, and gave the perverse little donkey a cut with his whip, which elicited another hoarse roar from the old sailor as the animal half doubled himself up, and then ambled away like a yawl in a short sea, until he came up to the people ahead, when he stood stock-still and brayed maliciously—"have you another cigar, Colonel? Thankee! Fine scenery this about here—never visited Jamaica before? Ye have been off the island, eh? It's a nate little spot Piron has there—that it is; and the whole of us will be mighty sorry to lose him. Is he going to lave? Yes, he is; and what is worse, he is going to take his swate wife and her sister. Is the sister handsome? Begorra! handsome! Why, man, she's a beauty! And didn't I crack the elbow-joint of that ugly, abusive divil, Peter Growler, for saying he had seen a gray hair in her head, when I knew it was only a loose thread from her lace cap—and me in love with her all the time. Bad luck to him! He's never fired a pistol since."

Here Paddy Burns's small eyes twinkled as he slowly raised the stock of his riding-whip at a shoulder lance-wood tree about twelve yards off, and gave the lash a sharp crack.

The person on the spirited barb almost unconsciously put his right hand in his pocket.

Take care, Paddy Burns; the Colonel has a cool hand and a colder eye, and has made a study of pistols—cannon and swivels too, perhaps. Knows the cutlass exercise as well, and has had considerable experience in rifles, knives, and ropes. Has murdered women—lots of them. Wouldn't stick at killing a child with a junk bottle. And as for men—phaw!

"SHE LAY A BRIDAL CORPSE IN HER HUSBAND'S ARMS."

Keep a bright look-out, Paddy. Why, he'd drown your mother if you had a sister to love. For didn't he drag his own old father and mother down to a dishonored grave? and do you think—you brave, honest little Irishman—that he would sleep a wink the less sound for putting you to death? Bah! man. Shoot all the game you spring, but don't waste powder on a tiger or a shark. You would like to take a mutual shot with him though? Of course you would—who doubts it? Bless them, gentlemen fight gentlemen; and this Colonel at your elbow is a scoundrel, miscreant, villain, assassin, and—Pirate! So you can't take a crack at him, Paddy Burns.

CHAPTER XL.

PAUL DARCANTEL.

"Well, Piron, as I have told you, after the peace was made in 1815 I had command of a brig, and took a cruise on the coast of Africa. After that I was appointed to a thirty-six gun frigate—the old Bizarre—and went, for three years, to the East Indies, and round home by the Pacific. When we were paid off I made a tour in Europe with that boy's father, Doctor Darcantel, and—"

"But you promised to tell me, Cleveland, something about him."

"Nothing easier; and if we have half an hour before we get to Escondido I will give you all I know. It is general way, of his history. Pah! Well, then, Darcantel is descended from one of the oldest and best Creole families in our State of Louisiana, and the plantations of my friend and his father were contiguous to each other on the Mississippi, twenty leagues to the coast of New Orleans. We had the same tutor when we were children, and we grew up from infancy to boyhood together. He was passionate and irascible, even as a child; but as he was the heir to a large estate, and his father dead, his weak mother humored and allowed me not only him, I, myself, one of a numerous family, was put in the navy, and I went away on cruise after cruise and did not get home again to the Mississippi plantation for full seven years. I was a man then, had seen some active service, and I held a commission as a lieutenant in the navy.

"In the mean while, Paul Darcantel, who had taken at the time I left a strong fancy for my sister and myself, had been sent to France to begin his studies. How he applied himself we do not know; but with a large fortune at his call he spent a great deal of money; and we heard that, with great talents and wonderful skill in his profession, he was not unfitted for close application, and plunged madly into the vortex of dissipation around him. I heard, too—or at least my brothers told me—that his extravagance was not caused by impaired his fortune, and that his deals had been so numerous and desperate as to make his name odious even in Paris. On one occasion, at a ball, he had cut a bullying master's head clean off with a sabre-stroke for insulting a woman down; and in another duel, where he had detected a French count cheating him at cards, he shot him dead for a bet. What could be more visible reputation, and at the urgent solicitations of his agent, after years of absence he returned to his ancestral home. We met as boy and man as Paul and Henry—and though still the same restive, hot-headed spirit as he had ever been, he yet showed himself patiently to me as a friend, and I could, in a manner, control him. He paid very little attention to his property, however, and when he had got to the city to consult with his factor or trustee, he got in some wild frolic, duel, and scrape, and came back worn out with fatigue and dissipation. He was a fine, sternlooking youth in those days, with great muscular power, which, even with the exuberance at spare it by gaming and drinking, seemed not to be lessened.

"After one of these visits to New Orleans, where his long-forbearing agents had at last awakened him to a bitter sense of his delinquencies, and been mortgages and securities were laid with all their shocking truth before him, he returned and came to me, and told me his vices and faults he was truthful and generous. He told me all, and how he would try to do better and make the declining years of his two indulgent mother.

"I always had great faith in the companion almost of my childhood, and I loved him, I believe, better than my own brothers. Well, he spread all his affairs before me, and in my little den of an outhouse on the plantation we went to work fantacially over the papers. We were two days and nights at the business, and when it was all showed him that he would still, with a little prudent economy, have a fair income, and eventually, perhaps, seldom his former extravagance, he burst out in a wild yell of delight and hugged me in his arms. When he had put away the papers, I said—

"'Paul, you know I am engaged to be married, and I have not seen my sweet-heart for two whole days; she has a sister, too, prettier than my Celine, whom you have never seen since we were boys together. Come, will you go with me? we can pull ourselves across the river.'

"He hesitated; and it would have been, perhaps, better had he refused to accompany me, for dreadful misery came of it."

The Commodore gave a deep sigh, and touched his glass with his spoon.

"I don't know, though, Piron: there is a fate marked out for us all, and we should not exclaim against the decrees of Providence. Paul went with me across the river. There, on the bank, was a little bower of an old French-built stone house, where dwelt the last of a line of French nobility who dated back to the days of Charlemagne. It was an impoverished family, consisting of a reckless brother and two sisters, who, with a few acres of sugar-cane and some old faithful servants, managed to make both ends meet, and to support the establishment in a certain air of elegance and comfort to which they had been accustomed. They were of a proud and haughty race; the brother a dashing, full and imperious gentleman, smarting and brooding over the reverses of his family, and rarely visiting his neighbors. His sisters—and they were twins—were trustful, happy girls, and Josephine had been my childish love.

"Here Cleveland paused to saddle-bow, and if the quiet old horse he bestrode believed the large drops which fell upon his sleek neck came from the clouds or the drooping foliage of the forest, that animal was never more deceived in his quadruped life. We have that fact, for it stands upon the angelic record.

"Well, my dear Piron, as we entered the little enclosure where Eloise sported at the piano playing the sweet airs she had sung to me when a little bit of a girl, and her beautiful sister bending over a table near shelled a pea, while the candles under the glass shades lighted up their dark passionate and brooding complexion, Paul approached her. It was not love at first sight, because they had played together when children, but it was such a love as only begins and dies with man or woman. The brother came in soon afterward, but there was no more exchanged between him and Paul, and they met in a manner which seemed to revive the early dislike they had entertained one toward the other in boyhood.

"So the time passed, and in the course of a few months Josephine and I were married, and our home was made on my own plantation. Still, night by night, in storm or frolic, Paul pulled himself in a skiff across that mighty river, and we could see the lights shining to a late hour in the little bower. He had changed a great deal, for he lived with the brother in spite of his fiery and impetuous nature. Pauline loved, too, though still she feared him. The brother, however, bitterly opposed the match, and stormy scenes arose. Josephine and I did all we could to put matters on a happy footing; but Jacques, the brother, grew more imperious as his sister refused to cast off her lover, till at last his feeling against him broke out into open scornful insult, and though Paul still visited the sisters' seclusion, yet we feared that the impetuous spirit of the two men would, at any moment, burst out into open violence.

"Darcantel, however, controlled himself, resided in the country, and, after a reconciliation with Jacques, applied himself to the duties of his plantation, and always promised me that he would visit me when the crop was in and when the brother to give his consent to the marriage. Meanwhile, Paul's mother died. A year passed. Little grew me a baby boy, and I was proud of me, and then I went again to sea. Nearly three years later I returned, and the very night before I reached the plantation the fatal duel between the brothers occurred. I might, perhaps, have prevented it had I been there; but I was not, and it took place.

"It seems that two days previously Jacques wrote to Paul—I saw the letter—and it was a maundering production, in which he not only expitulated his vices and follies, but he taxed him with being a ruined gambler, who had brought his mother to the grave by his folly and ended by swearing, in the most solemn manner, that if he dared again to speak to his sister or darken their doors he would shoot him like a dog!

"That evening, as usual, the skiff pursued its way across the river, and late at night when it returned there was a fluttering white dress in the stern. Paul, Pauline, and the boy all left the bank then a boat shoved out from the other side, manned by four negroes, and came swiftly over in pursuit. Paul, young and impetuous, heard from an old married couple of servants who had passed their lives with the family. It appears that Paul, who had been at the wine, and barely reached the hall of the great house, and was giving orders to close the doors when the negroes rushed in, and Jacques struck at him and a pistol in the other. Paul ripped him up with his sword, and received a shot, as his blood was up, and, unarmed as he was, it would do him a mischief. Pauline, too, influenced him by a sense love to escape, and seizing him still advance, as she partially shielded Paul, she told him that the man she loved was her husband.

"Blinded with haughty rage, this last admission rendered him ungovernable, and he lunged at her with his foot in his stirrup. She parried his rapid passes, though receiving some sharp wounds in the arms and shoulder, and still supporting his drooping, terrified child on his left arm till, by a quick spring, he got within Jacques' guard, and, striking him on the head with the weapon from his grasp. This was enough to make the brother totally insane by passion when bathed revenge, and he leveled his pistol and fired. There was a faint cry with the report, and a groan from Jacques as the sword went through his body—he heard the fall—he struck hard against his shs as he fell, a dead man, on the marble pavement. But the bullet from his pistol had glanced from the face forehead of his sister, and she lay a bridal corpse in her husband's arms.

"I spare you all the afflicting details, Piron, and will only add that Paul left the plantation that night, that I never got home till I found an envelope post-marked New Orleans, inclosing a paper, which constituted me his sole executor, and leaving our little boy his heir. I had been a short leave of a month, and duty called me again away. It was on the anniversary of the day the tragedy occurred, after nearly three years of my absence years in the Scourge, that I again returned, and knew there was no one awaiting me in my own dwelling. My poor Josephine had never recovered from the shock; she drooped away like a lily, her little boy by her side, and both died during my absence."

What makes the strong man's eyelids quiver and voice tremble? Those eyes that have looked calmly on death and carnage in every shape, with his deep, calm voice cheering on the men to battle at his side? Ah!

"It was midnight, and I walked out to the little grave-yard where my fathers had been buried, and sending my steps to a cluster of magnolias on a little mound by itself, I—I—kneeled down beside the sod where reposed all I had loved on earth. I do not know how long I remained there, but presently I heard a groan near by, and a tall man rose up from where he had been prostrate, face downward, on the ground, and I beheld Paul Darcantel! I could hardly recognize him at first, for he seemed fifty years older than when we had last parted.

"'Cleveland,' he said, in a hollow, choking voice, 'forgive me! I am a changed, and, I trust, a better man. I have been about to this holy spot by the same errand which brought you hither, and though I did not expect to meet you, yet I am glad of it now. Speak, and say you forgive me, and you will shed a ray of hope and salvation into the heart of one who will suffer unto the end! Speak!'

"Old memories crowded around me, and I saw before me the child in the cradle, and with our arms round each other's necks as we played together. I forgot, for the moment, the sisters lying there—the murder, and lady-boy. The magnolias bowed their white flowers in the light of the waning moon, and we fell again into each other's arms.

"After a time, he said, 'My only friend, I have brought with me as little helpless boy; he is named Henry, after you, and will take the place of the lost little one lying here. Wherever I die survives all respect that estate. Come with me and look at him!'

"He led me to the other mound, and there, beside the grave of his mother, I did many a saintly sleeping, wrapped in a sailor's jacket, with his curls escaping from a straw-hat, and the head resting on the mound of earth over his sister.

"'Be good to him'—Paul went on—'for the sake of those we have lost ourselves!' His mother's name was Celine.

"He stooped down as he said this, and raising the boy in his arms he kissed him passionately, and then put him gently in mine. I felt him kneel sometimes at this grave, my friend, and pray for me.

"In another moment Paul Darcantel had gone. The little fellow partly woke, and put his arms affectionately around my neck, and murmured, 'Maman, maman!' That dashing, brave young fellow ahead there was once that boy.

"Well, I returned to the house where my good mother and sisters went wild over him, and there he passed a happy boyhood. Years went by, and I left the service; the girls and delight of us all; and as he evinced the greatest fondness for the sea, on his accounts I gave him of my life at sea, I had him appointed a reefer in the navy. Since that he his seen a great deal of service; gained promotion, and is now, I hear, on shipboard as well as on shore, liked and respected by all who know him.

"In the mean time his father went away—nobody knew whither—for years and years. He wrote to me, however, and to his son, from all parts of the world. And when I made the tour in Europe I spoke about, Darcantel was my companion. But while there he passed a retired life, never mingling freely, but existed every hospital in every sea-port from the Mediterranean to Archangel. He returned—for he is not only a surgeon, as I have reason to know, of wonderful skill, but a thorough-bred seaman too; and when he has not been on board of his ship there is no one whose opinion of the weather, or other nautical matters, do I place greater reliance on—he could tell Paul, on the dozen times when his advice to me has saved serious danger. And during all these years Darcantel's estates, under the careful management of my eldest brother, have been redeemed from their load of debt, and now he enjoys a noble fortune; or rather, he spends nothing on himself, but devotes it to widows and orphans, and sick or worn-out sailors.

"In the mean time I have to have gone by since he brought his child to me he has made several visits, of a month or two's duration, to the plantation, but on which he has gone on leave from duty. Then it was a pleasant sight to see them both together, and the touching air and affection he showed the youth to his father. Henry, from a child, often went and prayed beside the grave under the magnolias; and to this day he believes that his own mother lies buried there. Perhaps it is as well that he should cherish this early error, for I may tell you in confidence, Piron, that we believe there at home that he is the illegitimate offspring of some enpressions of a sailor's life, and that his mother never learned it positively from his father's lips. He is not a person to be questioned by any one, not even by me—and as he seems anxious to throw a thick veil over the past, we never venture to draw it aside.

"When, in 1856, I was appointed to my present command, Darcantel desired to sail with me, and see the West India islands, which he had not visited since an age. I was only too happy to have him, especially as Harry there—from Harry like a father—was named to the little schooner he had cut out in Africa on his last cruise, and ordered to join my squadron. Her skipper we got into port his father gave quietly on shore; passes his time, I think, among the sailors of the foreign shipping, spending money for charitable deserving, and again coming back in his calm, stern way. He has also, however, a tenderness, they say, which might accept your kind invitation to come up here, though not for some days. By George!" said the Commodore, "that must be Escondido?"

Piron sighed, as if a pleasant dream had vanished.

TO SOUTHERNERS,

DRINKERS OF

Congress Water.

MUCH spurious Mineral Water is sold as "CONGRESS WATER" by unprincipled persons as counterfeits also, when they have not use that name, call it "Saratoga" Water; "Saratoga" being only the name of the town where the Spring is situated.

To protect the public from such impositions, we have all our Corks branded thus [illegible]

Any not having those words and letters on the Corks, are Counterfeit; and the Purchaser should prosecute the Seller for swindling.

Orders will receive prompt attention if addressed to us at our Southern Depot of Congress Water, 98 CEDAR STREET, NEW YORK City.

Health of American Women.

The Graefenberg Company was organized under an Act of Legislature fifteen years ago, and it has become one of the most widely known and firmly established medical institutions in the country, and in its reputation for skill, integrity, and confidence, it challenges comparison with any other medical organization in the world. Some years ago the following testimony from high authority in the literary and religious community was received:

My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Graefenberg Company justifies me in expressing the opinion that their medicines are worthy of confidence.

FRANCIS HALL,
Editor and Proprietor N. York Commercial Advertiser.

I hereby certify that I have examined a number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they present evidences of genuineness, and are therefore entitled to the confidence of the public. H. A. P. CARSON, of the Methodist Church.

Since then, one of the leading Graefenberg medicines has been its

MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.

$5. BABBITT'S SOAP. Price per Box $5.
Mr. B. T. BABBITT, the well-known Soap and Saleratus manufacturer, is bringing out a new and useful article of which will put up boxes of 60 pounds each, in 1 pound bars, price $5 per box. This Soap is rapidly taking the place of all other Soaps wherever introduced. One pound will go as far as 3 pounds of ordinary Family Soap. It will wash in either hard or salt water; it does not injure it a fabric—in the country, it preserves it and fixes the colors. It will remove paint, grease, and stains of all kinds. But little labor is required where this Soap is used. Directions sent in every box for making ONE POUND OF THE ABOVE SOAP INTO FIFTEEN GALLONS OF HARD-SOME SOFT SOAP. Send for a box and give it a trial. If you do not want a whole box yourself, get your neighbors to join you and divide it. Believing that no family which has once used this Soap will ever be without it, and being desirous to have its merit widely known, I have made arrangements with the proprietors of the following papers (many of whom are tried the Soap and know its value), by which I am able for the present to offer to any person remitting to me $3 on any solvent Bank in the United States, one box of the above Soap, and a receipt for one year's subscription to either of the following New York papers, viz.:

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—No. 189.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"MASTER OLAF TAKETH THE SHOE IN HAND."

MASTER OLAF.

MASTER OLAF, the smith of Heligoland,
At midnight layeth his hammer by;
Along the sea-shore the tempest howls,
When a knock at the door comes heavily.

"Come out, come out, and shoe me my horse!
I must yet far, and the day is at hand!"
Master Olaf opens the door, and sees
A stately Ritter before him stand.

Black is his mail shirt, helm, and shield,
A broad-sword hangeth upon his thigh,
His black horse tosses his mane so wild,
And paws the ground impatiently.

"Whence so late! Whither so fast?"
"I yesterday lighted in Nordernie;
My steed is swift, the night is clear,
Ere sunrise I must in Norway be."

"Hadstest thou wings, that might I believe."
"My horse with the wind right well hath raced,
Yet already a star pales here and there,
So the iron bring hither, and make thou haste."

Master Olaf taketh the shoe in hand,
It is too small, but it spread and spread:
And as it grew to the edge of the hoof,
There seized the master fear and dread.

The Ritter mounts, and his broadsword clangs:
"Master Olaf, I bid thee now good-night!
Know, thou hast the horse of Odin shod;
I hasten across to the bloody fight."

The black horse shoots forward o'er land and sea,
Round Odin's head a splendor shone;
Twelve eagles are straining in flight behind,
Swiftly they fly—he rides foremost on.

"FATHER, INTO THY HANDS!"

AT NIGHT.

"DYING? You do but jest!
You smile in the dark, I know!
Surely I should know best
How the quick pulses go.
Lay your hand on my cheek:
Feel, though you see not, the red.
Why, in another week
I shall have left my bed!

"It was being so long alone—
So sick of the world's vain strife,
Uncared for, and unknown,
That sapp'd the springs of life!
You have given a world of love:
Is not our God above?
He will not summon me now.

"The summer is coming fast;
I can scent the rich perfume
Of the lilac by the door,
And the delicate apple-bloom.

Where shall our year be spent?
I long for the hills of Spain—
We will go to Rome, for Lent,
Then back to our home again.

"O, what is this sudden pang?
Is it growing darker, Will?
Heavily goes my heart—
It is almost standing still!
Raise me—I can not breathe—
Pray for me, love," she said.
"Father, into Thy hands!"
And my young wife was dead!

CONTRASTS.

GUESTS, at a nobleman's board,
Drink to the bridal morrow;
While, at the breast of the lord
Rankles a barb of sorrow.

Hark to the pitiful wail!
"That woman, my lord, without;

PEARL WEARERS AND PEARL WINNERS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"THEY ARE TAKING HER OFF TO THE JAIL."

They are taking her off to the jail."
"Merely a beggar, no doubt."

"What a singular sighing sound!"
Says one of the great, as the table
"John, have you looked to the hound?
Make him a bed in the stable."

Over those steps, again,
Entered a bride in the morn,
Follow'd by powder'd men,
Stiff, and stately, and shorn.

Out of a prison den
Issued a wretch that morn,
Follow'd by brutal men,
Eager to see and scorn.

"Quick! or we'll miss the marriage,
Yonder, in Hanover Square.
They are off in a splendid carriage:
Faith, they're a splendid pair!"

A birth in a chamber great;
A birth in a hospital ward:
One in sorrow; one in state;
Both the sons of a bird.

Doctors around her bed;
Nurses and friends beside.
Lightly and softly tread—
This is a titled bride.

Cover that face in a shroud:
Mention her name no more;
Though it was silent and proud,
She was plebeian and poor.

The charity brat she bore,
Yes! let him grow up in the crowd,
Cringe at the nobleman's door.
Cover her face with the shroud:
Mention her name no more!

Send the young heir to college,
To swim with the wealthy tide;
Probing the depths of knowledge,
Skimming the shoals of pride.

It may be his natural brother
Will hold his horse for a crust;
And neither can tell the other
Their kinship in common dust.

PEARL WINNERS.

PEARLS are costly. Yet they are merely the calcareous production of the class Mollusca. Diamonds, as a certain pun has elsewhere been noted, have been shown to be merely charcoal; the pearl is little else but concentric layers of membrane and carbonate of lime. All the class Mollusca are instances of that beneficent law of nature, that the hard parts accommodate themselves to the soft. The common oyster, snail, the mussel, cockle, oyster, garden helix, strombus, and nautilus, elegant or rough, are mollusks, each illustrates this grand law. The body of a soft consistence is inclosed in an elastic skin. From this skin calcareous matter is continually exuded. This protects the animal, and forms the shell. Where the waves are rough, and rocks superabundant, then the shell is rough, hard, angry; it is weather and wave, where only smooth water and halcyon days are to be looked for, Nature, who never works in vain, provides that paper sides and an apert beak, such as the little nautilus navigates and tacks and steers in.

Besides forming the rough outside, the calcareous exuvium, the mucus of the oyster and other mollusks, forms that beautiful substance, so smooth and polished, and dyed with rainbow tints, and a glorious opalescence, which, be it as common as luxury to-day, will still charm the eye. This is the lining of the shell, the mother-of-pearl, nacre. "The inside of the shell," said old Dampier, that old sailor with a poetic mind, "is more glorious even than the pearl itself."

It is glorious, it has the light of the morning, and the tint of the evening sky; the colors of the purest enchastened, softened, retained, and made perpetual in it: this is mother-of-pearl.

To retain what always soft and cozy, to lie warm, packed as one might at Malvern in wet sheets, secure in the oyster's plaited shell. This singular exuvium, this mucus, not only creates pleasure but alleviates pain. Some irritating substance, some animal worry and annoyance, it may be a dead embryo, or a grain of sand insinuates itself, and, lo! the creature covers it with this substance to ease off its unkind teeth, and smears it into a pearl.

That is the way they are made, these wonderful beauties!

"If," said Sir Everard Home, "if I can prove that this, the richest jewel in a monarch's crown, which can not be imitated by any art of man" (he is rather wrong there: it can be imitated, and wonderfully imitated too), "either by beauty of form or brilliancy of lustre, is the abortive egg of an oyster enveloped in its own mucus, who will not be struck with surprise and astonishment?" Wonder and astonishment are words which scarcely exist now. Science has shown so many wonders that we are hardly astonished at any thing; but Sir Everard's assertion admits of proof. A pearl cut in two exhibits the concentric layers like an onion, as may be seen through a strong glass; and in the centre is a round hole, very minute it may be, but wherein the ovum has been deposited.

Sometimes the ovum, or sand, or indeed substance has attached itself to the shell, and has then been covered with mucus, forming a pearl which can not be separated from the shell. There are several specimens of such pearls in the British Museum.

The great beauty in pearls is their opalescence, and a lustre which, however clever men say, they have never yet given to artificial pearls. Sir Everard Home supposes that this lustre arises from the highly polished coat of the centre cell, the pearl itself being diaphanous. Sir David Brewster accounts for it by the pearl and mother-of-pearl having a grooved substance on its surface resembling the minute corrugations often seen on substances covered with oil, paint, or varnish. Philosophers are sometimes not very explanatory. Sir David means to say that beneath the immediate polish of the pearl there are certain wavelets and ripples from which the light is reflected. "In the direction of the grooves," again to quote Sir David, "is in every case at right angles to the line joining the two colored images; hence, in irregularly formed mother-of-pearl, where the grooves are often circular, and have every possible direction, the colored images appear irregularly scattered round the ordinary image."

In the regular pearl these are crowded, from its spherical form, into a small space; hence its marvelous appearance of white unformed light; and hence its beauty and value.

To prove the translucency of the pearl, we have only to hold a split pearl to a candle, where, by interposing only a substance of light, we shall have the color transmitted through the pearl. Curious as is the formation of the pearl, we have yet a cognate substance to it. What we call bezoar, and the Hindoos fabdy, is a concretion of a deepish olive green color found in the stomach of sheep, dogs, cows, or other animals; the hog bezoar, the bovine bezoar, and the camel bezoar; this last the Hindoos turn into a yellow paint, and the harder substances the Hindoo jewelers polish and thread, and use as jewels, so that from the stomach of the lower animals, and from the secretions of a shellfish, the still grasping, prying, worrying, proud, vain-glorious, busy man gets his an ornament for her whom he most loves; for him whom he most honors.

The question of obtaining pearls and of slaying divers; of feeding sharks with human limbs; of the eyeballs starting and the tympanum of the ear bursting; of the pains, perils, and privations of the pearl-divers, must be touched incidentally in any true account of this precious gem.

Vanity demands the aid of cruelty, and for her gratification human sacrifices are still made.

At the Persian Gulf, at Ceylon, and in the Red Sea, the early sources of the Greek and Roman, we yet find our supply. Pearls are also found in the Indian Ocean along the Coromandel coast and elsewhere; but the two great fishing quarters are in Bahrein Island, in the Persian Gulf, and in the Bay of Condulchy, in the Gulf of Manaar off the Island of Ceylon. Here our pearl oyster dredgers bring up their natives.

The fishery at Ceylon is a monopoly of the British Government; but, like many Government monopolies, it is said to cost a great deal more than it produces. In 1804, Government farmed it for £120,000 per annum; in 1828 it only yielded £28,000. It is a desert and barren spot; no one can fall in love with it, though it is the scene of a picture-quye; yet, in its season, it attracts more to its shores than one of our best watering-places. Divers, merchants, agents, shroffs, boats, jewelers, and talkers; fish-sellers, butchers, boat-calkers, and Hindoo Robinsons and Walkers are all found there. The season lasts for six weeks, or two months at most, from February to April; and while they are making money these people are under anger, like the fishers themselves, victims of cruelty as they are, are also victims to their own superstition and avarice. Hindoo or Parsee blesses the water to drive away the sharks; a diver may be frightened or ill, and the Mahdays are as numerous as the actual workdays around only to thirty in the season.

The boats assembled sail at ten at night, a signal gun being fired at the Pearl Bank, which, reefs the banks before daybreak, and at sunrise the divers begin to take their "headers." They continue at this work till noon, when they return home, by their return. The cargoes are taken out before the night nets in, and the divers are refreshed.

Each boat carries ten divers—ten rowers and ten divers—besides a chief, or pilot. The divers take five at a time alternately, while the others time to recruit. To go down quickly they use a large stone of red granite, which they catch hold of with their feet. Each diver has a net work bag in his right hand, closes his nostrils with his left, or with a piece of bent horn, and descends to the bottom. They remain under water as quickly as he can, picking up with toes and fingers, and putting the oysters into his net-work bag. When this is full, or he can hold his breath, the rope and is drawn up, leaving the stone to be pulled up after him. When the oysters are very plentiful the diver goes down and up quickly and dips at a dip.

After this violent exertion blood flows from nose, ears, eyes. The divers can not exceed generally one minute's immersion. One and a half and even two minutes are sometimes the extraordinary efforts. Those who can endure four and five minutes are spoken of. One also we are told of, an apocryphal diver, we should think, who remained in 1797 from Arjanga, staid under water six minutes.

The divers live not to a great age. Heart diseases, aurleits, sores, blood-shot eyes, staggering limbs, and limit locks—these are part of their wages. Sometimes the diver, in bringing the stone back, suddenly, as if struck by a shot.

At Bahrein, the annual amount produced by the pearl fishery may be reckoned at from £300,000 to £200,000; and to this purchases made by the merchants of Aboushire, and we have £500,000 to include the whole pearl trade of the Gulf, since through their agents at Bahrein, merchants from Constantinople, Bombay, Calcutta, Paris, St. Petersburg, Holland, New York, Calcutta, Paris, St. Petersburg, Holland, Moscowa, or London make their purchases.

The true shape of the pearl should be a perfect sphere. In India and elsewhere those of the largest size find the readiest sale, and realize immense prices. The very finest pearls are sent to Europe, and of these the very finest of the fine are sent to London and Paris. Those the great people of the land procure their choice specimens. The late Emperor of Russia used to purchase for his wife, of whom he was exceedingly fond, the very finest pearl he could procure; a virgin pearl and a perfect sphere was what he sought, for he would add no other gem, and loved none by others. After five-and-twenty years' search he presented to the Empress such a necklace as had never before been seen.

Immense prices have been given and are still given for pearls. Julius Cæsar, in love with the mother of Marcus Brutus, is said to have donated her with a pearl worth £48,417 10s., which we can believe or not according to our nature. Marc Antony, as all the world has read, drank, dissolved in vinegar, a pearl which cost £80,729 of our money. Cleopatra (coyly enough, we suppose, and a gourmand) swallowed one worth £8072 18s. One of the modern pearls was bought by Tavernier at Catifa, and sold by him to the Shah of Persia for £110,000; another was obtained by Philip II. of Spain, of the Columbian coast, which weighed 250 carats, and was valued at $150,000.

A NEW SERIAL.

WE commence in this number a new Serial Tale by CHARLES LEVER, author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," etc., entitled

A Ride for a Day: Recollections of a Life.

We have reason to believe that it will be an usually brilliant and interesting. It succeeds the WOMAN IN WHITE, by Wilkie Collins, in Mr. CHARLES DICKENS'S British periodical; and it is here republished, by an arrangement with the author, in advance of its publication in England.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

IN a few days the Great Eastern will take her first departure for Great Britain. To say that she has been a success here would not be true. She has certainly attracted a great deal of attention—more than any other ship that ever anchored in the bay of New York. She has been visited by several hundred thousand people, who have paid their money to see her. Her enormous size, her wonderful structure, her engines, her boilers, her huge rudder, her marvelous internal arrangements, have each and all elicited the admiration, not only of the crowd, but of those best fitted to be judges of such matters. At the same time it would not be correct to say that she has been a success, or that we part from her with much regret.

For the fact is that, from first to last, the great ship has been mismanaged—most wastefully mismanaged by those who had her in charge. From the hour she crossed the bar at Sandy Hook, and received on board the visitors who went to meet her at Mr. Grinnell's invitation, to the present moment, the aim of her managers seems to have been to endeavor to disgust our people with the ship, her owners, directors, and general agents. And, wherever they have done in other respects, in that purpose they have succeeded admirably.

Of the visitors who went to sea on the bosom of her in the lower bay, on the 28th June last, we do not care to say any thing; a time may come, perhaps, when something may be said on the subject, but that something must be said by the American consignees. At the time, not a word of complaint was uttered, even by those who had paid for the privilege, and every body wanted the big ship to have a fair chance, and to achieve the object for which she came hereunder, to make money by exhibiting herself. But a week had not elapsed before the kindly feeling of her friends was again damped. Judicious suggestions, from experienced persons, addressed to the exhibition, were met by cool replies that the directors knew their business, and did not need American advice. When the exhibition was opened, and the system followed being, in every particular distinctively English, it was, and deserved to be, a failure. There were silly fences arranged about it, and there were disgraceful features. No lady could go on board without a notice of modesty, which appeared to have been ingeniously contrived, and which was heartily relished by men in the employ of the ship. This shameful inconvenience has never been thoroughly corrected, though attention has been called to it more than once, and the proper remedy suggested. The ship was as dirty as vessels are in the Thames, and many a ladyvisitor paid for her visit with the loss of her dress. Placards of almost an insulting character to the visitors hung in various places; the demeanor of the officers and crew was that of potentates suffering outcasts to approach their foot-stool, while they were in reality mere menials of British speculators who were the glad recipients of American dollars. To all friendly remonstrances the Englishmen's answer was the same: "We managed matters so in England, and do you expect us to come here to be taught?" It was mere waste of breath to try to convince them that American ladies did not take either to eat their dresses or to be forced into indelicate positions before the eyes of a parcel of grinning sayers, and that when American gentlemen paid their money to see a show they considered themselves entitled to ordinary civility on the part of the showmen.

After a time, the obvious failure of the exhibition compelled the managers to adopt a suggestion which had been urged upon them from the first by their American friends; the price of admission was reduced, and, in consequence, the show began to draw. In the course of a few days more tickets were sold in a day than had been sold in England in a week. Still the show was rendered as inconvenient as possible. Visitors were passed one by one through a turnstile which it required some dexterity to turn; it seems that the Englishmen had no one whom they could trust to take the tickets without a mechanical check. The inconvenience of this arrangement, when ten and fifteen thousand persons were crowding on board in the course of a few hours, can be conceived. Children were dragged half piece-meal half hour the throng was arrested and delayed several minutes by an angry discussion about ages between the Briton who kept the stile and the parent of some well-grown child. On board, the officers continued to illustrate the well-known politeness of John Bull; as our artist says, Adam and Eve were fools to them. Still, the directors made money; which was what they wanted.

Last of all came the Cape May expedition. This was widely advertised, and the price—$10 —loudly proclaimed. It was not till the day of sailing that it became generally known that the $10 did not include food or bedding, or the use of a wash-room, or any thing but a mere steerage passage. If an American ship had perpetrated such an act, the British papers would have rung with abuse of "Yankee swindling." When the ship sailed, matters were far worse. Not only were the passengers not provided with food at the expense of the ship, but they couldn't obtain any by paying for it. There was nothing to eat, and hardly any water to drink, and for twenty-five hours not a glass of water, without ice, were freely paid by gentlemen who had had the misfortune to take ladies with them. Not only were berths not provided by the directors, but money couldn't hire them. Most of the passengers slept on the decks, on the cabin floors, in hen-coops, any where. It rained in the night, and men, women, and women—were drenched as they lay helpless. The managers could not be found; the stewards and paid to their own drunk; the engineers more canny and independent, and openly declared that they would wait on no one till they had been paid in advance. In one word, no sooner had these Englishmen got into a enticing position, than a herd of our unhappy countrymen into their clutches on board their ship, than, from the highest to the lowest, they all set to work plundering and outraging them like very Arabs or Druses.

It is almost inclined to wonder that some of these fellows have not been treated to a coat of tar and feathers.

So the story ends for the present. It is time. It is time, we think, that the Great Eastern—or, at all events, her directors, officers, and crew—went back to their own country. Then we shouldn't see people; but we should see them, and paid our money, and we need say no more about it. In England, perhaps, they are the right men in the right place; but in a land where the Great Eastern, we should try to put at least one or two people on board who had the manners of gentlemen and the civility of Christians. The Great Eastern, we should suppose, Germans, Italians, Spaniards, Russians, and Orientals say—as they all do—that they hate Englishmen because Englishmen are rude, coarse, boorish, mean, and pig-headed, we Americans are apt, for comisship's sake, to stand up for poor old John, and put in a word for him. But we don't think it likely that any of the Americans who have experienced the tender mercies of the Great Eastern will have much to say in John's behalf hereafter.

WHAT DO THE ENGLISH MEAN?

WE read with some surprise that, at a meeting of the International Statistical Society, held in London on 10th July, in the presence of the delegates from all the nations of the world, Lord Brougham rose to object to the mode of proceeding by calling Mr. Dallas's attention to the fact that a negro was present as a member of the body.- Mr. Dallas of course took no notice of so gross a piece of rudeness; but the audience cheered and laughed heartily; and when, a few moments afterward, the negro whose name, it appears, is Delaney—rose and assured the audience that he, too, was a man and a brother, the applause and sneering laughter at the absurdity of the American Minister was almost overwhelming.

The same spirit is developed simultaneously in both Houses of Parliament. Sir Samuel Canard, the principal owner and manager of the Cunard line of steamers, lately justified the action of his Boston agent in refusing to allow a colored woman to share the table with his first-class passengers. For this Lord Brougham called Sir Samuel to account, and inquired in the House of Lords whether the courtesy enjoyed by the British Government over the Cunard line was not extensive enough to enable them to prevent such occurrences in future. A member of the Government replied, evidently with regret, that the Administration could not control the private passenger business of the line. Probably when the mail contract is renewed, a clause will be inserted to cover the "rights" of colored persons to first-class passages in the steamers.

To esp the whole, somebody in the House of Commons wants a resolution introduced requesting the Queen to hold no further diplomatic intercourse with slaveholding powers, and to admit no slaveholder to her receptions.

If it be the design of Great Britain to provoke a war with this country on a colored issue, these measures are well calculated to bring about the result. If it be the intention of Great Britain to remain on terms of friendship with the United States, we can, in all sincerity, assure the English that acts of this kind are quite certain to render the fulfillment of that intention a matter of great difficulty.

There are points concerning slavery and the negro race about which we Americans differ among ourselves, but there are others on which we are agreed. We are all agreed that it does not suit our tastes to sit at table with colored persons; or to live with them in every or equal terms. This sentiment is even more marked at Niagara, Nahant, and Newport than it is at Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans; and if any line of steamers were established to contravene it, it will simply do so at the expense of its American business. We are likewise all agreed that it does not become us to tolerate foreign interference or foreign dictation in our domestic concerns. British intermeddling, in any way or shape, with our domestic slavery quarrel can do no good on either side, least of all to the side which it purports to aid; but it can and it must create a bitter spirit of hostility toward Great Britain, the memories which should have been long ago buried.

There is another point on which all men on this side the water will agree; and that is, that it was not only in bad taste, but positively outrageous, for Lord Brougham, at a public meeting, to insult our Minister by his reference to the negro Delaney, knowing as he did the responsibilities Mr. Dallas bore, and the susceptibilities it was his duty to guard. The applause and sneers which followed the insult will, we fear, convey to the minds of all classes an idea of British feeling toward this country which may stand in the way of the next concession that is asked of us on the ground of "common brotherhood."

More regrettable than the insult and its reception unfortunate, as, at the very moment the news of them reached us, the Prince of Wales was setting foot on American soil to be the guest of the President.

THE LOUNGER.

AN OLD AND A NEW FRIEND.

Two very celebrated English personages have arrived upon the Western Continent. They always travel in company, and are inseparable; although the feeling on one side is merely passive, But it is entirely compensated by the luxurious and detailed activity of the other. Of course it is understood that these illustrious people are Jenkins and His Friend of Wales. The Prince Albert Edward, future King of England, appears to be in fine health and spirits, and Jenkins was never so eloquent and vivacious. He has still the excitement in informing an expectant continent that his friend the Royal Highness is the most amiable of men—smiling with the sweetness of innocent girlhood, yet leaping into the saddle with the alacrity of the practised equestrian. Also he says that evening in plain clothes, leaving the potential crown, sceptre, and ball behind—probably in the care of the loyal Canada, is shower comes as a welcome heir of Britain gets wet; but with a heroism worthy the future lord of the throne of Alfred, he rides on as calmly in a damp saddle as if it were as dry as Jenkins's mind, and as warm as his pen. Other young men run races and climb greased poles for his amusement, and the Prince of Wales generously laughs heartily from his superior heights of being; while the good Jenkins is overwhelmed by the affable condescension of the royal youth. Jenkins regards the advent of Albert Edward in America as the British islanders look upon the Jumbus and his crew. They were gods come down.

His Highness perpetually receives addresses, and replies to them. The circumstances are not propitious to spontaneity, for the draft of the address to be presented is handed in before it is delivered by the orator, and a response is prepared, which the future Defender of the Faith reads aloud when the proper time arrives. At trips among the communists, the watchful Jenkins perceives that he collars and then recovers. Since the Prince has been here he has dined and danced. Each dinner and ball is an ovation. Jenkins assures us, in rapturous language, that the ball-supper rooms are magnificent, and the lighting very brilliant. The royal dancing is beyond description. Jenkins, who remembers the ball at Almack's, like his revered grand-uncle, George the Fourth, when blessed memory Mr. W. M. Thackeray (oh is not related to the man who will write books as in Harper's Monthly Magazine, is unique and unsurpassed. He is a capital waltzer (see Jenkins, passim), a very entertaining partner in the lancers, per contra, frequently (so Jenkins), and fills up the interval with cheerful conversation and reminiscence of the company (Jenkins, I. c., cip. xxxi.). Jenkins hears the fair murmur ecstatic admiration of the prince's polka, and the delightful unobtrusiveness of a mind overfull, he whispers that his Highness's finest feature is his nose, which is becomingly prominent, and worthy a Bourbon. Perhaps Jenkins, a Puseyite nose, or on the way to Rome.

Jenkins went down to meet the Prince as he came up the bay. Jenkins is always going down. Prostration is his favorite attitude. Jenkins cheered the prince as he came up the bay from company, and the polite youth lifted his cap in response. Then his Highness was received, and the worthy Jenkins read one of his addresses—his pallet, let us rather say, with much color and little freshness. The Prince listened with great admiration (sic Jenkins). Yes, Jenkins, when did a Prince otherwise in the eyes of his faithful J. J.? He has a multitude of addresses to receive, typlps of Saratoga, attend! he has a complexion —equal to that of a peach. Thou best Jenkins! and looks very well. His hair is dark, curls down, and cut so as to show the lobes of his ears. But is it shingled, Jenkins? Is it parted at the right or left? Is it worn in the present style of its prince in perplexity? And reflect, Jenkins, that you have not told us whether he has a ring upon his finger—nor how many—nor what fingers. Nor the number of his gloves, good Marquis Jenkins; nor the quantity of linen he carries with him, the laundress, nor what Princes pay a dozen for the doing up of royal shirts: nor whether he lisps: nor—O Jenkins! you have done only shows us what you have yet to do.

When the three young English gentlemen, Lord Lyndrith, Digby, Ashley, and Sneyd were here, a year or two since, Jenkins used to look into their hats and try to peep into their bedrooms: except Mr. Ashley—for he gently complained that, when Jenkins discovered that he was not a Lord, but only Mr. Ashley, Jenkins regarded him with sudden disdain as an impostor. The world was anxious to learn if the dressing-gown of Lord Cavendish was trimmed or wrought with silk—or silk embroidered with velvet; but the dressing-gown of Mister Ashley! why, Jenkins had a dressing-gown in which——It is possible, therefore, that it was not quite accurate to say that two illustrious personages had just arrived upon the continent if they had never been here before. The young Prince, whom as an English gentleman and the royal representative of our country in civilization, every American is glad to honor, comes, indeed, for the first time. May his journey be happy and interesting, and his life long and useful! But Jenkins and Jenkins! what, old mole, work'st thou i' the earth so fast? Jenkins in chicken-hearted! Jenkins was with Cunate on the beach. He told Alexander that his neck was all right (not wry-). He assured Charles First that Hampden was an ass. And he murmurs to Albert Edward the blissful truth that his complexion is equal to that of a peach.

Did Jenkins come at all? Is he not indigenous? Is not a rich pulpy toad, for a great many of us, a special toy? a fat turtle social? Is not Jenkins Jenkins and the Prince reach New York, and then let us see.

THE FATED SHIP.

At length we all know what ship it was that was built in the eclipse and rigged with curses and dark. The mysterious and slender source to be to persuade us all to believe in fate, and luck, and stars of fortune. And surely hers is a gloomy one, and a dark luck, and a fatal fortune. Every thing she has done, or that has been done to her or with her, has been a huge mistake, except the execution. And that was the first grave error point. She had reduced the price of admission, and thousands were gladly paying half a dollar to rumble through the masts of her at Staten Island, feeling respecting her was clearly improving, and the prospect of an excursion was received with favor. It was a doubtful experiment, but it was successful since it seemed wiser to stay quiet at the foot of a thousand dollars and a day. But still it was enterprising. It was yielding to a natural desire to see her in motion as well as in grim repose expecting her prey.

And now of all failures and shocking mistakes and disastrous mismanagements the excursion seems to have been chief. It was of the last importance that nobody should blunder, and every body appears to have blundered. It was most desirable, upon every possible account, that the public favor should be attracted to the fine, comfortable, easy, safe ship. Suppose that the two thousand passengers had consented to sign a circular (they always do upon the least possible excuse) that there never was such a cure for seasickness, for instance, as going to sea in the Great Eastern. Suppose they had unanimously agreed that her management was of a paternal character which made a voyage in her actually pathetic. Suppose that of all affable and gentlemanly barkeepers the steward of the Great Eastern had been pronounced facile princeps. Suppose that we had heard how beds so soft—and sheets so cool—and such silence so absolute—and such night watches—and such general comfort, care, and encouragement had never been heard of as had been found upon the iron steamer—what a prospect would then it would have thenceforth been! How the shy Tinsens of public esteem would have embraced that lovely Bottom!

It ought to have been made absolute high treason to the state for any servant to have taken any bribe, or to have attempted to sell any thing to eat, or drink, or lie upon, for any price higher than that of the plainest silk, which should have been posted all over the ship, and every article so lightly charged that nobody should ever cry enough. That would have been the strictest certainty that every passenger had a good bed and an abundance of water and of all ordinary conveniences.

All this could not have been done without extraordinary expense, and some expense. But it was essential. If it were not done, the excursion was a foregone failure and a curse to the ship. It was mad-house, and not a ship-load. The ship went out of its way—there was no regulation or accommodation for baggage—no understanding about state-rooms—gentlemen and gentlemen were forced to camp out upon mattresses upon the dirty damp decks, and were rained upon before morning; only the wretched and precure water for washing—no drinking-water from ten cents to two shillings a glass was the charge; the water was wasted by exhibitions in fender chains broke, "the knocking of the cat-block" broke, a cigar set a mattress on fire in the middle of the night, the band wouldn't play for dancing without extra payment; it was a night of horrors, and the officers disclaimed all responsibility.

The passengers held a mass indignation meeting and resolved that the excursion was a swindle. Of course no one could have foreseen all these errors. It will appear that it was Nobody's fault—that Nobody is to blame—that that arch scoundrel Nobody took possession of the ship and managed the whole excursion, and Nobody will suffer, when he is caught. This fatal excursion has blighted the fair ship's good sailing record for the Great Eastern in the public mind. Before, she might be regarded with melancholy pity, with tender sympathy, after, she had acquired contempt and indignation.

Yet that is a melancholy pity, with tender sympa-

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PUNCH'S ODE ON THE DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Adieu then, ye gales,
And ye Royal sails
That waft the Prince of Wales
In a vessel of the line,
Away to Canada
Across the ocean brine;
As the son of his Mamma,
His weather shall be fine.

What transports the Canadians will evince
When they behold our youthful Prince!
Not one alone, but nine fairs,
Each colony with England shares
The Princely youth to be a heir.
Like the bulls will ring, the cannons roar!
And they will no doubt call a Prince before,
Or, won't they fogle him and caress him!
They've plenty of chickweed for him,
His Royal Highness—shall have him—
Their descendants for ages may bore.

They'll agile, no doubt, a greater fuss
Than Wales first Earl of Dundee was as an ass,
As home of our reindeer pasts,
Where country Gentlemen rear sons,
For the first time, Her Majesty—
(May she be long spared long to reign!)
When by her Parliament set free,
She travels by a shopping train,
Britannia's trump the Queen of Hearts.
Not since the days of Pocahontas waits
The Prince in the United States!
What trade will the Yankees work
A sight of him in hopes to get!

What multitudes demand
To shake the heir to be hard!
Hosts of reporters will his footsteps dog
And Baron Renfrew his goes (laugh.
Take down his every word,
Describe his dress and his nose,
And eyes, and hair, and clothes,
With a microscopic accuracy dwell.

Ye free and easy citizens, be not rude,
Disturb not our young Prince's rest;
Upon his accession he'll not be disturbed.
Wait till he's dead.
Then his Royal Highness will not be blest
To whom the son of England's Queen shall say
"Get out of the way!"

And, oh—to touch a tender theme—
How will the fair around him throng,
And vy, figuratively, for their shyness,
To salute his Royal Highness,
The future husband of a Royal Queen!
The force of loveliness is strong.
A Monarch's quality to the Indian thinks,
And certain things in Heaven are written;
And is there any cause to hinder
The Prince of Wales from being smitten?
Transcendent destinies link the two even monarchs frantic,
A German Princess must be marry'
And who more fit than Alexandra?
One of Columbia's fascinating daughters
An American lady to Albert?

Truth many a sec might trove to own,
Hopes that to her she herself only be thing,
To the ultimate exaltation of a young
American lady to the British throne.

CAN TOADS LIVE WITHOUT AIR?—This problem is now occupying the scientific. A party of officials, "highly placed at the Tuileries," recently got rail last week from Boulogne to Paris, smoked, and kept the windows shut the whole journey. Whereon it is clear that, whether toads can or can not live without air, those who eat them do.

A low-art critic, who has recently visited Ross Bonheur's cattle pictures, describes them as being very beautiful pictures.

CONSTITUTIONS!

ALL A-BLOWING—ALL A-GROWING!

Our eggs in weather lore knowing,
Look blank at the dearth of the crops,
And declare this wet summer is going
To ruin our wheat, hay, and hops.
Nor alone on our tight little island
Has Providence begun to shine,
In all climes, North or South, low or high land,
This year he seems out of line.

But while anxious Europe is dreading
Short harvests, high prices, and dearth,
There's not a crop, at least, that's not growing
Just where you'd least look for its birth.
That's the time when weeds love to thrive,
Tyrants try to plant out revolution,
And to fetter black Democracy—Rich-
By state-gardeners called "Constitution."

Of all soils, it must be admitted,
That the soil of infallible Rome
Seems about the most strangely ill-fitted
For such plants to flourish at home.
Yet new Pio Nono this summer,
Has a dwarf Constitution,

Rome, Naples, and Austria, before
Saw this plant tried by the sun's light,
Remembering the fruit that it bore,
Can we wonder they mutter "Too late?"

What hope that the plant will grow fair,
When the roots that should nourish its seed
Are struck in a barren manure,
Whose toole fail his hand at its need?
From no poisoned and fruitless root
What but poison and foster can grow?
Such a seedling will never come to fruit,
Though too likely it sows to a blow.

A SLIGHT DRAWBACK.

Enchanting girl! by earlier fun
In playful dreams around me dances;
They smile so bright, so free from sun,
Thy dimpled cheek, they jet-black hair,
Thy heart outmasses.

But oh! those eyes, those lovely eyes,
With joy and innocence still gleaming!
The winged light around them flies
Than do the glances from those eyes,
Of mischief beaming.

I'd woo thee, maiden, were it not
That every one thinks me bewilderin';
I'd woo thee, maiden, were it not
For this one thing—you are not for me,
And six small children!

It is no uncommon thing for hot words to produce a coolness.

With baser metals the workmanship is every thing; but when it is a question of gold, we do not much care whether or it is the first fit, the suggest, or the design, so, too, the grandest poetical ideas are independent of their vehicle.

A generous mind identifies itself with all around it; a selfish one identifies all things with itself. The generous man sees his happiness in promoting that of others; the selfish man reduces all things to his own interest.

He is a fool who seeks that which he can not find; he is a fool who seeks that which, if found, will do him more harm than good; he is a fool who, having many ways to his journey's end, takes the worst.

You may find it very difficult to get away from bad company, but you needn't on that account throw yourself away.

A clergyman having preached several times in a small town, in which he had not once been invited to dinner, said, in strengthening his last discourse, against the slander produced by the prevalent vices of the age, "I have preached against every vice but inviting people to dinner, and the no opportunity of observing to what extent it was carried on in this town."

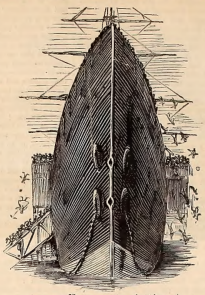
A paper lately gave an account of a duel, and announced the result of the meeting in these words: "The one party was wounded severely in the arm, and the other fired in the air." Query—who wounded the artillerist?

Jones had been out to a Champagne party, and returned home at a late hour. He had hardly got into bed when he was awakened by his wife. "Jones, Jones, some!" hiccoughed Jones. "I say, Mrs. Jones, this clock is out of order. It has struck one four times."



"Papa," said a little boy to his father the other day, "can one sailors very, very small man?"—"No, my dear!" answered his father. "Pray what leads you to suppose that they are so small?"—"Because," replied the young dear, smartly, "I read the other day of a sailor going to sleep in his watch."

WATER ON THE BRAIN.—Little Willie's mother told him to check his head under the water, the other day, when she was bathing him. "Oh, I'm afraid!" said he. "Why, my child, what are you afraid of?"—"Oh, I'm afraid I'll drown!" replied the little fellow, with a look of terror.

THE CITY OF HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA.

THE PRINCE OF WALES' VISIT TO AMERICA.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

HALIFAX—where the Prince of Wales landed on 20th ult.—the capital of the British-American province of Nova Scotia, and the principal naval and military station of the British in their North American possessions, is a mean-looking country town of some 20,000 inhabitants. Nature has done every thing for Halifax and enterprise nothing. Situate on the slope of a hill, on the west side of a harbor perhaps without exception the finest and most capacious in the world, its few wharves are but piles of sword-grown lumber, and the amount of shipping in its land-locked bay scarcely ever equals the tonnage of a fif-h-rate counting haven. The city itself has an old and decrepit look, as if a blight had fallen upon its energies somewhere about the close of the last American war. Altogether it seems a dreary place to dwell in.

Halifax harbor, or, as it is called, Chebucto Bay, is entered from the south, and, from Sambro Light, extends northward about fifteen miles, terminating in a basin of area and depth enough to float the whole British fleet of a thousand war-ships. A bold, wooded island of some extent, called M'Nab's Island (private property), lies directly in the chops of the harbor, and divides it into two entrances—one suited for small craft only, the other with water in the channel for ships of the largest size. Directly within M'Nab's Island stands George's, or St. George's Island, as islet surmounted by a redoubt, and otherwise weightily armed. Indeed, the whole harbor, at every point threatening the channel, bristles with batteries. Overlooking the town is the citadel, a fortress of strength, commanding the harbor and country for miles, and so placed that the guns of hostile ships would have little avail against its walls. To the north of the city is the dock-yard, the station of the ships of war. At present the fleet lying there is under the command of Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, whose flag-ship is the Nile. Near by the station is anchored the Pyramus, an old frigate taken in some former war, and now used as a receiving-ship. Close by the dock-yard are the powder-magazines, one of which blew up, a few years since, in a mysterious manner, and overlooking the water are a noble range of buildings, which the visitor will learn with surprise are merely barracks for 1000 men. Visitors who wish to learn how the British soldier is treated should endeavor, by permission of the military authorities, to inspect these quarters. Northward from this spot the harbor, under the name of Bedford Basin, extends some eight or nine miles inland, forming the fine sheet of water already described. On the shores of the basin the Duke of Kent, grandfather of the present Prince of Wales, had his residence while in command of the troops in North America. Nothing now remains of "the Prince's lodge" but a few scattered stones. Up this basin, in 1746, sailed many ships, the storm-shattered remains of a French fleet, under the proud Duke of Anville, sent to reconquer Nova Scotia. Broken-hearted at the failure of his enterprise, the Duke died by poison; the Vice-Admiral, his old Roman, ran himself through with a sword; and the survivors, sinking some of their ships, came ashore into the woods at a spot still called the "French landing." Her 3500 men, with a large number of Indian auxiliaries, perished of pestilence and famine. The writer of this devoted a day to exploring the site, but found no relic of the disaster of which the spot was the scene. The locality is a little under three miles from Halifax, on the highway, near the "Three-Mile House."

There are many other historic spots near the city, most of them associated with events of the French wars, and not a few relating to incidents of Indian hostility. At Dartmouth, a small village on the opposite side of the harbor—which ought to be what Brooklyn is to New York, if Halifax were to New York—a band of Indians from the Basin of Minas fell on the infant settlement, and left not a fire burning on its hearths. For five-and-twenty years the place was deserted; and it was not till 1784 that a band of Nantucketers resettled it. The village is now attached to Halifax by two ferry steamers, which run during the day at five cents per passenger, and not at all at night.

The public buildings of Halifax are few and shabby. The Province Building is an exception. It is of brown freestone, and presents a respectable frontage of 140 feet on Granville and Hollis streets—two of the leading thoroughfares of the city. It contains the public offices and legislative chambers. At present the proportions of the edifice are disfigured by two wooden shanties, stuck on by way of wings, and intended to accommodate the guests of the incendiar dull. Fronting on the Grand Parade (a small plot of ground with nothing grand about it) stands Dalhousie College, a squat, heavy institution, of no particular use excepting that in one corner is located the Post-office. Temperance Hall, a neat structure of wood, wherein most of the concerts and shows are held; the Merchants' Exchange, a suit of rented offices; the City Market, and the Mason Hall, apparently well adapted to their respective uses; the Lunatic Asylum, overlooking the water on the Dartmouth side, and the Provincial Penitentiary and the French Prison, a military post, on the fine stretch of sea known as the Northwest Arm, are about the only other public edifices worth notice. A handsome new court-house is nearly completed. Government House, the residence of the Earl of Mulgrave, is a substantial stone house, of no pretension to beauty, badly placed, and having a cheerful view into a graveyard, where has been recently erected a handsome monument to the memory of Welsford and Parker, two Nova Scotian officers who fought and fell with distinction in the Crimea. Besides the buildings named, Halifax contains several handsome churches.

PART III.

WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

I.

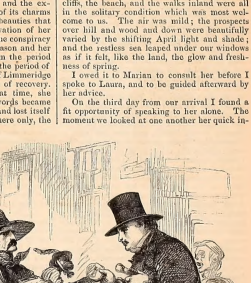
FOUR months passed. April came—the month of spring, the month of change.

The course of Time had flowed through the interval since the winter, peacefully and happily in our new home. I had learned my long lesson to good account; had largely increased my sources of employment; and had placed our means of subsistence on surer grounds. Fresh from the suspense and the anxiety which had tried her so sorely, and hung over her so long, Marian's spirits rallied, and her natural energy of character began to assert itself again with something, if not all, of the freedom and the vigor of former times.

More pliable under change than her sister, Laura showed more plainly the progress made by the healing influences of her new life. The worn and wasted look which had prematurely aged her face was fast leaving it, and the expression which had been the first of its charms in past days was the first of its beauties that now returned. My closest observation of her detected but one serious result of the conspiracy which had once threatened her reason and her life. Her memory of events, from the period of her leaving Blackwater Park to the period of our meeting in the burial-ground of Limmeridge Church, was lost beyond all hope of recovery. At the slightest reference to that time, she changed and trembled still; her words became confused; her memory wandered and lost itself as helplessly as ever. Here, and here only, the traces of the past lay deep—too deep to be effaced.

In all else she was now so far on the way to recovery that, on her bad nights and bad days, she sometimes looked and spoke like the Laura of old times. The happy change wrought its natural result in me for both. From their long slumber, on her side and on mine, those inexpressible memories of our past life in Cumberland now awoke, which were one and all alike, the memories of our love.

Gradually and insensibly, our daily relations toward each other became constrained. The fond words which I had spoken to her so naturally in the days of her sorrow and her suffering, faltered strangely on my lips. In the time when my bread of losing her was most present to my mind, I had always known that when she left me at night and when she met me in the morning. The kiss seemed now to have dropped between us—to be lost out of our lives. Our hands parted and trembled again when they met. We hardly ever looked long at one another out of Marian's presence. The talk often flagged between us when we were alone. When I touched her by accident, I felt my heart beating fast, as it used to beat at Limmeridge House—I saw the lovely answering flush glowing again in her cheeks, as if we were back among the Cumberland hills, in the early characters of master and pupil once more. She had long intervals of silence and thoughtfulness, and denied she had been thinking when Marian asked her the question. I surprised myself one day neglecting my work to dream over the little water-color portrait of her which I had taken in the summer-house where we first met—just as I used to neglect Mr. Fairlie's drawings to dream over the same likeness when it was newly finished, in the by-gone time. Changed as all the circumstances now were, our position toward each other in the golden days of our first companionship seemed to be revived with the revival of our love. It was as if Time had drifted us back, on the wreck of our early hopes, to the old familiar shore!



To any other woman I could have spoken the decisive words which I still hesitated to speak to her. The utter helplessness of her position; her friendless dependence on all the forbearing gentleness that I could show her; my fear of touching too soon some secret sensitiveness in her, which my instinct as a man might not have been fine enough to discover—these considerations, and others like them, kept me self-distrustfully silent. And yet I knew that the restraint on both sides must be ended; that the relations in which we stood toward one another must be altered, in some settled manner, for the future; and that it rested with me, in the first instance, to recognize the necessity for a change.

The more I thought of our position, the harder the attempt to alter it appeared while the domestic conditions on which we three had been living together since the winter remained undisturbed. I can not account for the capricious state of mind in which this feeling originated—but the idea nevertheless possessed me that some previous change of place and circumstances, some sudden break in the quiet monotony of our lives, so managed as to vary the home aspect under which we had been accustomed to see each other, might prepare the way for me to speak, and might make it easier and less embarrassing for Laura and Marian to hear.

With this purpose in view, I said one morning that I thought we had all earned a little holiday and a change of scene. After some consideration, it was decided that we should go for a fortnight to the sea-side. On the next day we left Fulham for a quiet town on the south coast. At that early season of the year we were the only visitors in the place. The cliffs, the beach, and the walks inland were all in the solitary condition which we most welcome to us. The air was mild; the prospects over hill and wood and down were beautifully varied by the shifting April light and shade; and the restless sea leaped under our windows as if it felt, like the land, the glow and freshness of spring.

I owed it to Marian to consult her before I spoke to Laura, and to be guided afterward by her advice.

On the third day from our arrival I found a fit opportunity of speaking to her alone. The moment we looked at one another her quick instinct detected the thought in my mind before I could give it expression. With her customary energy and directness she spoke at once, and spoke first.

"MY POOR LITTLE MAN!" HE SAID, ETC.

"You are thinking of that subject which was mentioned between us on the evening of your return from Hampshire," she said. "I have been expecting you to allude to it for some time past. There must be a change in our little household, Walter; we can not go on much longer as we are now. I see it as plainly as you do—as plainly as Laura sees it, though she says nothing. How strangely the old times in Cumberland seem to have come back! You and I are together again, and the one subject of interest between us is Laura once more. I could almost fancy that this room is the summer-house at Limmeridge, and that those waves beyond us are bursting on our sea-shore."

"I was guided by your advice in those past days," I said; "and now, Marian, with reliance ten-fold greater, I will be guided by it again."

She answered by pressing my hand. I saw that the generous, impulsive nature of the woman was deeply touched by my reference to the past. We sat together near the window; and, while I spoke and she listened, we looked at the glory of the sunlight shining on the majesty of the sea.

"Whatever comes of this confidence between us," I said, "whether it ends happily or sorrowfully for me, Laura's interests will still be the interests of my life. When we have this place, on whatever terms we leave it, my determination to wrest from Count Fosco the confession which I failed to obtain from his accomplices goes back with me to London as certainly as I go back myself. Neither your love nor your pity must stand between me and that duty. I will plan and work by day; we only know, by his own words and actions, that he is capable of striking at me, through Laura, without a moment's hesitation, or a moment's remorse. In our present position, I have no choice but to wait which society sanctions, which its law allows, to strengthen me in resisting him, and in protecting her. This places me at a serious disadvantage. If I am to defeat our cause with the Count, strong in the conscientiousness of Laura's safety, I must fight it for my Wife. Do you agree to that, Marian, on her?"

"To every word of it," she answered.

"I will not plead out of my own heart," I went on; "I will not appeal to the love which has survived all changes and all shocks—I will rest my only vindication of myself for thinking of her and speaking of her as my wife, on what I have just said. If the chance of forcing a confession from the Count is, as I believe it to be, the last chance left of publicly establishing the fact of Laura's existence, the least selfish reason that I can advance for our marriage is recognized by us both. But I may be wrong in my conviction, other means of achieving our purpose may be in my power, which are less uncertain and less dangerous. I have searched anxiously, in my own mind, for those means—and I have not found them. Have you?"

"No. I have thought about it too, and thought in vain."

"In all likelihood," I continued, "the same questions have occurred to you, in considering this difficulty, which have occurred to me. Ought we to return with her to Limmeridge, now that she is like herself again, and trust to the recognition of her by the people of the village or by the children at the school? Ought we to appeal to the practical test of her hand-writing? Either we did so. Suppose the recognition of her shrunken, and the identity of the handwriting established. Would success in both those cases be more than supply an excellent foundation for a trial in a court of law? Would the recognition of the handwriting prove her identity to Mr. Fairlie, and take her back to Limmeridge House, against the evidence of her aunt, against the evidence of the medical certificate, against the fact of the funeral and the fact of the inscription on the tomb? No! We could only hope to succeed in throwing a serious doubt on the assertion of her death—a doubt which nothing short of a legal inquiry can settle. I will assume that we possess (for we have certainly not got) money enough to carry this inquiry on through all its stages. Is it probable that Mr. Fairlie's prejudices might be reasoned away; that the false testimony of the Count and his wife could be set aside by the false testimony might be confuted; that the recognition could not possibly be ascribed to a mistake between Laura and Anne Catherick, or the handwriting be declared by our enemies to be a clever fraud—all these are assumptions which, more or less, set plain, established evidence aside. Let us pass—and let us ask ourselves what would be the first consequence of the first questions put to Laura touching on the subject of her identity. We know only too well what the consequence would be—she would relapse into the terror recovered her memory of what happened to her in London. Examine her privately, or examine her publicly, she is utterly incapable of assisting the assertion of her own case; you don't see this, Marian, as plainly as I see it, we will go to Limmeridge and try the experiment to-morrow."

"I do see it, Walter. Even if we had the means of paying for the law expenses, even if we succeeded in the end, the delays would be unendurable; the perpetual suspense, after what we have suffered already, would be heartbreaking. You are right about the hopelessness of going to Limmeridge. I wish I could feel sure that you are right also in determining to try that last chance with the Count. Is it a chance at all?"

"Decoy, Marian. Yes. To tie the assertion of recovering the lost date of Laura's journey to London. Without returning to the reasons I gave you some time since, I am still as firmly persuaded as ever that there is a discrepancy between the date of that journey and the date on the certificate of death. There lies the weak point of the whole conspiracy—it crumbles to pieces if we extract it. In that way, and in that way only, attacking it are in possession of the Count. If I succeed in wresting them from him, the object of your life and mine is fulfilled. If I fail, the wrong that Laura has suffered will, in this world, never be redressed."

"Do you fear failure yourself, Walter?"

"I dare not anticipate success; and, for that very reason, Marian, I speak openly and plainly, as I have spoken now. In my heart and my conscience I can say it—Laura's hopes for the future are not dearer to me than her present misfortune is gone; I know that the last chance of restoring her to her place in the world lies at the mercy of our worst enemy, of a man who is now absolutely unassailable, and who may remain unassailable to the end. With every worldly advantage gone from her: with all prospect of recovering her rank and station more than doubtful; with no clearer future before her than the future which her husband can provide—the poor drawing-master may hurriedly open his lover's eyes. In the days of my prosperity, Marian, I was only the teacher who guided her hand—I ask for it, in her adversity, as the hand of my wife!"

Marian's eyes met mine affectionately—I could say no more. My heart was full, my lips were trembling. In spite of myself, I was in danger of spending on her pity. I got up to leave the room. She rose at the same moment, laid her hand gently on my shoulder, and stopped me.

"Walter!" she said, "I once parted you both for your good and for mine. Wait here, my Brother!—wait, my dearest, best friend, till Laura comes, and tells you what I love done now!"

For the first time since the farewell morning at Limmeridge she touched my forehead with her lips. A tear dropped on my face as she kissed me. She turned quickly, pointed to the chair from which I had risen, and left me.

I sat down alone at the window, to wait through the crisis of my life. My mind, in that breathless interval, was like a blank sheet. I was conscious of nothing but a painful intensity of all familiar perceptions. The sun grew higher and brighter; the white sea-birds, in search other far beyond me, seemed to be flitting before my face; the mellow murmur of the waves on the beach was like thunder in my ears.

The door opened, and Laura came in alone. So she had entered the breakfast-room at first, when I was absent with Marian, and we parted. Slowly and falteringly, in sorrow and in hesitation, she had once approached me. Now she came to me in the haste of happiness in her feet, with the light of happiness radiant in her face. Her own arms, those dear arms, that trembled themselves round me; of their own accord, the sweet lips came to meet mine. "My darling!" she whispered, "my darling! may I love each other now?" Her head nestled with a tender contentedness on my bosom. "Oh," she said, innocently, "I am so happy at last!"

Ten days later we were married. Shortly.

The course of this narrative, steadily flowing on, bears me away from the morning-time of our married life, and carries me forward to the End.

In a fortnight more we three were back in London, and the shadow was stealing over us of the strength of Fate.

Marian and I were careful to keep Laura in ignorance of the cause that had hurried us back to the metropolis. She was told that Mr. Fairlie was now the sole proprietor of Limmeridge. It was now the beginning of May, and his term of occupation at the house in Forest Road was expired in April. If he renewed it (and I had reasons, shortly to be mentioned, for anticipating that he would), I was to undertake all his leasing that he would, by the course of events, be unwilling to renew. But if by any chance he anticipated my expectations and left the country before I had arrived, I was in arming myself to meet him as I best might.

In the first fullness of my new happiness there had been moments when I was half-tempted, faltered—moments when I was tempted to be safely content, now that the dearest aspiration of my life had accomplished itself, to accept Laura's love. For the first time, I thought faint-heartedly of the greatness of the risk; of the adverse chances, even at the best, of the full recognition of our new lives, and the full proof of my which I might place the happiness within the reach of my hands. Yes! let me own it honestly. For a brief time I wandered, in the sweet guiding of the fire, far from the object which had long been true under stormier discipline and in darker days. Innocently, Laura had tempted me aside from the hard and thorny pathway which I had destined to lead me back again. At times, dreams of the terrible past still disconnectedly recalled to her, in the night-time, the secret of Anne and of which her waking memory had lost all trace. One night (barely two weeks after our marriage), when I was nursing her at my side, she woke from some slowly through her closed eyelids, I heard the faint murmuring words escape her lips, and saw that her face was turned again on the fatal journey from Blackwater Park. That unconscious appeal, the first since her recovery from the unconscious her of sleep, ran through me like fire. The next day was the day we came back to London—and my weaker resolution returned to me with ten-fold strength.

The first necessity was to know something of the man. How far, day by day, was the life of the man as impenetrable mystery to me.

I began with such scanty sources of information as my own experience gave. The important narrative written by Mr. Frederick Fairlie (which Marian had obtained from Madame Fosco at the moment I had given to her in winter) proved to be of no service to the special object which I had now in view. As far as I could judge it, I reconsidered the disclosure revealed to me by Mrs. Clements, of the series of deceptions which had been practised on Mr. Philip Hartright, and which had there devoted her to the interests of the conspiracy. Here, again, the Count had not overlooked the slightest thing. There, also, he was, to all practical purpose, out of my reach.

I next returned to Marian's journal at Blackwater Park. In the first days of our stay there, I had again a passage which referred to her past criticisms on the character of Count Fosco, particularly which she had discovered relating to him.

The passage to which I allude occurs in that part of her journal which describes Laura's visit to her and his personal appearance. She describes him as "not having crossed the frontiers of his native country for years past"—as "anxious to know if any Italian gentlemen were settled in the nearest town to Blackwater Park"—as "receiving letters with all sorts of odd stamps on them, and one with a large, official-looking seal on it." She is inclined to consider these circumstances (with native ingenuity) may be reconciled for by assuming that he is a political exile. But she is, on the other hand, unable to reconcile this idea with his reception of the letter from abroad, bearing "the large, official-looking seal"—letters from the Continent addressed to political exiles being usually the last to court attention from foreign post-offices in that way.

The considerations thus presented to me in the diary, joined to certain surmises of my own that grew out of them, suggested a conclusion which I considered I had not arrived at before. I now said to myself—what Laura had once said to Marian at Blackwater Park; what Madame Fosco herself had said, listening at the door—the Count is a Spy!

Laura had applied the word to him at hazard, a natural anger at his proceedings toward her secret. I applied it to him, with the deliberate conviction that his conduct in this was the action of a Spy. On this assumption, the reason for his extraordinary stay in England, so long after the object for which the conspiracy had been joined, became, to my mind, quite intelligible.

The year of which I am now writing was the year of the International Exhibition of Works of Hyde Park. Foreigners, in unusually large numbers, had arrived already and were still arriving in England. Men were among us, by thousands, whom the ceaseless distrustfulness of their governments had followed privately, by means of appointed agents, to our shores. My surmises did not for a moment class a man of the Count's intellectual social position with the ordinary rank and file of foreign spies. I suspected him of holding a position of authority, of having intrusted to his government which he secretly served, with the organization and management of agents specially employed in this country. I was right in my surmises; and I shortly knew it. Rubelle, who had been so opportunely found to act as nurse at Blackwater Park, to help Mrs. Rubelle, was one of the number.

Assuming this his idea of mine had a foundation in truth, my position with the Count would prove to be more assailable than I had hitherto, ventured to hope. To whom could I apply to watch the movements of the man's history, and of the man himself, than I knew now?

In this emergency, it naturally occurred to my mind what I could do myself, and to whom I could rely, might be the fittest person to help me. The first man whom I thought of, under these circumstances, was also the only Italian with whom I was intimately acquainted —my quaint little friend, Professor Pesca.

The Professor has been so long absent from these pages, that I may run some risk of having forgotten altogether. It is the necessary law of such a story as mine, that the persons concerned in it only appear when the course of events leads them up—they come and go, not by favor of my personal partiality, but by right of their direct connection with the circumstances to be detailed. For this reason, not Pesca only, but my mother and sister as well, have been left far in the background of my story. My visits to the little tea-and cottage; my mother's lamentable belief in the denial of Laura's identity which the conspiracy had accomplished; my vain efforts to overcome the prejudice, on her part and on my sister's, to which Laura's altered appearance led me, they both continued to adhere; the painful necessity which that prejudice imposed on me of concealing my marriage from them till they had learned to do justice to my wife—all these little domestic occurrences have been left unrecorded, because they were not essential to the main interest of the story. It is nothing that they added to my anxieties and embittered my disappointment when the march of events made me inexorably passed them by.

For the same reason, I have said nothing more of the consolation that I found in Pesca's brotherly affection for me when I saw him again after the mysterious cessation of my residence at Limmeridge House. I have not recorded the fidelity with which my warm-hearted little friend followed me to the door of the establishment where I sailed for Central America, or the noisy transport of joy with which he received me when we next met in the Strand. If I had felt justified in accepting the offers of service which he made to me on my return, he would have appeared again long ere this. But I had felt I knew that my honor and his courage were to be implicitly relied on, I was not so sure that his discretion was to be trusted; and, for that reason only, I followed the course of all my inquiries alone. It will now be necessary to understand that Pesca was not separated from all connection with me and my interests, although he has hitherto been separated from all communication with the progress of this narrative. He was as true and as ready a friend of mine still as ever he had been in his life.

Before I summoned Pesca to my assistance, I was necessarily anxious for myself what sort of man I had to deal with. Up to this time I had never once set eyes on Count Fosco.

Three days after my return with Laura and Marian to London, I set forth alone for Forest Road, St. John's Wood, between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning. It was a fine day—I had some hours to spare—and I thought it likely, if I waited about the house, that the Count might be tempted out. I had no great reason to fear the chances of his recognizing me in the neighborhood of his residence when I had been seen by him was the occasion on which he had followed me home at night.

No one appeared at the windows in the front of the house. I walked down a turning which ran past the side of it, and looked over the low garden wall. One of the back windows on the lower floor was thrown up, and a net was stretched across it horizontally. I saw nothing but I heard in the room, first, a shrill whistling and singing of birds—then the deep ringing voice which Marian's description had made familiar to me. "Come out on my little finger, my pret-pret-prettiest" cried the voice. "Come out, and look up at the stars! One, two, three—and up! Three, two, one—and down! One, two, three—twit-twit-twit-tweet!" The Count was exercising his canaries, as he used to exercise them in Marian's time at Blackwater Park.

I waited a little while, and the singing and the whistling ceased. "Come, kiss me, my pretties!" said the deep voice. There was a responsive twittering and chirping—a low, oily laugh—silence of a minute or two—and then I heard the opening of the house door. I turned and retraced my steps.

The magnificent melody of the Prayer in Rossini's "Moses," sung in a sonorous bass voice, rose grandly through the sunburnt air. Silence of the 4th. The garden gate opened and closed. The Count had come out.

He crossed the road, and walked toward the western boundary of the Regent's Park. I kept on my own side of the way, a little behind him, and walked in the shadiest place.

Marian had prepared me for his high stature, his monstrous corpulence, and his ostentatious consuming gentlemanliness—but not for the youthful freshness and cheerfulness and vitality of the man. He carried his sixty years as if they had been fewer than forty. He sauntered along wearing his hat a little on one side, with a light jaunty manner in using his big stick in humming to himself; looking up from time to time at the houses and gardens on either side of him with simple, childish gaiety. If a stranger had been told that the whole neighborhood belonged to him, that stranger would not have been surprised to hear it. The world looked back: he paid no apparent attention to me, no apparent attention to any one who passed him or his on the road. Once or twice, every now and then, when he smiled and smirked, with an easy, patronizing look-down, at the nurse-maids and the children whom he met. In this way he led me on till we reached a colony of shops outside the eastern terraces of the Park.

Here he stopped at a pastry-cook's, went in (probably to give an order), and came out again immediately with a tart in his hand. As I began was grinding an organ before the shop, and a miserable little shriveled monkey was sitting on the instrument. The Count stopped at the piece for himself out of the tart, and gravely handed the rest to the monkey. "My poor little man!" he said, with grotesque tenderness, "you look hungry. In the sacred name of humanity, I offer you a penny!" He put the penny, or pitiously put in his claim to a penny from the benevolent stranger. The Count shrugged his shoulders contemptuously, and walked on.

We reached the streets and the better class of shops between the New Road and Oxford Street. The Count stopped again, and entered a small optician's shop, with an inscription in the window announcing that repairs were neatly executed there. He came out directly, with an opera-glass in his hand; walked a few paces on, and stopped to look at a list of the Opera Season's performances at a music's shop. He read the bill attentively, considered a moment, and then hailed an empty cab as it passed him.

"Opera-box office," he said to the man, and was driven away.

I crossed the road, and looked at the bill in my turn. The performance announced was "Lucrezia Borgia," and it was to take place that evening. The opera-glass in the Count's hand, his careful reading of the bill, and his direction to the cabman, all suggested that he proposed attending one of the theatres. I had the means of getting an admission for myself and a friend to the pit, by applying to one of the scene painters attached to the theatre, with whom I had been well acquainted in past times. There was a chance, at least, that the Count might be easily visible among the audiences to me, and to my one with me; and, in this case, I had the means already of ascertaining whether Pesca knew his countryman or not that very night.

This consideration at once decided the disposal of my evening. I procured the tickets, leaving a note at the Professor's lodgings on the way. At a quarter to eight I called to take him with me to the theatre. Very little friend was in a state of the highest excitement, with a festive flower in his button-hole, and the largest opera-glass I ever saw hugged up under his arm.

"Are you ready?" I asked.

"Right-all-right," said Pesca.

We started for the theatre.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM VIVA.

DEPARTS of news from Utah to the 6th inst. are given by correspondents. The United States troops are in camp, Governor Cumming is still in the same place—Governor Cumming, Brigham Young, and Colonel Johnston remaining in statu quo. Nothing new has taken place in the proceedings. The prospect for the grand coup d'état, through the key crop is believed to be highly flattering. Most of last year, the crop was cut off by the grasshoppers. The work on the Temple, which was partly destroyed by fire, and of the expected edition to the Book of Mormon, and the army, has been recommenced—a fact which would seem to indicate that the Mormons have not yet decided to leave their "improvements" in Utah for a new home, either in Oregonia or the Land Islands.

THE SUN SPOTTED AGAIN.

MR. G. P. BOND writes as follows to the Boston Advertiser, under date of Harvard College Observatory, July 31: "The evidence collected from a longer number of observations does not materially change the path of the great sunspot, as communicated by me to the Advertiser of the 26th. It indicates, however, that, instead of following a spot of great size, and, therefore, like most bodies of its class, before reaching it, it may have passed beyond it into the outer atmosphere, and retains its original character as a wanderer in the planetary spaces. The observations by the sun-keeper agree tolerably well in describing its disappearance as a gradual fading away, at a considerable altitude above the horizon, sufficient to carry its path, when prolonged, quite clear of contact with the earth. If the velocity, relative to the earth's surface, of 7 miles a second be admitted, it is but a little the greater part of the apparent motion of the meteor was due to our motion in the solar system, and that the motion per axis of the orbit of this latter asteroid, and the period of describing its complete circuit about the sun, must have been less than those of the earth. A telescope view of the meteor was enjoyed by Mr. C. A. Daniels, of Boston, who had the singular good fortune to catch sight of it in full course, with a telescope of five inches aperture.

PERSONAL.

Among the recent arrivals from Havana is that of Señor Don Antonio Escovedo, the Civil Governor of the city, and formerly Civil Governor of the Province of Santiago de Cuba. Señor Escovedo is described as one of the only instance for many years where a civilian had been selected for the two offices, and the nomination of the Captain-General, and confirmation by the Home Government, is a matter of much satisfaction to the whole of the official fibre by civilians. Señor Montilla ceases to the United States for the benefit of his health, and has to make himself familiar with our principal institutions He is accompanied by the brigadier-General of the Spanish Navy and the Major-General of the Army.

A note to the Paris Moniteur universel informs the world of the whereabouts and present occupation of Miss Fredrika Bremer, who, it is remembered in May, 1850, where a survey of the most interesting parts of Palestine, having lived in security and seen much good done by her distinguished travelers. She undertook the most adventurous excursions into the interior, with a view to visit Petra as her guide and servant, not fearing the wild Bedouins of the desert. She has since examined the Holy Land from Mount Libanus to the Dead Sea; visited the monasteries; passed the Easter at Constantinople; and made the great places in the East; and then reached Athens in rest and safety. She has since arranged and revised her notes on Switzerland. Her travels in the East and Greece will appear in three vols. She will shortly leave Denmark among the Greek Islands, and return to rest for some years in Sweden. She journies by the way the world a treatise on Prayer, which is already composed.

LORD BROUGHAM'S APOLOGY.

At the adjourned meeting of the International Congress on the 30th ult., Lord Brougham apologized for Mr. Dallas for the insult offered on the previous day in the following language:

"I exceedingly regret that the observations I made on the first day have been misconstrued into something disrespectful to the United States. No one who has known me will entertain the slightest intention. I respect the members of the United States, even when I differ from them. When I addressed the Congress in the presence of your Minister, Mr. Dallas, to the, in my opinion, important statistical fact that the comparatively respectable colonial population of Canada, was a member of the Congress, I only called his attention to it, and I regretted the utterance of an excellent friend the representative of the Brazils, who is here to-day, and who God knows, I do not consider the slightest disrespect for the Brazils. I ought also to have called the attention of Mr. Dallas to the fact that the Spanish representative to the same subject; they have colonies, and the enumeration of various colonies is quite reasonable. I call his attention to it hereby." (Applause.)

THE NEGRO QUESTION IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

In the House of Lords, Lord Brougham, having concluded the notice lord who had just sat down (Earl Grey), within their bad habit, and to indulge at times even at that time, the question being one of contract between the parties, it appeared that the Government in addition to Lord Brougham said an action arising out of a case of the same sort was pending three years ago, and although words certainly have been awarded against the defendant as a common carrier the matter had not been compromised.

FRANCE.

IMPERIAL SCANDAL.

The Herald correspondent writes: "A good deal of Imperial scandal is afloat in the capital. It is said that the Emperor made it a point that he should be present at the marriage of his uncle Jerome's grandson, and that Prince Napoleon's reply was they had already been removed for such a purpose to the Pantheon. It is likewise said that among them are letters from Louis, ex-King of Holland, to Hortense, stating that the marriage of the latter and himself was never consummated, and that consequently every child born of hers was illegitimate. Of course, that he was from the first conversant with the intrigue that was going on between Napoleon and his wife, and that as for Louis Napoleon, he was as much the son of the ex-King of Holland as Count Morny was that of Count Flahaut. If all this be true, it is possible that Prince Napoleon may seek to build upon these letters a divorce over the head of the Emperor: not that I should think the man who has his own rights and wrongs in so strong head has risen to his present lofty height would take me jot of his position from any beginner of that kind."

A BRITISH PARALLEL.

He adds: "But queer things happen in all families, even when they are not royal. Recollect our George Third's. There was—in fact, I believe he is still living —a man called Dr. Wagstaffe, Minister Tommy Erskine whispered that he was the son of one of George the Third's predecessors on the Imperial Guard. One summer, the General believed himself to be in earnest, and calling to his side his supposed son, he assured him, after his death, to inspect a certain cabinet, of which he gave him the key, as the world did not at all know the fate of great importance to him. The General got well, but Tommy Erskine's curiosity was so excited that he managed to get hold of the papers, notwithstanding. They were in the handwriting of George the Third, and the General fault for saving the honor of his family, and of the Duke of York, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cumberland, and the Princess Sophia, respecting his birth. Now, I think it would be better to let the matter rest as it is now—in very familiar language—that Sophy was with child by Jemmy, and that there was the end of the matter; and there were letters from the Princess Sophia and the Duke of Cumberland admitting and confessing the impeachment. Garth, who was involved with little delicacy, took post and bolstered to Frogmore, where the Princess Sophia was, telling the lady in waiting that he wanted to see his 'mother.' Of course he was denied this filial request. But the following day Sir Herbert Taylor paid him a visit, and having heard his diplomacy, and, in short, seven his documents, demanded the price of the whole. Garth demanded a year and a pension was the reply. He refused a day or two after, and offered £5000 a year and a place. Much the papers, the things were ready for signature, when, at the eleventh hour, it was discovered that Garth had had an attested copy of the documents taken, which, of course, entirely neutralized the value of the originals. The negotiation, therefore, fell to the ground. Garth, however, up to this day is suspected, I am told, by the Court. He is always in prison; but when things come to the worst, and he is about to take the benefit of the insolvent Act, an angel comes to him unaware, pays his liabilities, and avoids all exposure.

"Some years ago he ran away with the beautiful wife of Sir Jacob Astley, and daughter of Sir Henry Dashwood. She was a handsome looking woman. She was sent over to obtain pensity and imprisonment with little fat Sir Jacob. She died about a year after having borne him a daughter."

STATE OF AFFAIRS AT NAPLES.

Telegraphic dispatches state that the Neapolitan Government has not yet succeeded in collecting the troops in a body to the King and insisted upon resigning unless this is accomplished. The capital is in a state of martial. The King at once went to all the barracks, and addressed the troops, and all the officers and soldiers take an oath to be faithful to the Constitution. The Swiss regiments, the Gendarmerie, the municipality and the members of the Corps Diplomatique called upon the King and congratulated him.

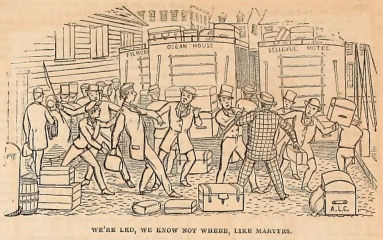
STRAY LEAVES FROM THE SKETCH-BOOK OF A LADY AT NEWPORT.

A SEASON AT NEWPORT.



CANTO THE FIRST.

Being, as to proper in descriptive poetry, slightly topographical in its commencement.

THE "RUINED STONE MILL."

HERE the rude surges bash the rough rocks on the shore,
And the surf on the beach rumbles in with a roar,
But too tender to crush
The soft sand in its rush,
Ripples back again, quietly whispering "Hush!"
Where the Gulf stream attempers the sea-breeze's chill:
Where there's scarcely a tree, and there isn't a hill;
And the only attraction's a ruined stone mill,
Whose origin's wrapped in obscurity still (Though scholars, to suit their particular likings, Attribute it either to Settlers or Vikings),
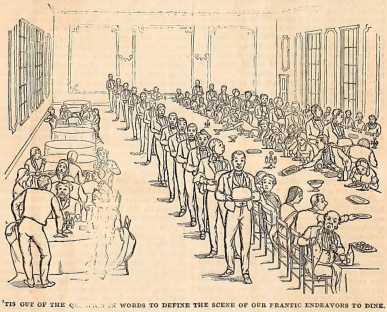
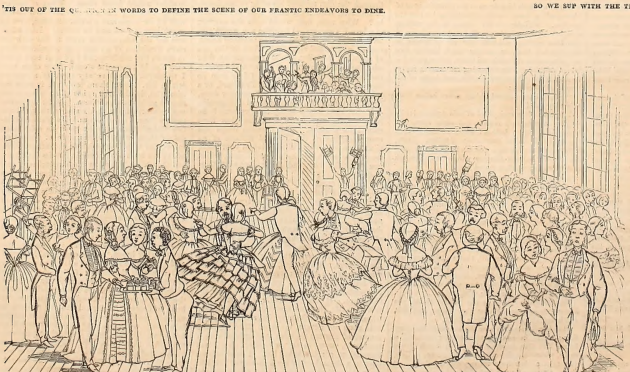
Stands Newport, the watering-place mad in vogue—a
Finale to Sharon, Nahant, Saratoga:
Society's types may be found there in plenty:
Maidens of forty and matrons of twenty;
Wall Streeters, worn out with stock operations;
Traveling lions from all foreign nations;
"Attachés" and "chefs" of all sorts of legations:
Heiresses, happy in vast "expectations,"
Young men, whose dancing
Is really entrancing
(As is natural, when we reflect that more pains
Have been spent on their feet, by a deal, than their brains);
Amateurs of both sexes, who make ineffectual
Efforts to be—or to seem—intellectual;



WE'RE LED, WE KNOW NOT WHERE, LIKE MARTYRS.

LEAPING MASCULINITY SURPASSES THE AGILE FLEETNESS OF THE STARTLED DEER.



THERE LINGER, 'MID THE BREAKERS' ROAR, OF FASCINATING NAIADS SOME HALF SCORE.

'TIS OUT OF THE [illegible] WORDS TO DEFINE THE SCENE OF OUR FRANTIC ENDEAVORS TO DINE.

SO WE SUP WITH THE TIGER.

WE'RE-SPUN BOUND IN THE WALTZ 'TILL WE'RE ALMOST DEAD.

Fast fortune-hunters, manœuvring mothers,
Horse jockeys, gamblers, musicians — and others.

Imagine, reader, if you please,
That, in the early morning's breeze,
We've just arrived, ill at ease,
After a night on board that horrid
Unsound Sound steamer: sitting "form'd"
(After we had resolved the question
Whether night air or bags we'd best shun),
With smoking we've impaired digestion.

The wharf's a scene of life and motion:
"Believe it!" "Atlantic!" "Fillmore!"
"Ocean!"
Assail our ears from every side,
Till, quite unable to decide
Where we shall take up summer quarters,
We're led, we know not where, like martyrs.

The landlord meets us at the door,
Dress-coated "assure," buttoned "or;"
And while his sons our luggage fall on, he Shows us our bedrooms in the "Colony."

CANTO THE SECOND.

Giving a faint and inadequate idea of the delights of a day at Newport; also showing how we spend the nights.

Bright mid-day steals upon our morning dreams
Ere we awake to life. Then, with a deal
Of grumbling at the sun's intrusive beams,
We dress for breakfast—fashiony meal!
And then, our drooping spirits just to rally,
Take a matutinal (light) "cocktail."

A quiet weed upon the front piazza
Kills half an hour; at one, Friend Stephen has a
Stage to convey us to the bathing beach,
With easy motion, for a shilling each.
The white flag's falling as we reach the shore,
Yet still there linger, 'mid the breakers' roar,
Of fascinating naiads some half score,

Who look, dreaded of their usual crinoline,
"Lengths without breadth," as Euclid doth define a line.

E'en when our blood-red flag begins to rise,
The one inevitable female, faced toward Spain,
From its appeal averts her heedless eyes,
And holds despotic mastery of the main
(As to nude manhood not at all particular),
Till it's a wonder that the brine don't pickle her.
At length she, too, departs—the coast is clear,
And leaping masculinity surpasses
The agile footsteps of the startled deer:
To gain the "Cafe des Etrangers Reunis"
(The genuine, I know, may cause dismay,
But then a shyster we wanting, and, to fill it, I
Quoted verbatim; therefore I transfer
To Father Homer all responsibility).

* * * * *

'Tis out of the question in words to define
The scene of our frantic endeavors to dine,
Where the stomach receives but small aid in its need,
And eat—drink for food, though the waiters are feed;
But although with my pen I'm unable to slander it,
Perhaps with the aid of my pencil I may do it.
The loud rattle up in the echoing halls,
But its music on ears unbending fails,
For the ladies are bottling on bonnets and shawls
To prepare for the afternoon's drive

At the

It's a horrible custom, but follow we must,
And swallow our gentlemanly dust,
Bow and forth, in funereal state—
A vehicular train-still—from five to eight.
So we follow each other to the train, or we heave anew
All the coltishness and risks of the "Avenue"
Dangerous enough, but now ten times more so
Since it's been watered and made as "a Corse"), Such the situation of herds that henceforer only can stamp 'em

"Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum";

* * * * *

The grease has been scraped from the dining-room floor,
And the tide of fashion begins to pour
Through the doorway of hall to the dining-room door:
There are dresses of velvet and silk and "illusion,"
"Ruches" and ribbons in lavish profusion,
Some gold and scarlet on much "tulle" and "tarlatan"
Trimmings of whose names I don't know a quarter,
But which, with the names of the wearers, you'll find
(If you feel so inclined)
Furnished in full in the Herald reporter.
So, merely premising that all "took their omelets,"
The author, once more, I shall merge in the artist.
We've upon terms to be waits' kin (I'm not sure that In a German Coalition which TORSAWYER led (With three brass-nor' fifers and "all out of his head").
'Tis past two o'clock, but it's never too late
To find easy ingress through "the little green gate":
So we rap with the "Tiger"—perhaps after that Get a delicate "scratch" from the animal "patty"
And go home—I'll explain somewhere about four,
To get through the next day—and the next—as before.

OUR NEWPORT CORRESPONDENCE.

NEWPORT, July 19, 1860.

"COME into the garden, Maude," I whisper, cunningly, at the window—one of those many long windows that open out upon the piazza at the——. I dare not tell you what house. "Come into the garden, Maude, for the black-hat night hath flown." And Maude, with her steps over the sill, and, linking my hand into the mediæval-cloth of her sleeve—for Maude is taller than I by a tantalizing inch or two—we go walking up and down the piazza, in the cool of the day. We are a few people, for it is nearer 8 o'clock later than usual, so we have plenty of room for our crinoline to float in; plenty of room, and safe ear-distance, to tell our secrets to each other. This is why I dare not give you the name of our hotel—lest you discover us, or some other enchanter may pitch his ears, and, peering his finger at the revelator, say, "Oh, I know your Maude and Madge: I've seen their girl faces under those little dark jockey-hats, and heard them chattering like magpies as they paced the piazza, arm-in-arm; yet I never thought they discussed any thing literary. I have caught now and then a sentimental quotation, something about a "black hat" and a "white hat;" but I put it down, as the effervescing of summer romance out of their girls' hearts, and thought no more of it. But now I understand."

"Bronze brown hair,"

That's the way men tell secrets, you know. Don't paint your finger at me, dear Mr. Editor, and remember that people sometimes think themselves of much more consequence than they are. I know what I am about. That's my way to get grandmother puts me down into the valley of humiliation once in a while. But you and I know what a wonderful globe is—what figures we make, how you and I even, who live in a cloud house —" of the morning's gray, Fused with silver edges"—

—you and I, who never gossip and tell naughty stories about our neighbors, catch these little fleating, feathery ne dits, which come under the heading of Scandal, and amuse ourselves therewith over our rolls and coffee. Just the merest feathers, to—the chicest of two girls, perhaps, on the —— piazza, when we remember to have seen them before they put themselves in print. Am I sufficiently mother Goose?

While the girls chat a passer remarks,

"There is nothing new under the sun."

I catch the phrase, and look at the speaker's face —a weary face and a weary tone, young and blasé. I think of Browning's "Saul:"

"How good is man's life the mere living! how fit to employ
All the heart and the soul and the senses forever in joy."

Nothing new under the sun! Why, man, there is Bartlett's new house on the South Tuscu Road, and the fresh fresco on the dead wall behind your bray!

"Bah! how absurd! Is that fectious?"

Not exactly. I was thinking of the old Newport when Rochambeau made it his head-quarters, and when the French fleet came over—thinking that a difference time makes, and how the pretty Polly Lawton would have opened her lovely eyes at Bardda's house and the fresh fresco—the pretty Polly, whose name is gallantly scratched with one of these old window-panes by one of these very French officers, perhaps—the Duc de Lauzun or the young Chevalier Dumas.

"Nothing new under the sun!" Go back into the past, then, and compare your present time with me, and let us sit upon the great rocks there —the "hanging rocks," where, years and years ago, a pirate crew was hanged. Sitting there, in sight of the restless, ever-changing sea, in that "everlasting wash of air," can you not imagine yourself back into the days of Rochambeau, Lauzun, and Chastellux, and Rochambeau?

En passant, there is a pretty story or two about this same Polly, with whom Lauzun and the rest of these officers were so enchanted—this beautiful Quaker belle, which tradition has preserved, and which I must tell you here lest I forget it. Like most belles, it seems that the lovely Lawton was by no means inclined to receive her admirers in a decided answer; so there they would hang upon her silken line, and flounder in her dazzling net, till they either broke or her cruel eye was exhausted, which latter alternative was much more likely, for few understood the power of a smile more than the Lady Lawton. Indeed, it was a many days' work to fish to the cruel hook. In other and less figurative words, a young man fell in love with the arch lady's beauty, who was quite a heartbreaker, as I for a reasonable time he allowed himself to hang in the nilder of sweet encouragement, and then, by one of those strategems, succeeded in obtaining what no other suitor had—a decided answer. He invited her to ride with him, and as he led her by distance from the town, laid his heart and worldly possessions at her feet. Aware of her arch foible, he was not surprised at the half-contemptuous manner with which she swirled and turned aside from the question. But, as I have said, he was a determined wooer; and after pressing the matter, receiving no answer, he presented her this alternative—in playful, yet positive terms—that unless she gave him a decided answer—that is, let it "yes" or "no"—either she must drive back to town sole occupant of the chaise, or walk the whole distance of the way home, for together they could not return while uncertainty lay between them. To this most novel of ultimatums Polly answered not, and Lawton in vain pouted and protested; she could delay no longer in decision, for in the firm, though smiling face beside her she saw that he was serious as her own. In vain did she appeal to his gallantry, and reproach him in sarcastic tones for forcing a person in terms of any kind. Her remarks availed all he waited. She yielded at length, and gave him, not the "yes" which he craved a much, but, as I am told, "No." He received it, however, as bravely as the rest, and forthwith drove back with her, serenely conversant and agreeable, as if nothing had occurred.

Maude lifts her pretty head at this disdainfully, and says,

"I would have walked back under such circumstances!"

And I think she would, upon my word. So my gallant Hilary of the Onetegonth, and my rash young L. L. of the Hon. Dartmouth Downe's legating, take warning, and don't try to storm the princess in a corner, for she will end by putting you in one.

This is story No. 1; now comes story No. 2 of and concerning the said Polly.

One day, after his inquiry, it was just such a day as this: bright, balmy, and serene—a July day, with a soft wind sweeping over the sea. One day, then, one day like to this, she was sitting upon the grass-nailed, hair-covered sofa, in the prim parlor, entertaining one of these numerous suitors. As natural with the fair ones when they are engaged in such delightful enemy, as this suitor dings his heart at her feet. Will she take it? She will play with it, I ought to suppose, as the cat with a mouse; and if this kind perhaps she tells him, for he retires, in considerable heat, an answer which history does not give—answer, or no answer, it is supposed—which called forth the following remarkable reply, in slow tones and haughty disdain, and looks of sufferance indifference:

"Sir, I have refused thirty offers before from as very rich!"

The matchless song finale of this answer is deserving a perpetual record, and casts about the beautiful Polly a halo of light that will not be handed down amidst generations of belles. There, I have told my stories; and see! the tide is coming in—my sultana queen of the L. waves—and through rambling round here.

Mount the box, thou giaur-faced Jehu, and let us away to town! So—all well with others up South Toure Road—past Bardu's house. Slow-ly! Let us look at the fresco of Lawton's French-reeled and many-windowed. What splendid gate-ways, crowned and pillowed with NOVA SCOTIA sandstone! The contrast is good. Both grounds are beautiful—the porter's lodge at the gate, and the whole house, is rich and elegant; but I fancy more, after all, that stately structure of unhewn stone, gleaming in pale grandeur through a line of shrubbery, where it stands looking up and down in a wilderness of lawn—Residence of William Wetmore, Esq.

But Bardda's house is the newest thing, you know. It cost, or will cost, they tell us, $200,000, and is certainly worth talking about.

One hardly realizes how the sea encircles every thing, until, in passing through, for instance, a house like this, fronting the broad South Toure drive, whereon, multitudes of carriages are rolling, you take a view from its opposite windows, and there, almost at your feet, flows the eternal sea, as those eleven vicinity are to you when you entered the gate-way and came up the fine blue gravel-paths.

THE ROMANCE OF A LIFE.

By CHARLES LEVER,

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

It has been said that any man, no matter how small and insignificant the post he may have filled in life, who will faithfully record the events in which he has been an actor, even though incapable of himself deriving profit from the lessons he has learned, may still be of use to others —sometimes as a guide, sometimes a warning. I hope this is true. I like to think it so, for I like to think that even I—A. S. P.—if I can not point a tale, may at least point a moral.

Certain families are remarkable for the way in which peculiar gifts have been transmitted for ages. Some have been great in arms, some in letters, some in statecraft, displaying in successive generations the same high qualities which have won their first renown. In an individual instance, I may lay claim to belong to this category. My ancestors have been prodigious readers for a period of one hundred and forty odd years back. Joseph Potts, "drug and condiment man," lived, in the reign of Queen Anne, at LOWE LIFFEY Street, No. 87; and to be remembered passingly, has the name of Mr. Addison among his friends; that gentleman having, as it would now appear, a peculiar fondness for "Potts's Linctures," whatever that may have been, for the secret died out with the accomplished Joseph. There was Michael Joseph Potts, "licensed for chemicals," in Mary's Abbey, about thirty years after, who was come on to Fred Potts, his son, and then, Launcelot Peter Potts, "Pharmaceutical Chemist to the Excellency and the Irish Court," the father of him who now bespeaks your indulgence.

My father's first misfortune in life was the ambition to rise above the class his family had adorned for ages. He had, as he averred, a mind above trade, a destiny higher than a black rap. He had heard of a tailor's apprentice becoming a great general. He had himself seen a wig-maker come to the woolsack; and he kept continually repeating, "Mine is the only walk in life that leads to no high rewards. What matters it how many virtues be adorned with the refined organizations of rank, or the 'dura illa rascrum'—the still live and die unknown? Genius every class and condition are men selected for honors save mine, and though it should rain decorations, the falling world would never fall to the lot of a compounding chemist."

"What do you intend to make of Algernon Aldyne, Mr. Potts?" would say one of his neighbors, allading to me.

"Heaven knows!" would be the sorrowful reply.

"Bring him up to your own business probably? A first-rate connection to start with in life."

"My own business, Sir? I'd rather see him a chimney-sweep."

"But, after all, Mr. Potts, being, so to say, at the head of your profession—"

"It is not a profession, Sir. It is not even a trade. High science and skill have long since left our insulted and outraged ranks; we are mere compounders for the sale of patent quackeries—the Widow Somebody's pills, and such another one's embrocation. The very bottles I give over the counter are sealed and labeled none genuine except signed by me, Peter Holloway. What respect has the world any longer for the old symbols of ruby, and blue, and marine blue, which, at nightfall, once were the magical emblems of mysterious practices, and through the dim mists of lowering atmospheres, or throwing their lurid glare upon the passers-by? What can be the attraction to the crowd to adorn his surgery—I suppose you would prefer I should call it 'shop'—with skeleton fishes, snakes, or a human skeleton? Why, in this age of chemical infidelity, would surmount his door with the ancient symbols of our art—the golden mortar and pestle? No, Sir, I'd as soon go forth to apply leeches in a herald's tabard, or a suit of Milan mail. And what have they done, pray? To what end has a roused imagination—" what have they done by their reforms? In invading the mystery of medicine they have destroyed its prestige. The precious drops you once regarded as the distilled essence of an elixir vita, are now efficacy lay in quantity. We are now so much strychnine, or creosote, which you take with fear, and think over with foreboding."

I suppose it can only be ascribed to that perversity which seems a great element in human nature, that every one of the direct counsels of my father's dislike to his profession was my fondness for it. I used to take every opportunity of reading into the chemistry, watching and noting all the curious proceedings that went on there, learning the names and properties of the various ingredients, the gases, the minerals, the metals, the essences, and although, as may be imagined, science was then in its infancy, many, many of her loftiest flights, they were to me the most marvelous and high-soaring efforts of human intelligence. In fact, what I was getting was that period of life, the first opening of adolescence, when fiction and adventure have the strongest hold upon our nature, my mind filled with the marvels of Eastern romance, and imbued with a sentiment, strong as any conviction, that I was from such a peril, how profit by such a stroke of fortune, by what arts resist the machinations of this adversary, how conciliate the kind favor of that. In the wonderful tales that I read frequent mention was made of alchemy and its marvels—now, the search was for some secret of endless wealth; now, it was for undying youth or undecaying beauty; while in other stories, I read of men who, by years of patient research, had learned how to read the thoughts, trace the motives, and ultimately sway the hearts of their fellow-men. Still this became to them a study fed for the exercise of their every will and caprice, throwing happiness and misery about them as the humor inclined. The secrets of all the laboratory fitted itself exactly to this phase of my mind.

The wonders it displayed, the endless combinations and transformations it effected, were just as marvelous as any that imaginative fiction could picture; and even those were actually surpassed to the strange mysterious influence of the human itself upon this system, particularly when I found myself there alone. At the times my head was filled up, many of them the wild stories of Grimm, Hoffmann, and Tieck—and what was more common than to hear how some eager student of the black art, deep in the mystery of forbidden knowledge, had, by some distant combination, by some mere accidental admixture of this ingredient with that, suddenly arrived at the great secret—the terrible mystery which for centuries and centuries had evaded human search. Here I love to have I watched the fluid as it boiled and bubbled in the retort, till I thought the air globules, as they came to the surface, observed a certain rhythm and cadence. Were these words? Were they symbols of some hidden virtue in the liquid? Were there intelligences to whom these would give the key, and reveal a wondrous history? And then, again, with what an intense eagerness have I gazed on the lurid smoke that came from some fiery crucible, now fancying that the vapor was about to assume form and substance, and now, imagining that I discerned lastly, the living and breathing cabalistic word of mine to give it life and being? How heavily did the hours pass when I had not ranked alchemy among the absurdities of human invention? Why rather had not its facts been presented me as the mysterious agents by which in some future age a great intelligence arising might classify and arrange them, showing, at last, what were the laws which now appear only evasive. Alchemists were certainly men of pure lives, self-denying, and humble. They made their art so completely their worldly advancement or success — they sought no favor from princes, nor any popularity from the people; and, retired from every path to the high honors of the world, followed their one pursuit, unnoticed and unchecked. How cruel, therefore, to drag them forth from their lonely cells, and expose them to the gaping crowd as devil worshipers! How inhuman to denounce men whose only crimes were lives of solitude and study! The last words of Peter von Vordt, burned for a wizard, at Hanlem, in 1306, were, "Had they left this poor head a little longer on my shoulders, it would have done more for human happiness than all this bonfire!"

How rash and presumptuous is it, besides, to set down any fixed limits to man's knowledge! It is not every age as more favored than its predecessors, and are not the commonest acts of our present civilization perfect mysteries compared with the usages of our ancestors? But why do I linger on this theme, which I only introduced to illustrate the bent of my boyish mind? As I grew older, books of chivalry and romance took possession of my mind, and my passion grew for lives of adventure, in which the days of existence none seemed to me so enviable as that of those men, who, regarding life as a vast arena, boldly entered a set forth, not observing nor caring whither, but trusting to their own manly spirit for extrication out of difficulties and battles which beset them. What a narrow thing, after all, was our modern civilization, with its little routines and conventionalisms, with its gradations of rank and its orders! How hopeless for the adventurous spirit to war with the mere inertia of an age which had settled men in ranks like soldiers, and told that each could only rise by successive steps! How often have I wondered that there was more of adventure left in life. Were there incidents in store for him who, in the true spirit of an adventurer, pushed on in search of them. As for the newer worlds of Australia and America, they did not possess for me the charm of Asia. No geographic tion linked them with the past; no echo came out of them of that heroic time of feudalism, as peopled with its stirring chivalrous deeds. The life of the bush or the prairie had its incidents, but they were vulgar and commonplace; and scenes, the associations of which were not of them were more vulgar still. Hunting down Pawnees or buffaloes was as mean and ignoble a travesty of feudal chivalry as the gold digging at Bendigo of the learned labors of the alchemist. The perils were unexciting, the surroundings repulsive and commonplace. No; I felt that Europe, in some remote regions—and the East, in certain ages visited them—must be the scenes best suited to my hopes. With considerable labor I could spell my way through a German romance, and I can, in the stories of Froupe, and even of Goethe, that there still survived in the mind of Germany many of the features which gave the colorings to feudal poetry. The Rhine, at least, a dreamy indifference to the present, a careless abandonment to what the hour might bring forth, so long as the dreamer was left to follow out his fancies in all their mysticism, that lifted men out of the vulgarities of this work-o'-day world; and I longed to see a society where learning consented to live upon the humblest pittance, and beauty dwelt unflattered in obscurity.

I was now entering upon manhood, and my father—having with that ambition so natural to an Irish parent who aspires highly for his only son, destined not for the Bar—made me a student of Trinity College, Dublin.

What a shock to all the romance of my life were the scenes into which I now was thrown! With hundreds of companions to choose from, I found not one congenial to me. The reading men, too deeply bent upon winning honors, would not waste a thought upon what could not advance their chances of success. The idle, only eager to get through their course undetected in their ignorance, passed lives of wild excess or stupid extravagance. If they had any ambition, it was perhaps for a prize-fighter, the winner in a boat-race, or a bullet-graze.

What was I to do among such associates? What I did do—avoid them, shun them, live in utter estrangement from all their haunts, their ways, and themselves. If the proud man who has achieved success in life encounters immense difficulties when, separating himself from his fellows, he acknowledges no companionship, nor admits any to his confidence, it may be imagined what must be the situation of one who adopts this isolation without any claim to superiority whatever. As can easily be supposed, I was the butt of my fellow-students, the subject of many sarcasms and practical jokes. The whole of my University career was a martyrdom. I had no peace, was played on by pedestrians, caricatured by draughtsmen, till the name of Potts became proverbial for all that was eccentric, ridiculous, and absurd.

Curnin has said "one can't draw an indifferent against a native;" in the same spirit I shall discover "one can not fight his whole division." For a while I believe I experienced a sort of heroism in my inferiority; I felt the spirit of a Coriolanus in my heart, and muttered, "I banish you!" when I thought my neighbor could not hear me, and I fell into a settled melancholy. The horrible truth was gradually forcing its way slowly, but surely, through the mists of my mind, that there might be something in all this sarcasm, and I can remember to this hour the day—yes, and the very place—when the first questions flashed across me: Is my hair as limp, my nose as long, my back as arched, my eyes as green as they are described there? Do I drawl so fearfully in my speech? Do I drag my heavy feet along on the pavement? Good Heavens! have they possibly a grain of fact to sustain all this fiction against me?

And if a comfortable thought—am I the stuff to go forth and seek adventures? Oh the infinite bitterness of this reflection! I remember it in all its vividness. I was now, after years of such experience as have befallen few men, I can recall the pain it cost me. While I was yet in the paroxysm of that sorrow, which assured me that I was not made for doughty deeds, nor to captivate some fair princess, I chanced to fall upon a little German volume entitled "Die Wanderlungen und Abenteuer, von Heinrich Stobbe. Always ambitious of adventure, and a student too! for so Herr Stobbe announces himself, in a short introduction to the reader. I am not quite sure that the account of his life, It is in Voss's Leipzig Catalogue, and not unworthy of perusal by those who are sufficiently imbued with the romance to accept the example full moods of a mystical mind, with all its visionary glimpses of light and shade, its doubts, fears, hopes, and fancies, in lieu of real incidents and actual events. Of adventures, properly speaking, he had none. The people he met, the scenes in which he bore his part, were as commonplace as need be. The whole narrative never rose above that broad-alcohol life—Butterbrod-Leben—which Germany accepts as romance; but meanwhile the reflex of whatever passed around him in the unromantic own mind was amusing; so ingeniously did he contrive to interweave the imaginary with the actual, throw over the most ordinary passages of life a sort of hazy indistinctness—meet atmosphere for mystical creation.

If I did not thoroughly sympathize with him in his brain-wrought wanderings, I never ceased to take pleasure in his description of scenery, and the beautiful effects he experienced in journeying through a world so beautiful and so varied. There was one passage I remember found favor which took my fancy much, representing him as he stood leaning on his horse's mane, gazing rapturously on the Elbe, from one of the heights off the Saxon Switzerland. How peaceful he looked, with his long hair waving gracefully on his neck, and his large, soft eyes surveying the scene beneath him, his clasped hands, as they lay on the horse's mane, imparted a sort of repose, too, that seemed to say, "I could linger here ever so long." Nor was the horse itself without a share in the picture: a tall, raw-boned, long-tailed, patient-looking beast, well befitting an enthusiast, who doubtless took but little heed of what he went or whither. His lazy eye denoted lethargy, his broad feet and short legs vouched for his sure-footedness.

Why should not Herr Stobbe's example? Surely there was nothing too exalted or extravagant in his plan of life. It was simply to see the world as it was, with the aid of such combinations as a fertile fancy could contribute; not to distort events, but to arrange them, just as the landscape painter, in the license of his art removes that massive rock more to the foreground, and throws that stone into a little further to the left of his canvas. There was, indeed, nothing to prevent my trying the experiment. Ireland was not less rich in picturesque scenery than Germany, and if she boasted no such mighty stream as the Elbe, the banks of the Blackwater and the Nore were still full of woodland beauty; and then, there was lake scenery unrivaled throughout Europe.

I turned to Stobbe's narrative for details of his outfit. His horse he bought at Nordheim for two hundred and forty guilden—about ten pounds; his saddle and knapsack cost him a little more than forty shillings: with his map, guide-book, compass, and some little extras, all were comprised within twenty pounds sterling—surely not too costly an equipage for one who was adventuring on a sea wide as the world itself.

As my trial was a mere experiment, to be essayed on the most limited scale, I resolved that my first step should be to purchase a hunter by the day, so that if any change of mind or purpose supervened I should not find myself in any embarrassment.

A fond uncle had just left me a legacy of a hundred pounds, at his own request, which, besides was the season of the long vacation; thus did every thing combine to favor the easy execution of a plan, which, if deferred, threatened to be put into practice.

"Something quiet and easy to ride, Sir, you said?" queried Mr. Dycer after me, as I crossed his great establishment for the sale and hire of horses. "Show the gentleman four hundred and twelve."

"Oh, Heaven forbid!" exclaimed I, in my ignorance; "such a number would only confuse me."

"You mistake me, Sir," blandly interposed the dealer; "I mean the horse that stands at that number. Lead him out, Tim. He's gentle as a lamb, Sir, and, if you find he suits you, can be led or ridden by a lady. Not a speck nor note," added he, hastily, and seeing that I was about to commit another misconception.

"He is a bay, I suppose?" asked I, eagerly.

"The longest tail and the fullest mane I ever saw. But here he comes." And with the word there advanced toward us, at a sort of easy amble, a short, rough, cream-colored pony, with white mane and tail. Knowing nothing of horse-flesh, I was fain to content myself with such observations as could be made upon my new wife; and so I closely examined his head, which was largely developed in the frontal region, with moral qualities fairly balanced. He had memory large, and individuality strong, nor was wit, if it exist in the race, deficient. Over the orbital region the hair was curly enough to contain my closed fist, and when I surreptitiously put them to the test, he said, "Tis his teeth will tell you the rayson of that," a remark which I suspect was a sarcasm upon my general ignorance.

I liked the creature's eye greatly. It was soft, mild, and contemplative; and although not unmistakable fire lurked in it, there was a subdued lustre that promised well for temper and disposition.

"Ten shillings a day—make it three half crowns by the week, Sir. You'll never hit upon the like of him again," said the dealer, hurriedly, as he passed me to the stable, on the circuit again if they see him. Wish you saw him with his fore-legs on a table, ringing the bell for his breakfast."

"I'll take him, Mr. Dycer, by the week, though, probably, a day or two will be all I shall need."

"Four hundred and twelve for Mr. Potts," screamed he out. "Shoes removed, and to be ready in the morning."

MY DAUGHTER MINNIE.

A FEW years ago—well, it is not less than forty—my little home-flock was led, in the matter of years, by daughter Minnie—a pretty name, I always thought. She was then a child, and being the first-born, was half maternal in her management of the later comers, even down to little Gregory, the latest and latest of all.

The picture of Minnie is just as fresh in my memory as though the forty years which have immured and overgrown her had never been. Instead. But it is a father's eye that looks over those years at Minnie, and the beauty must be half hers—a sort of mutual illusion. Those we love are transparent, you know—we who love them look through, into the love for father's spirit to the recare, and, in the strength of that unconscious, looked into her father's angry face at length with perfect composure.

I must not repeat the words that followed: they shall never be written; and would to God they had never been said!

Minnie had given him her heart, and would give him her hand. How could she help it? Even her father's anger could not prevent her fulfilling her word; for was not Jenny Brun worthy, and was not her father's anger unreasonable and unjust? All this she felt in the still deep calmness of a perfect heroine, while I stood there almost as much in love as in anger.

"Wife, it's all up with Minnie," said I, striding into the sitting-room and breaking in upon a most comfortable domestic picture only relieved by the solemn ticking of the clock and the busy click of knitting needles.

"Lord! what's the matter?" and the ball of yarn rolled across the floor, while a flower-pot on the window fell spilling and crashing on the bricks outside, "Have you found flower-pot—tell me, pink—you look as pale as a sheet."

"Minnie has promised to marry that scape-grace in spite of us: she says she will to me, in the face of my absolute commands." Thereupon I walked the floor, wife staring at me the while. "I'll never forgive her—never."

"Husband, stop and think. He—"

"I won't stop and think. I say I'll never forgive her; and I won't. Call her in."

Wife left the room in search of Minnie. She was gone a long while: from which circumstance I have always had the suspicion that she spent the time in soothings and comfortings scarcely to be or said—a sketching my view of the case. At length they returned: both tearful. We sat down together, a constrained group; Minnie very tearful, but very sweet and beautiful. The interview was short, and these were the closing words:

"Father, I have always been a dutiful child—you will do me that justice. But I love this man. You grant that his character is unimpeachable, but you forbid our marriage because you have a prejudice against him. I love and honor you, father. You can not doubt this; but in this case I must follow the dictates of my own heart."

"So so if you will; but remember, your father will never forgive you."

Thus ended the interview, wife sobbing distressfully, Minnie weeping quietly, and I sitting glum and angry.

Minnie kept her word, and became the wife of Jeremy Brun.

I did not forbid them the house, as most angry fathers are said to do, but I told Minnie that she had lost my love and care. Then I was so foolish as to see Jeremy Brun, and in a very silly speech climbed over that stile he was taking my daughter from her father without his consent, he need expect no gifts or favors now or henceforth. She would not be allowed to share in the family inheritance, nor should I render the least assistance if they "should come to want." I shall never forget the queer look the young man gave me—a glance in which pride seemed almost vainly struggling with a cluster of mirth-loving fun.

"Very well, Sir; we will try not to 'come to want.' That was all he said; but the cool self-possession of his manner made me feel more foolish than I had undertaken to drive a nail and had pounded my fingers.

He had always been demonstrative toward my children—the elder as well as the younger. Minnie had never had a right to her father's love, nor did she ever meet me in the morning or part from me at night without a kiss. This was denied her now. Even at the table she was not invited to it. Once or twice she clung tearfully to me in my sternness, and reaching up to clasp my neck with her white arms, sobbed out, "Oh, father, kiss me. No. I promised her never a kiss while I lived.

Women are strange creatures. There was wife, who had always been spiritful with me as a lapdog, absolutely giving all control and out to our rescued daughter. I verily believe that long before the wedding-day came she was as thoroughly interested in the whole affair as though Minnie had been about to make the best business man in town. Little was it for me to tighten my purse-strings, and direct that the child should have no marriage outfit of value. Pillow-cases, embroidered, and the thousand and one et ceteras in which mothers take such pride and pleasure. In spite of me, had surreptitiously, Minnie was well provided. Yes, I am sure. I remember that the shopman's bills for some ten months after seemed unusually full, both in number of items and footing up of same; and I shrewdly suspect that wife had arranged with the tradesmen to have the articles scattered along through the months. She was always a good financier.

The ceremony was performed in church. I was present, lest my absence might give too great notoriety to the family jar. Useless. The whole town knowing it must have been acquainted with the state of affairs, the bride's beauty and the bridegroom's popularity set many eyes on me with the sparkle of criticism in them.

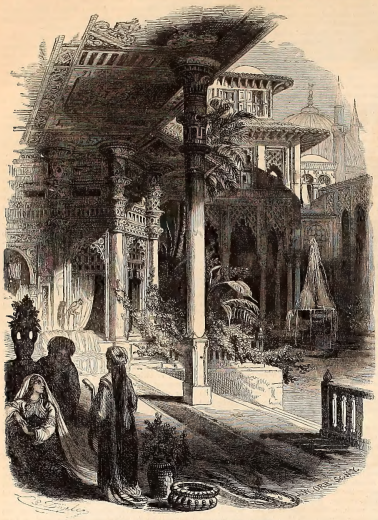
"He needn't look so savage-like," muttered a gruff old yeoman behind me; "there ain't a likelier young fellow in all the barony than young Jeremy Brun; an' though Minnie be purty as a pink, it's a good match, I say—a real even bargain—so."

Long, long months went by after the marriage—tedious, lonely months to me. I knew I was being roused by this self-imposed restraint on the affections of my nature. Minnie came to her old home sometimes. Once or twice I called Jeremy for the return of the old love, the old home-like. No. My daughter was happy in her husband, happy in her new home. But I saw very plainly that the bless of the old home was lost to her.

Nearly two years went back into the past, shadowed in their memory, when a little child-boy was laid in its cradle. A little, struggling new-life—precious, but feeble. Here was a new influence to be stamped, a boat-stem another gust and another wave. But I braced myself, and the old love began to flow. Minnie's chamber, stood over the pale child with the little one on her arm, and heard the faint voice add to housewifely counseling look, "Do kiss me, father!" I shook my head and went out.

One day a strange change came over the young mother, alarming the experienced eye, leading to the physician that ominous air of grave mystery which strikes into the soul of the loving. Low-toned colloquies and guilty distress. The symptoms became more and more alarming—she was sinking. I was called to her bedside, to the end of my first dying child. As I bent over the white face, almost translucent with weakness, illumined by eyes all unclouded by illness, my Minnie gave me the old-time glance of love, and, throwing up her hands, as if to clasp my neck, said, faintly, but oh! so earnestly,

"Kiss me, father!"



I bent down to my daughter, my first-born, and we wept long together—the strong father and the faintly breathing child.

What do you think my Minnie did? Why she got well again, and in two months was as musical as a lark, and as gay, looking after the little Minnie like a pretty mother as she was.

However, the ice was fairly broken, and I was my old fatherly self ever after. Minnie even ventured, after a time, to make merry at my expense over the fact that not only was Jenny Brun the best of husbands, but one of the well-known of American writers.

I think I was a very great fool.

DAMASCUS AND THE HOLY WAR.

COURT OF A HOUSE IN DAMASCUS.

STREET SCENE IN DAMASCUS.

We engrave herewith three pictures of the city of Damascus, and a portrait of Fuad Pacha, the new Turkish Commissioner to Syria.

Damascus is probably one of the oldest cities in the world. It is mentioned in the 14th chapter of Genesis, and figures prominently in the history of the ancient world. Not only is its vicinity so fertile that it has claimed to have been the "Garden of Paradise," but for many centuries its manufactures were the most costly known in commerce. European ladies of rank boasted of owning Damascene silks, and to this day we talk proverbially about "a Damascus blade." All this glory has long since departed. Damascus is still a city of some 80,000 inhabitants, 12,000 of whom are Christians; it still exports some wheat, tobacco, and hemp, and consumes British manufactures; but its rank among the world's cities is very secondary. Built at a time when the art of building cities was in its infancy, the city, externally, is not very inviting; the streets are narrow and dirty; the river—the ancient Pharpar—is as muddy as the Tiber; and many of the old houses appear to have been constructed more for defense than for ornament. It is only when you enter the courtyards and witness the truly Oriental magnificence of the interior decorations that you realize how rich a city this once was, how much money there is here still, and how few opportunities there are for using money in mercantile enterprise.

This is the city where the latest massacre in Syria occurred. The reader will find details in our news columns.

In our last number we stated that the Government of the Sultan had, in view of the massacres in Syria, dispatched to that region a special envoy, Fuad Pacha, at the head of ten or twelve thousand men. Physiognomists may form their own opinions from his portrait as to his probable capacity for the arduous task before him.

FUAD PACHA, THE NEW TURKISH COMMISSIONER TO SYRIA, CHARGED WITH THE DUTY OF PROTECTING THE CHRISTIANS.

Fuad Pacha is of a noble Turkish family, and received a modern education—differing in that particular from most Turks of high station. He devoted himself in early life to the public service, and rose successively from post to post, until at the time of the Crimean war he became Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the most influential member of the Turkish Cabinet. He subsequently represented Turkey at the Congress of Paris. He is well esteemed by European diplomatists, and is believed to be a man who rises superior to the prejudices of his race. We shall see what success he will have in the Lebanon.

For our own part, we freely confess that we expect no redress for the past or security for the future from any Turkish source.

CHAPTER XLI.

INSTINCT AND WONDER.

As the cavalcade trotted round the carve of the peak, and then walked the cattle down the steep zigzag road of the beautiful valley, the Commodore said, "But, Piron, tell me who that large man is with the black hair and blue eyes?"

"Why, Cleveland, all I know of him is, that he landed at Kingston in a vessel from the Isthmus of Panama, and is going to Cuba on his way to England. He came to me, bearing that I was the consignee of old Blunt's timber brig, bound to New Orleans, and so home, to know if he could be dropped at St. Jago, where he has some property or debts to collect; and since the old skipper has no objection, he has taken passage in the brig when she goes with me and my family. I have since met him—he calls himself Colonel Lawton—at dinners of our set, and he seems to be an Englishman or Scotchman. Tom Stewart thinks the latter from his accent, and for his liking for snuff; but Paddy Burns differs, and believes he don't like snuff, but only takes it to show his splendid box. Any way, he speaks all languages, Spanish, French, Italian, and English, and can talk slang in them all like a native. He has served, too, from his own account, with Bolivar there on the Spanish Main; and he was with Cochrane in that desperate affair of cutting out the Esmeralda in Callao Bay. A very amusing, entertaining vagabond he is, and I asked him to join us to make the acquaintance of my people on our last frolic to the valley; but somehow, I am rather sorry that I gave him a passage with us in the brig, for I don't altogether like his looks."

"Neither do I, Piron! his hair is too black for his light blue eyes. However, we must make the most of him."

Over the shaky bridge of the torrent, where Jacob Blunt prayed earnestly for Martha Blunt, and swore at his donkey as if he had never rocked on water before; Mr. Mouse, with a lost tiny kick on the saddle-flaps of his lofty mule, tumbled off; Colonel Lawton swinging himself from the saddle of his barb as if he had been part of him; Tom Stewart, Paddy Burns, and Don Stingo, sliding off any way; Harry Darcantel trying to descend in fine style, and failing miserably; Piron and the Commodore doing the thing leisurely; Jacob Blunt pulled off boldly; while the laughing blacks took the beasts and led them away.

There were three pairs of eyes that watched all this grace and clumsiness from the windows of the saloon. Two pair of dark ones smiled, and the pair of blue opened until they seemed like azure globes, and then they closed until the fringe of chestnut lashes nearly hid them from sight.

"Colonel Lawton, do me the favor to follow my old friend Banou—you, too, Captain Jacob and Lieutenant Darcantel and Mr. Mouse; Paddy Burns and Stingo, here, will show you your quarters in the old billiard-room. Come, Commodore, the rest of us will find quarters in the casa."

An hour later the saloon and sala were all alight, and the sashes of the jalousies closed, for it was cool at times up there at Escondido. There, too, stood the party of gentlemen, Mr. Mouse being a prominent figure in the background. Then came a rustling of robes, and as the great folding doors swung open the three ladies lit up the saloon in a halo of loveliness with brighter rays than were shed from the wax lights in the chandelier. Two fair hands were placed in those of Cleveland, and the look which accompanied went back to the happy morning on the old brig's deck, away off there to sea.

"Oh, monsieur! I can not say how glad I am to see you once more! Let me present you to my sister, Madame Nathalie Delonde, and our daughter. Ah, my dear Captain Blunt! both your children before you again, and you have come to take us away."

"Colonel Lawton, ma chère," said Piron.

"And mesdames," said the Commodore, "let me also present my nephew, Lieutenant Darcantel, and Mr. Mouse."

What caused that woman to start, as the girl took the tiny reefer by the hand, and impulsively clasp those white hands together, while her heart beat in yearning throbs, and her bosom rose and fell like billows by the shore? Why did she then raise one hand to her fair neck, and, as if in a dream, feel for the golden links of the chain, with the other hand pressed to her panting heart for the locket which once reposed there? How was it that, bewildered by a mother's instinct, she gazed at the youth before her, and then turned her eyes hopelessly around in search of her husband in the crowd?

"Yes, madame. This is my nephew, Henry Darcantel."

"Ah, Henri! Excuse me, Monsieur. I am charmed to see you!"

Why, now, did the touch of his hand make her heart beat faster, and send a thrill of joy through her frame? Only be a little calm, madame, for a while longer, and don't be sad and ponder all night, like your good Jules Piron does habitually. Wait, Jules will tell you all he knows about it—you alone to-night.

The doors of the sala were thrown open. The broad pennant leading with Madame Rosalie; the military chieftain marching beside Madame Nathalie, much to the animosity of Paddy Burns. Then Mr. Mouse conveying Mademoiselle, the infinite disgust of the commander of the Rosalie, one grim schooner, formerly the Perdita. But what could that old negro do against him, standing at the door, jerk his head back and open his great eyes till there was no black left in them? And why did he blunder about the table afterward, and pour wine over the Colonel's pinky hand, while staring like mad up at the young blue jacket opposite. That old Banon, perhaps, did not like to see his young mistress so attended to by every eligible young man who came near her. Oh, no; of course not. But then, if that brawny negro in white had only known every wine scar and mutilated hand he was pouring light wine in his abstraction, he would have crammed the heavy cut decanter in powdered glass splinters down the alcohol's throat. There would have been claret of a different color spilled then, quantities of it. You haven't feel in your pockets, Colonel, or look round the sala to see if perchance there in a green silk case peering from that pocket, you can't don't keep any of those pretty things out at Escondido. So go on with your dinner, you coldeyed scoundrel, and tell all the while you can to that lovely woman at your elbow; how you wanted to save Bolivar's life, and it was saved without you. Don't forget either to tell her how that patriot had you drummed out of his army, suspecting you of having assassinated the officer near you in the confusion of battle, and robbing him of his watch to replace the one presented to you by the Captain General. Finally Burns is watching you, Colonel Lawton, and that whole-souled little Irishman is not the man to be trifled with. Now remove your hands. But take care, Banou, you nearly twitched off the military gentleman's hair. Tom Stewart saw it, and he noticed, too, a long cut across it like the track of a musket bullet—honorable wound no doubt—under your black glossy wig.

Mr. Mouse had fallen desperately in love with the perfumed damsel beside him, and he knew she was up to her rose-tipped ears in love with him, oh! fathoms deep; but then, as Shakspeare bird girls, and he would leave her half-pay! Still he didn't like his adversary at the other end duck; and he shyly swigged some Madeira too, with a wary eye on the broad pennant through the flowers on the epergne. Finally, Mouse, in that reefer-ay, chattered—and said that the quiet young officer on her left was very well liked in the steamer, and commanded a very fine aircraft named the Rosalie. She knew that before, did she? Well, his father was a cold, stern man, but he was kind and generous to all, and had been very good to his poor mother, God bless him!

Commodore Cleveland talked in a low tone, all through the dinner, to the lady who did not eat at the head of the table, but sat contentedly rested her white hand, with a trustful reliance, on the great tanned-leather paw of Jacob Blunt, that honest mariner not wishing to talk to any body, man or woman. That ancient mariner was mentally damning donkeys; speculating how he would get back to the Sea Blunt brig, in Kingston harbor; and praying for Martha Blunt, wife, riding at single anchor near Plymouth beach. From time to time every body, said a word or two to all around the table, and talked to Tom Stewart about certain business matters connected with the steamer when he had gone.

Then came the last course, and the dessert of delicious fruits, which quite stopped Mr. Mouse's mouth, and even his palpitating heart ceased beating; when Mademoiselle Banon bowed her some lady-finger biscuit, and bent her graceful head to listen to the music of the earnest lips beside her.

We told you, Miss, how it would be; and, in spite of the warning, there you are—the color coming and going over your girlish cheeks, and never saying a word! What a couple that would make! thought Madame Nathalie. And what a resemblance in expression there is between them—he with his dark hair and eyes, and she fair and blue. Be careful, young Rosalie! And so thought her sister and her sister's husband; Signo too, old Banou, and every one save Mr. Mouse, who had eyes but not Rat, Beaver, and Martin, and he could take the wind out of their sails any day.

The party of ladies rose from the table, and leaving the men—all except the captain of the Rosalie and Mr. Mouse, who would have remained had he not seen a shake of the head pennant's finger—went into the saloon. Then there was a brilliant prelude on the piano, a touch of a guitar by stronger fingers, an air from an opera, a song or two, much conversation—while Mr. Mouse stepp'd on deck—and coffee. Then it was late, every one was fatigued, bon soirs were said, and the party—coffee and all—separated.

CHAPTER XLII.

TRUTH AND TERROR.

In a great square room, standing, as usual, on cocoa-nut stilts, which had once been used for a billiard-room, were half a dozen iron-framed cots ranged along the walls, and where some of the Escondido's guests were to sleep. Every thing, however, was tidy and comfortable; snow-white bed-clothes and coarse mosquito nets, lots of muslin and covers, and things for bathing behind a screen of dimity curtains; and not forgetting a large table—vice the billiard-table—in the centre, on which stood plenty of sugar and limes, cinnamon and nutmeg, bottles and flasks, red and white, and—very little water in the jugs.

The occupants of this bivouac had turned in, and the lights had been doused. Conversation, however, was kept up, especially by the thin little voice of Mr. Mouse, who, having enjoyed a nap in the early evening, and having been danced and tumbled about on the trip to the lodge by Harry Darcentel, who was a famous dancer, the very ice was as wide awake as a black-fish. Don Benigno dropped in a few cervical tax and assessed also Jacob Blunt, with a spluttering groan intermixed; and Paddy Burns fell off into a doze, saying he had private words addressed to the world at large, with a mutter against the military, hoping he might look at a Bolivian patriot officer with a friend and a very good one by, Mr. Joe Maunton, at his side; he would put an end to any more lies about charges of cavalry and cutting out Frigates in Callao Bay. That Paddy Burns would, though he didn't wear a wig and a large sapphire on the only finger he had on his left hand, and with a diamond snuff-box, too! Presented to you by a connection of your family, was it? Take a pinch out of it! Confound him, no! Begorra, the snuff is not Lundy Foot's, and the box is brass, Sir, brass!

"I say, Mouse, keep quiet, will you, and let me go to sleep!" Harry Darcentel did not think of going to sleep—that was a fib he told the reader—but he wanted to lie in his cot and dream of—you know who—a tall, graceful girl with blue eyes and light hair, who looked at him once or twice during the dinner, but was so sleepy for him for ever so long. What did she say? Why, she merely asked him whether he'd show those even pearly teeth! She only looked out of those soft blue eyes. That was all!

"Mr. Mouse, will you think of going to sleep?"

"The devil you do! And who to, pray?"

"Why," said Mr. Mouse, as he rolled over and kicked the shoes off his small pedal bells legs, "I haven't made up my mind; but do you know that that pretty girl up there at the big house has taken quite a fancy to me, and when you were presented to her mother she gave me such a squeeze of the hand! Oh my!"

Here Mr. Mouse's narrative was cut short by a pillow hitting him plumb on the mouth, clean through his mosquito net.

"Very charming young lady, Mr. Mouse," said a quiet voice, in a cool tone, on the other side of him; "she did seem to take a violent fancy to you."

Mr. Mouse rolled over, and then sitting up in his cot, replied, "Why, Sir, there was a fair mother sitting by you when the big nigger in white capsized the wine over your sleeve and nearly pulled your arm off."

Look out, Mr. Mouse! if that man there beside you once gives a twitch at your curls he'll find something more than curls—perhaps a bloody little scalp with it!

"Oh?" was the sound that came back.

"Yes, Sir, and the other beautiful lady next the Commodore is her sister. She had a son last Midsummer's day, and was very anxious for pirates off Jamaica ever so many years ago, and Commodore Cleveland chased them in a ship he was first lieutenant of, and Luther commanded the ship—she was the old Scourge."

"Hold your tongue!" came from the cot where the spare pillow was lying flattened.

"Ho!" said the military chieftain; but if the room had not been so dark, the way his eyes opened and endured in the dark for a moment would have made Tiny Mouse shiver with cold.

"Oh, dear, yes, Colonel Lawton," Mouse bore tell all about it the other night on board the frigate. He thought I was asleep, but I kept awake through the best part of it."

"The best part of it?"

"Why, Sir, how an old one-eyed Spaniard abducted my father and mother, and a fool's errand from St. Jago down to the Isle of Pines, and afterward how the Scourge chased the pirate schooner in a hurricane for a very long clear away to the coast of Darien, where they blew her out of water and killed every scoundrel on board!"

Not every one, Mr. Mouse. There is the very greatest of all villains escaped, including his teeth and glaring your way at your elbow.

"What was the name of that cape, Darcentel, where the schooner was blown to? I don't won't be quiet! the Colonel wants to hear all about it. There's a good fellow, tell me!"

"Garrote Point."

The listener slowly raised the mutilated hand and put the finger with the sapphire ring to his throat, evidently with the idea of cutting

BABBITT'S SOAP. Price per Box $5. Mr. B. T. BABBITT, the well-known Saleratus manufacturer, is bringing out a new article, entitled

SOAP,

Put up in boxes of 60 pounds each, in 1 pound bars, price $5 per box. This Soap is rapidly taking the place of all other Soaps wherever introduced. One pound will go as far as 3 pounds of ordinary family Soap. It will wash in either hard or salt water; it does not injure the fabric—on the contrary, it preserves it and fixes the colors. It will remove paint, grease, and stains of all kinds. But little lime is required when this Soap is used. Directions sent in each box for making ONE HUNDRED GALLONS OF SOAP, and two THREE GALLONS OF HAND-SOME SOFT SOAP. Send for a box and give it a trial. If you do not want a whole box yourself, get your neighbors to join you and divide it. Believing this to be family which has ever used this Soap will ever be without it, and being desirous to have its merit widely known, I have made arrangements with the proprietors of the following papers (many of whom have tried the Soap and know its value), to pay for up to the amount paid by me to any solvent Bank in the United States, one box of the above Soap, and a receipt for one year's subscription to either of the following York papers, viz.:

The Weekly Tribune,
The Weekly Day Book,
The Weekly Times,
The Weekly
The Century,
The Independent,
The Examiner,
Christian Advocate,
American Agriculturist,
The Chronicle,
Vanity Fair,

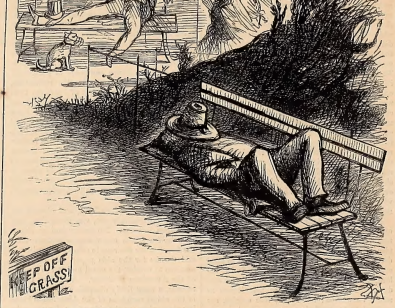
OUR CENTRAL PARK.

We publish herewith a couple of sketches of the New York Central Park, from our artist's sketch-book, representing the handsome iron bridge which spans the narrow part of the Skating Pond, and the seats which, by a pleasing fiction, are understood to be "exclusively for ladies." These sketches will be followed from time to time by others of equal fidelity and merit.

AN EXECUTION AT HAVANA.



ON a clear, sultry, starlight night in April, the secretary of the Captain-General of Cuba, returning homeward from an evening visit, was set upon by four assassins and stabbed to the heart. They had no other object than robbery, were immediately apprehended, and, six weeks afterward, condemned to die by the garrote. I determined to witness the execution.

It was appointed to take place on the Paséo, outside the walls of the city, near the Monterrati Gate, close to the spot where the murder had been committed. This Paséo (Parade) is a wide drive, planted with trees, and running from the Punta (on which stands the Tacon prison, at the mouth of the harbor, opposite to the Moro) for about half a mile, almost parallel with the town. At the place where the scaffold was erected a large, open space intervenes. I went overnight to see the preparations.

These consisted of a stout platform, pitched on the highest elevation obtainable, at about five feet from the ground, and surmounted on three sides by an iron railing, a flight of steps on the fourth side affording access to it. The platform might have been twelve feet square. Within it were four strong chairs, three painted red, and one—to which the instrument of punishment was affixed—black. That I shall describe presently.

Anticipating the presence of a large crowd, I and my two companions started at six, an hour before the appointed time, taking with us our "boy" attendant, Tomás—as great a thief as ever wore black (or white) cuticle—for the benefit of the moral example. When we reached the ground, finding the concourse not so great as we had expected, we beguiled the time with coffee and cigars, the so-called beverage consisting of a few drops in a cupful of milk—barely sufficient to discolor it—after the Cuban fashion. (This coffee is grown on the island, and is inferior to Mocha.) Then, smoking, we strolled toward the Tacon prison, expectant of the criminals. Our speech presently caused us to be accosted by an Englishwoman, who knew no Spanish, and revealed herself as a newly-arrived governess in the family of a wealthy Cuban, and something of an amateur in executions, for she told us she had witnessed two in London. So the most gallant of our party took her in charge, procuring her a seat in a volante, and an excellent view of the business in hand; thereby separating himself from us, for we saw no more of him till all was over, when we learned that his companion had gone home in the carriage, which I regretted, as I had intended offering my escort to a bull and a cock fight, being desirous of doing the honors of Havana to my inquisitive and strong-minded compatriot.

The day was very hot, even at that early hour; the crowd dense, picturesque, and offensively odoriferous. Dressed in the ordinary Cuban attire—cotton shirts, dirty-white trowsers, and sometimes straw sombreros—the swarthy, black-haired spectators, and those of still darker complexion, gradually increased until, by seven o'clock, upward of forty thousand persons must have assembled. Among them were two or three hundred horsemen—farmers or market people, who, having disposed of their oranges and bananas, awaited the execution. I observed as many as three or four on the back of one horse. In the public volantes sat a few ladies, clad in pink or white, with black veils, but no bonnets or other protection from the sun, chatting, fanning themselves, and handling opera-glasses. The trees, the city walls, the roofs of adjacent houses were thronged with beholders, mostly boys and negroes. The motley concourse and its surroundings, the city seen just before the peried of intense sullenness of a June day in Cuba, formed a sufficiently striking and memorable spectacle.

Only a quarter of a mile intervened between the prison and scaffold, to which the condemned men were brought singly, on foot. The first made his appearance precisely at seven, preceded by two priests, the former bearing a long pole swathed in black cloth, and surmounted by a plain silver cross. The second carried a crass. Six soldiers, on which was turned towards the prisoner, who, handcuffed and supported by a spiritual father on either side, marched immediately behind, two others following. These bore aloft, on poles, a sort of square glass lantern, containing, I was informed, bits of consecrated candle. All were shaven-headed, dressed loosely in black, and looking as unconcerned as though proceeding to breakfast.

A company of soldiers, clad in blue and white striped cotton tunics, in shape such as the English Guards wear, only shorter, with cartridge box, cross belts, etc., complete and fixed bayonets, brought up the rear.

These soldiers formed a square around the scaffold; a body of cavalry, about a hundred in number, galloping to the Captain-General's guard-house, which had arrived an hour previous, stationing themselves, with drawn swords, behind them. (More recently came a brass band.) All was done for the purpose of silencing the criminals' voices, in case they should say any thing against the always suspicious Cuban Government.) Every time a prisoner appeared on the platform, mounting the steps resolutely, without assistance, as did all his successors.

He was the one who had struck the murderous blow,—rather good-looking, dark mulatto, with beard and moustache, wearing a loose white shirt over his clothes, and a white linen cap, with a black cross in front. The executioner, a negro, a negro, in a short blue jacket, ornamented on the back with white bars, intended to represent those of a prison uniform (himself a criminal, who had accepted his vocation to escape a sentence of ten years' penal servitude in Africa), conducted the doomed man to the fatal chair, laid him back, and placed it in the iron collar.

The apparatus is very simple. A screw attached to the chair passes through the back of the chair, ending in a cross-bar of perhaps three feet long. This being made to describe about half a circle tightens the screw and collar, and compresses the neck to its extremest tensity, at once insuring strangulation and dislocating the vertebræ.

With the cap concealing his face, and the priest holding up the cross in front of him, the criminal sat but a moment, when the next the executioner had performed his office, and the man was a corpse. There ensued no struggle and no sound, but the indescribable, hurried, half-repressed noise one proceeding from the crowd. The head had fallen forward. After making a few motions with his hands toward the body, the priest ascended the platform to meet the second criminal, already half-way to the place of execution, while the negro removed the corpse to one of the chairs, passing a rope round it to keep it erect. With the head declining, you might have supposed it still in the possession of life.

Successively, and in a similar manner, the others underwent their punishment. Two of these were of Spanish negro blood; one, the last but one, the leader of the gang, was a fine-looking Cuban, a native of Cardenas, and a notorious villain. He would not allow the cap drawn over his face, and addressed a few words to the crowd, but I did not catch their purport—probably to request the prayers of the spectators. When the executioner turned and his head fell slightly forward—this is invariably the case—his bronzed cheeks became a little paler, and a single drop of blood appeared at the end of his nose; no other change was perceptible.

About fifteen minutes intervened between each execution, and by twenty minutes past eight all had transpired. By which time it was inoffensively hot, and a crowd next to unendurable.

They left the bodies sitting in the chairs, and exposed to the full glare of the Cuban sun, and the gaze of promenaders idlers, until four in the afternoon, when they were conveyed away in coarse coffins for immediate burial, and the scaffold was removed.

This execution was exceptional, perhaps in consequence of the circumstances attendant on the crime. Ordinarily capital punishment is administered on the Punta, in front of the prison. It occurs less commonly in Havana than in other parts of the island, where the Chinese population approone to the use of the knife on any and every occasion.

THE POPE ON THE SICILIAN QUESTION.

IT is an error to suppose, as some bigoted Protestants do, that the Pope is a mere ecclesiastic, whose knowledge of the world or fellow-feeling for the human struggles which are going on around him. Quite the contrary. Pius is, and necessarily must be, more a temporal sovereign; is thoroughly posted on the affairs of the day, and forms intelligent opinions on the political questions which arise in his neighborhood. Witness the following letter which he wrote a few months since on the insurrection in Sicily:

"To our venerable brother, Joseph M. Peparelo, Bishop of Sinope, Apostolic Administrator of the Church of Messina, greeting and benediction:

"We have received your two most respectful letters of the 21st of January and 20th of February ult., in which you were pleased to advert and confirm, in your name and in that of the other bishops of this province, your devotion and reverence toward us and the Holy See.

"While you were suffering for our consolation and affliction, we were watching with great anxiety and fear the bold efforts of those who, being supported by European powers, trampling on every divine and human right, designed, with surpassing impudence, to effect a revolution in those parts of Italy which had remained quiet.

"Deeply wat ered and afflicted by such a wicked intent; and we, venerable brother, in the midst of our sorrows, have seen from a most pernicious band of conspirators, on board of a Sardinian ship, has landed on the island. Indeed, to the lamentable astonishment of the whole hierarchy of those highly-favored with upper knowledge, Satan, disguising himself as an angel of light, and under colorable pretext of the welfare and happiness of those to whom he put from which they relied, insinuated himself into Sicily, that they want to assure the union of Italy. They testify all the while with their lips to their devotion to royal majesty, excite the people to revolution, take possession of all places and fortified, and, in a word, do all that they can to destroy and subject to the kingdom of Sardinia.

"The foundation of this new empire is to be founded are already destroyed if every body may be allowed to hold same relation to take possession of the rights belongs to others, and thus extend their own kingdom. But let those who will not hear the voice and the Church hear not fail to us. Therefore console yourself, venerable brother, and on your part trust in our Lord, who will not keep the just long amidst such storms. Persevere in imitating Him who is the author and finisher of [illegible]. Let us turn ourselves with confidence to the patronage of the Almighty Mother of God, the Virgin Mary, and to that of the immaculate Virgin Mary, who has destroyed all the enemies of error and heresies.

"Means while we embrace you and the other bishops of this province with the effusion of our heart. We give to you and them and to your clergy and people the apostolic benediction, as a pledge of His divine protection.

"PIUS NONUS.

"ROME, 3d, June, 1860, the 14th year of our Pontificate."

We need not bespeak attention for the above precept. It will command the utmost admiration and respect, not alone on account of the exalted source from whence it springs, but from the practical wisdom and statesmanlike wisdom which it evinces. Well may his Holiness predict that posterity will deem "the audacity" of the "professed revolutionists" of the "foreign harpies" who march under Garibaldi "incredible." To have invaded, with less than 2000 men, an island containing 2,000,000 of inhabitants, with vast fortified places, and protected by a large number of ships of war; to have succeeded in conquering one half the island in a fortnight, taking the capital, establishing a good government, and placing matters on such a footing in three weeks that the conquest of the remaining half of the island will be a mere question of time; this is, assuredly, an exploit that may stagger the belief of posterity. The Pope shows his admirable foresight in predicting the event, and we trust that no Protestant Christian will hereafter intimate that his Holiness lacks that attribute of greatness.

Nor are we without dwelling for a moment on the profound wisdom of the subsequent sentence in which we are told that "the principles on which the edifice of Italian unity is already destroyed if every body may be allowed to send arms and pirates to take possession of what belongs to others, and thus extend their own kingdom." This phrase is pregnant with suspicions as might be wished; but Popes, like oracles, are entitled to be studied; and who can help admiring the clearness with which Pius illumines the misty vail of words? What, indeed, will become of society if every body "sends arms and pirates" against his neighbor? And what, too, is what a demand will be, in such a case, for pirates? What a premium the genuine Corsican Brand will command! An irreverent German friend has suggested that the arms and pirates should chance to be sent to Genoa, or to some other places, as for instance, New York, Paris, or London, the inhabitants of which are confected, the latter hanged, and society would not be disturbed at all; but we must beware of listening to such avowed scoffers as these. It certainly has occurred, thus far, in the history of the world, that "arms and pirates" sent against foreign countries have never succeeded except where they invaded a people so abominably governed that any change was welcomed by the people; in Sicily, in particular, it is difficult to conceive any power so "pirate" more atrocious than the officers of the royal government, or any "arms" so villainous as the instruments of torture constructed by the late King Ferdinand at Palermo. It is true that a couple of centuries back "arms and pirates" were "sent" from Europe to America, with a grant of the soil, to certain of the Protestant sires of Pius the Ninth, and that the pirates did succeed for a time in butchering quiet Hogueneaus and Indians and stealing their lands; but by their triumph was short, and they were speedily hanged, as we all know. These, however, are trifles, and should not be dwelt on.

The invocation which closes the same paragraph of the epistle it is not becoming to discuss. Scoffers may say that the new Catholic doctrine which it has referred to is that of the Immaculate Conception in which the Pope is placed; and that if the discovery of the Immaculate Conception has no riper fruits than the Syllabus, it has already bestowed on the Church of Rome, it might as well have been left undiscovered. But this is mere cavil.

Certainly, events thus far have hardly justified the confident lopes expressed by the Holy Father. Sicily has passed out of the hands of the King of Naples, and the very Archbishop to whom the above letter was addressed is only waiting for an opportunity to follow the example of his brethren at Palermo, and declare for Garibaldi. Still "the island" is not "terrified," nor is "ruin threatened," save only by the Pope's faithful servants, the bombardiers of Bomba junior. But the end is not yet; and who knows what a Papal benediction and a Papal curse may not bring forth?

No one, we repeat, can fail to perceive how wise and truly Christian are the sentiments of the Papal letter; what a fund of practical common sense and knowledge of the world it reveals; and how fitting it is that the Pope to be the best possible temporal ruler for the most important and most troubled state in Italy.

ANOTHER AMERICAN VICTORY.

WHEN the Rev. Sydney Smith, some twenty-five years ago, asked how many geniuses "Who reads an American book?" he little thought that, in the year 1860, the great festival at a meeting of the most eminent British and Continental savans would be a paper read by a professor in an American University. At the recent meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, at Oxford, papers were read by the most eminent of England's men of science; but, says an English paper, the great attraction of the session was a paper read by J. W. Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology, and President of the Medical Department of the University of New York, and author of a work on Human Physiology, which is the standard authority on this subject in Europe as well as America.

Professor Draper attended the meeting of the Association at the special invitation of the Committee, whose guest he was. When his turn came to read, the various sections, which meet daily in different halls of the city, adjourned to listen. The spacious hall of the University reading-room was "literally crowded to suffocation by an audience composed of persons of the highest literary and scientific reputation, of both sexes." The subject of Professor Draper's paper was, "The Intellectual Development of Europe considered with reference to View that the Progression of Organisms is determined by Law." His object was to prove that the advancement of civilization in Europe was not fortuitous, but was governed by a physical law—a subject which the learned professor will shortly develop more fully in a work now in press by Messrs. Harper, and which will be the result of years of assiduous study and scientific investigation.

His lecture lasted an hour, and, though the day was oppressively hot, was listened to with breathless interest. No sooner had he closed than half a dozen eager savans struggled for the honor of moving a vote of thanks. According to the reports, a most lively discussion ensued—some of the ablest members of the Association ranging themselves on the side of Dr. Draper, who found himself the hero of the hour. His success no doubt, the lion of the day and of the session. His paper was the talk of every literary and scientific circle in town, he was himself overwhelmed with invitations—to the honor of science be it said—from opponents as well as friends of his views.

At a subsequent meeting he read an account of a large reflecting telescope for astronomical photography, now being erected at his country house, near Hastings, on the Hudson, by one of his sons. This is the first instrument of the kind erected in America, and the second in the world—the largest being that at Kew, in England. Though its cost will be above ten thousand dollars, the means are furnished entirely by the young gentleman (Dr. Henry Draper) under whose direction also the intricate apparatus is being prepared and put up.

WILL THE PRINCE OF WALES MARRY AN AMERICAN?

A GOOD many jokes are current about the possibility of the Prince of Wales falling in love with an American belle, and the possible consequences of such a catastrophe. Every body looks at the subject in a quizzical light; no one ever seems to have dreamed that it may be necessary for the Prince to marry and lay an American sharing the throne of England. Yet stranger things have happened.

If, for instance, the Prince must marry. By law he is forbidden to marry a subject; nor can he wed any woman who is not a Protestant. It is thus impossible that he can find a wife in England, France, Spain, Italy, Southern Germany, or Russia. His choice is restricted to Northern Germany and the United States. Prussia has already married Princess Royal to German prince, they had to go elsewhere. George the First married Sophia of Zell; George the Second married Caroline of Anspach; Frederick, Prince of Wales, who died before his father, married Augusta of Saxe-Gotha; George the Third married Charlotte of Mecklenburg; George the Fourth, Caroline of Brunswick; Queen Victoria, Albert of Saxe-Gotha. It may be said that all these marriages were from the members of the English family had no choice. At the time Frederick Prince of Wales married, this was a colony; when George the Fourth married, in 1795, the United States were little better than a colony in the eye of Englishmen; Queen Victoria, at the age of eighteen, could hardly have been expected to deviate from precedent, and marry an American. Of all the heirs-apparent of the House of Brunswick the Prince of Wales is the first who is not forced by law to marry into one of the German families.

Now there are very substantial reasons why he should not do so. Without exception, these German marriages have proved unpopular in England. Caroline of Anspach was a shrew; Augusta of Saxe-Gotha was a fool, if not something worse; Caroline of Brunswick scandalized Europe by her divorce suits and her loose behavior; Prince Albert is, without exception, the most unpopular man in England. The English say, with great truth, that they have to grant to all these foreigners large annual salaries, and that the only reward they get for them is the sacrifice of British to German interests. All of these German wives or husbands have lived on the British people, and improved their friends in Deutschland on what they screwed out of Parliament. More than this, in time of trouble they have been and are, used the arms and money of England to serve the interests of their broken-down families in Germany. Prince Albert, as every one knows, played a thoroughly double-faced game, in the interest of the German oligarchs, during the Crimean war.

These facts are not likely to render the British nation partial to another German marriage. The English have married their Princess Royal to a German prince, they had to go elsewhere only for taking her, just as they had to pay Albert for marrying their Queen; but when it comes to marrying the Prince of Wales, they may look for something better than a Dutchwoman. If they do, they can not look elsewhere than here.

It can not be questioned but, in view of statesmanlike policy, an American marriage would be a wise step on the part of the Prince. This country ought to be made the best friend of Great Britain. We are the only people in the world who have established and maintain institutions based on the same foundation as those of England. Between England and the European Powers there never can be any lasting friendship; this is the only country by whose firm alliance Great Britain could set store, if she could secure it. She has never find a friend so valuable or so stanch as the United States, if only she can secure our friendship. And there is no way so good to judge of the character of our people—to secure that friendship as by having her Prince marry an American.

This, too, is a Democratic age, and the marriage of the Prince of Wales with an untitled girl would be a famous hit with the British people. It would have a spice of romance about it which would render the young man a hero at once. We may add that the Prince can find among our American girls more than one that would adorn a throne, and would make him a good wife.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PICTURE.

I SHALL not try to be exhaustive, not only because it is not necessary to praise Page in order to persuade people to look at his pictures, but because I am afraid I am not successful. The gay painter and I differ. He believes profoundly in advertising, and it is a very common and popular faith. But while I do a great wae, it is not the secret of fame nor of fortune.

"The Flight into Egypt" is a small picture. In the right of a rough heading the donkey, and Mary sitting upon it, holding the child, over whom she bows her head. The donkey is standing upon a few shrubs and trees. The path descends abruptly to the desert, which lies a glaring red waste across the canvas. Above the pyramids by the Nile appear, and three shreds of white cloud in the blank desert of red sky that overspreads the desert of red sand. The mother's face is kept in her lube. The donkey catches the last bit of herbage; while Joseph, who has already begun to descend, gravely surveys the long, desolate region which he is to be traversing. They are literally going down into Egypt; and in no other picture of the subject that I recall to the mind that they are going into intolerable and danger so impressively treated. Usually they sit with a palm-tree by the wayside, and the country is substantiated to the holy character of the travelers. But here the journey is the central point of the picture. Joseph has his back to the infant, and is evidently thinking only of the rough way before him. The dim foliage in the corner shows that there is somewhere a sunny fresh pleasant scene and verdure. It is vague, as if it were already a memory.

This is, so far, very beautiful. But what are we to make of the drawing of the infant, and the want of keeping of the mother, and the donkey, which looks as if cut out of a fine nectarine? You may do what you choose with them, as likewise with the fact that the Madonna could not raise her head erect without hitting the frame above it. But when you have been looking at the picture for a quarter of an hour, or longer, then turn your eye to some other work near by, and consider if there be not an exquisitely transparent purity and delicacy of color in what you have been studying—something luminous and lurid, as of the light of the hot desert, and cloudless, hot, Syrian sky. Is the picture bald, or only simple? Is it one of those works of Page of which it is perpetually said, "Page is a great painter, doubtless, but this picture doesn't prove it?" What picture does prove it? Did the Venus? Do his portraits? Even a Lounger can see that the same hand which painted the Venus painted "The Flight into Egypt."

—I wanted to say something of Brown's large picture of New York, from Hoboken, and of the dewy freshness of a small out-door piece, by Cropsey, which are in other lounging places; but I wait until another week.

OF CLAMS.

RICHARD says that he has read with great interest the remarks of Mr. Douglas upon clams, but that the distinguished writer omits to mention that a clam-bake is, while he highly commends the institution. Richard further says that he supposes a clam-bake means a feast of baked clams. But the baking of clams upon the shore for thousands of people can not be done in ordinary pans or ovens, or, indeed, calls for any of any kind, he thinks; and Richard, as usual, is right.

Narragansett clams are very famous, and they are justly famous. No great political canvass is ever carried on in the State of Rhode Island without their assistance. They constitute material and to the cause. Nor are their benefactions confined to political occasions. Military campaigns "go on clam-bakes." A whole regiment have taken clam-bakes (or used to). Private parties are incessantly going on clam-bakes. The rocks in the bay—the points upon the shore—the islands—the groves —are all consecrated to the eating of clams.

Clams are of two kinds. There is the long clam and the round. The round clam is called a quahaug —a word which the natives of the Narragansett shore call Nahaug. The long clam is of the size of a non-lobster, and as nutritious as rhinoceros hide. Yet in every kidney there is a sweet bit of marrow —succulent, tender, and delicious—yet it is not worth the trouble of dis-covering. The long clam has a dark neck, and a narrower, saline, exquisite morsel as large as a pea, and of a small little taste. It is this clam which is peculiarly sacred to the solemn ceremony of the "Bake."

For this purpose large stones are piled together upon the beach, forming a kind of rough pit or oven. In this a large fire is built, and fed until the stones are very heated. Then the fire is let, a layer of moist sea-weed is spread, the clams in the shell are "steamed in," seaweed is put on them, green corn ears added, the whole is piled deep in the moist sea-weed, and the delicious clams are cooked in the salt steam generated of the weed and the heat stones. The corn, likewise, is delightfully baked and brown-ed. Under a rough shed near by, or in a shady grove upon the clam a table of honest boards stands ready, with huge platters of crackers (tisnits) and bottles of pepper-sauce. There are sometimes tumblers, also, and bottles not of pepper-sauce. The hot clams are brought from the stones and heaped upon the table. The shells are opened by the host, and a slight effort parts them entirely and reveals the clam, which is seized by the thumb and forefinger—the other lifted Hoppe-ster-ward —and the choice bit is caught and consumed, while the shell and the residuary clam are thrown into a large basket or under the table.

It is manual exercise altogether; and I have not forgotten the amusing helplessness of some New York friend at a clam-bake upon the island, near Newport, who tried to manage the clam with knife and silver fork. Most of them relinquished the effort and left the clam to be returned to the bake —renowned haunts of refinement—with an impression that clam-bakes were vulgar. But a few persevered and triumphed.

Usually the clam-bakes include a chowder, and a more delightful chowder is not possible than a genuine clam-bake upon some lovely point of Narragansett Bay, "in summer when the days are long" —when the salt air of the ocean breathes up the bay, and the party is a party of friends. There was once a chowder club in Providence. It had its President and governor, Secretary, and one of the traditional jokes of the shore is the toast of a wag who was a member of the club, and who, after a successful "clam-bake," having eaten and drunken upon the great fitness of their President, concluded by saying, "And now, gentlemen, I give you the health of our great chowder Head."

The joke was doubtless recalled and recounted at the late great feast of clams.

THE MERRY PAINTER.

A PAINTER said to me the other day that we had no professional enthusiasts of art; no body of men whose business it is to applaud every thing that is done by certain artists and to depreciate all the works of other men. We were sitting before the new picture by Page, at Snedecor's, "The Flight into Egypt" which the artist was talking with merry success of the public.

"There is a Parisian Roussseau," he said; "it has a great name, but he is no better than many other artists of the same kind in Paris. However, the feuilletonistes believe in him, and said 'How beautiful!' and now it is de rigueur to admire whatever Rousseau does. One year I was at the Exposition," he continued, "and I went every morning to the place of honor. Twas a pretty picture, and there were many people in the room. A group of intelligent people approached. The gentlemen were decorated, the ladies had the Ludon't-know-what of fine society: evidently they were cultivated, high-bred persons. They looked at the pictures without a catalogue, 'How charming!' 'how agreeable!' 'how rich!' 'how warm!' they exclaimed in delight. 'But how horrible this is!' 'how flat!' 'how dull!' they said, as they glanced at the Rousseau, and passed on. Presently they began to study the catalogue. 'Mais,' said one, 'Rousseau's "Morning" is here: where is it?' They looked eagerly for the number, and found the picture which they had just passed by. 'Ah! how exquisite! how soft! how pearly! Don't you positively feel the dew?' What a master! What a genius!'"

The jolly painter laughed as he told the anecdote with twinkling eyes.

"No; we yet want the professional enthusiasts," he continued; "the men who insist that the accident to the canvas is the best part of the picture, Delacroix sent a work to the Exhibition. Upon the way thither one of the feet was nearly rubbed out by chafing. 'Ha! ha!' cried the anti-Delacroixians, when the picture was hung. 'What's the matter with that foot?'

"'Matter!' exclaimed the unswerving disciples of Delacroix—'matter! stupids? Why, that is the noble splendor and excellence of the work.' They defended it stoutly; for they were not to be done by Delacroix, and what Delacroix did must be right. Presently the master explained that it was an accident. 'Ah

DHEIR-EL-KAMAR, IN SYRIA, THE SCENE OF THE RECENT MASSACRES OF CHRISTIANS.

THE TOWN OF DHEIR-EL-KAMAR, IN SYRIA.

WE publish above a picture of the town of Dheir-el-Kamar, in Syria, which was, a few weeks since, the scene of a frightful massacre of Christians by the Druses. Dheir-el-Kamar was a place of 7000 inhabitants, most of whom were Christians, and containing a convent of Maronite nuns. The place could not be defended, and when the Druses attacked it the inhabitants surrendered, on condition that their lives should be spared and no outrage committed. The Druses were no sooner in the place than they commenced their fiendish work; the women (including the nuns) were violated, the men murdered, and the town laid desolate. A few survivors, who fled toward Lebanon, were butchered on the way by a band of Moslems and Druses.

It was at Dheir-el-Kamar that the fiendish outrages took place which are related in our last number in the news columns. The whole city has been laid desolate.

WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

III.

THE last notes of the introduction to the Opera were being played, and the seats in the pit were all filled, when Pesca and I reached the theatre.

There was plenty of room, however, in the passage that ran round the pit, which was precisely the position best calculated to answer the purpose for which I was attending the performance. I went first to the barrier separating us from the stalls, and looked for the Count in that part of the theatre. He was not there. Returning along the passage, on the left-hand side from the stage, and looking about me attentively, I discovered him in the pit. He occupied an excellent place, some twelve or fourteen seats from the end of a bench, within three rows of the stalls. I placed myself exactly on a line with him, Pesca standing by my side. The Professor was not yet aware of the purpose for which I had brought him to the theatre, and he was rather surprised that we did not move nearer to the stage.

The curtain rose, and the Opera began.

Throughout the whole of the first act we remained in our position, the Count, absorbed by the orchestra and the stage, never casting so much as a chance glance at us. Not a note of Donizetti's delicious music was lost on him. There he sat, high above his neighbors, smiling, and nodding his great head enjoyingly, from time to time. When the people near him applauded the close of an air (as an English audience in such circumstances always will applaud), without the least consideration for the orchestral movement which immediately followed it, he looked round at them with an expression of compassionate remonstrance, and held up one hand with a gesture of polite entreaty. At the more refined passages of the singing, at the more delicate phrases of the music, which passed unapplauded by others, his fat hands adorned with perfectly-fitting black kid gloves, softly patted each other, in token of the cultivated appreciation of a musical man. At such times his only murmur of approval, "Bravo! Bra-a-a-a!" hummed through the silence like the purring of a great cat. His immediate neighbors on either side—hearty, ruddy-faced people from the country, basking amazedly in the sunshine of fashionable London—seeing and hearing him, began to follow his lead. Many a burst of applause from the pit, that night, started from the soft, comfortable patting of the black-gloved hands. The man's voracious vanity devoured this implied tribute to his local and critical supremacy with an appearance of the highest relish. Smiles rippled continuously over his fat face. He looked about him at the pauses in the music, serenely satisfied with himself and his fellow-creatures. "Yes! yes! these barbarous English people are learning something from ME. Here, there, and every where, I—Fosco—am an Influence that is felt, a Man who sits supreme!" If ever face spoke, his face spoke then; and that was its language.

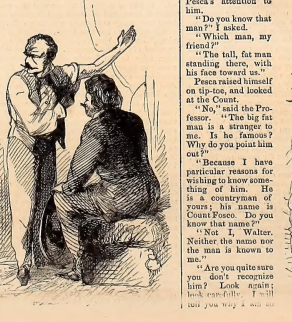
The curtain fell on the first act, and the audience rose to look about them. This was the time I had waited for—the time to try if Pesca knew him.

He rose with the rest, and surveyed the occupants of the boxes grandly with his opera-glass. At first his back was toward us; but he turned round in time to our side of the theatre, and looked at the boxes above us, using his glass for a few minutes—then removing it, but still continuing to look up. This was the moment I chose, when his full face was in view, for directing Pesca's attention to him.

"Do you know that man?" I asked.

"Which man, my friend?"

"The tall, fat man standing there, with his face toward us."



Pesca raised himself on tip-toe, and looked at the Count.

"No," said the Professor. "The big fat man is a stranger to me. Is he famous? Why do you point him out?"

"Because I have particular reasons for wishing to know something of him. He is a countryman of yours; his name is Count Fosco. Do you know that name?"

"Not I, Walter. Neither the name nor the man is known to me."

"Are you quite sure you don't recognize him? Look again, look especially at the [illegible] you may [illegible]

"No," he said; "I have never set my two eyes on that big fat man before in all my life."

As he spoke, the Count looked downward and backward behind us on the pit tier.

The eyes of the two Italians met.

The instant before I had been perfectly satisfied, from his own reiterated assertion, that Pesca did not know the Count. The instant afterward I was equally certain that the Count knew Pesca!

Knew him, and—more surprising still—feared him as well! There was no mistaking the change that passed over the villain's face. The leaden hue that altered his yellow complexion for a moment, the sudden rigidity of all his features, the furtive scrutiny of his cold gray eyes, the momentary stillness of him from head to foot, told their own tale. A mortal dread had mastered him, body and soul; and his own recognition of Pesca was the cause of it.

The slim man, with the scar on his cheek, was still close by us. He had apparently drawn his inference from the effect produced on the Count by the sight of Pesca, as I had drawn mine. He was a mild, gentlemanlike person, looking like a foreigner; and his interest in our proceedings was not expressed in any thing approaching to vulgar impertinence.

For my own part, I was so startled by the change in the Count's face, so astounded at the entirely unexpected turn which events had taken, that I knew neither what to say or do next. Pesca roused me by stepping back to his former place at my side, and speaking thus:

"How the fat man stares!" he exclaimed. "Is it at me? Am I dressed queerly? How can he know me, when I don't know him?"

I kept my eye still on the Count. I saw him move for the first time when Pesca moved. He was not to lose sight of the little man, in the lower position in which he now stood. I was curious to see what would happen if Pesca's attention, under these circumstances, was withdrawn from him; and I accordingly asked the Professor if he recognized any of his pupils that evening, among the ladies in the boxes. Pesca immediately raised his large opera-glass to his eyes, and moved it slowly all round the upper part of the theatre, searching for his pupils with the most ambitious scrutiny.

The moment he showed himself to be thus engaged, the Count turned round, slipped past the persons who occupied seats on the opposite side of him from where we stood, and disappeared in the middle passage down the centre of the pit. I saw Pesca by the side of me, at his inexpressible astonishment, hurried him round with me to the back of the pit, to intercept the Count before he could get to the door. Somewhat to my surprise, the slim man hesitated our before us, avoiding a stoppage caused by some persons on our side of the pit leaving their places, by which Pesca and myself were delayed. When we reached the lobby the Count had disappeared, and the foreigner with the scar was gone too.

"Come home," I said; "come home, Pesca, to your lodgings. I must speak to you in private—I must speak directly."

"My-dear-friend-you!" cried the Professor, in a state of the extremest bewilderment. "What on earth is the matter?"

I walked on rapidly without answering. The circumstances under which the Count had left the theatre suggested to me that his extraordinary anxiety to escape Pesca might carry him to farther extremities still. He might escape me, too, by leaving London. I could not risk the future, if I allowed him so much as a day's freedom to act as he pleased. And I doubted that foreign stranger who had set the scar of an ugly wound I suspected of intentionally following him out.

With this double distrust in my mind, I was not long in making Pesca understand all that I wanted. As soon as we two were alone in his room, I increased his confusion and amazement a hundred-fold by telling him what my position was, as plainly and unreservedly as I have acknowledged it here.

"My friend, what can I do?" cried the Professor, piteously appealing to me with both hands. "Advise me—help me—direct me! Only help you, Walter, when I don't know the man?"

"He knows you—he is afraid of you—he has left the theatre to escape you. Pesca! you must be a reason for this. Look back into your own life, before you came to England. You left Italy, as you have told me yourself, for political reasons. You have never mentioned those reasons to me, and I wished you to keep them now. I only ask you to consult your own recollections, and to say if they suggest so past cause for the secret which the first sight of you produced in that man."

To my unutterable surprise, these words, harmless as they appeared to me, produced the most astounding effect on Pesca which the sight of Pesca had produced on the Count. The rosy face of just the right colour whitened in an instant, and he drew back from me slowly, trembling from head to foot.

"Walter!" he said. "You don't know what you ask."

He spoke in a whisper—he looked at me as if I had suddenly revealed to him some hidden danger to both of us. In less than one minute of time he was the altered from the stout, frequent little man of all my past experience, that if I had met him in the street, changed as I saw him now, I should most certainly not have known him again.

"Forgive me, if I have unintentionally pained and shocked you," I replied. "Remember the cruel wrong my wife has suffered at Count Fosco's hands. Remember that the wrong can never be redressed, unless the means are in my power of forcing him to do her justice. I spoke in her interest, Pesca. I ask you again to forgive me; I can say no more."

I rose to go. He stopped me before I reached the door.

"Wait," he said. "You have shaken me from head to foot. You don't know how I left my country, and why I left my country. I can compose myself—let me think, if I can."

I returned to my chair. He walked up and down the room, talking to himself incoherently in his own language. After several turns backward and forward, he suddenly came up to me, and laid his hand with a strange tenderness and solemnity on my breast.

"On your heart and soul, Walter," he said, "is there no other way to get to that man but the chance way through me?"

"There is no other way," I answered.

He left me, and opened the door of the room and looked out cautiously into the passage; closed it once more, and came back to me.

"You owe your rights over me, Walter," he said, "on the day when you saved my life. It was years from that event, when you pleased to take it. Take it now. Yes! I mean what I say. My sacred words, as true as the good God is above us, will put me in your hands again."

The trembling earnestness with which he uttered this extraordinary warning carried with it to my mind the conviction that it spoke the truth.

"Mind this!" he went on, shaking his hands at me in the vehemence of his agitation. "I hold no thread, in my own mind, between that man Fosco and the past days which I call back to me, for your sake. If you find the thread, keep it to yourself—tell me nothing; on my honour, I beg and implore you, Walter, let me be innocent, let me be blind to all the future, as I am now!"

He said a few words more, hesitatingly and disconnectedly—then stopped again.

I saw that the effort of expressing himself in English, on an occasion when to speak to me was him the use of the quaint turns and phrases of his ordinary vocabulary, was painfully increasing the difficulty he had from the first in speaking to me at all. Having learned to read and understand English (but never accustomed to speak it), in the earlier days of our intimate companionship, I now suggested to him that he should express in writing what he had to say in English in putting any question which might be necessary to my enlightenment. He accepted the proposal, in his own quick, impulsive language—spoken with a vehement agitation which betrayed itself in the perpetual working of his features, and in the violent and lavish expenditure of his foreign gesticulations, but never in the raising of his voice—I now heard the words which arrested me on the point of leaving him, as I left for this story to record.*

"I have no longer any motive for leaving Italy," he began, "except that it was for political reasons. If I had been driven to this country by the common necessities of society, I should not have kept those reasons a secret from you or from any one. I have concealed them because my Government formerly has denounced the sentence of my exile. You have heard, Walter, of the political societies that are hidden in every country in Europe, and more in Europe? To one of those Societies I belonged in Italy—and belong still, in England. When I came to this country, I brought the influence of my chief. I was overzealous, in my youngest time; I was the child of compromising myself and others. For those reasons I was ordered to emigrate to England, and to wait. I emigrated—I have waited—I wait still. Nothing is now I may be called away: ten years hence I may be called away. It is all one to me—I am here, I stay myself by my duty, and I will not violate no oath (you shall hear why, presently) in making my confidence complete by telling you the name of the Society to which I belong. All I do is to put my life in your hands. If what I say to you now is ever known by others to have passed my lips, I am a dead man. I am here I am a dead man."

He shrugged his shoulders in my ear. I keep the secret which he thus communicated. The Society to which he belonged will be sufficiently individualized if I say that it numbers at pages if I call it "The Brotherhood," on the few occasions when any reference to the subject shall be needed in my narrative.

"The object of the Brotherhood," Pesca went on, "is, briefly, the object of other political societies. It is to free the world from oppression, by tyranny, and the assertion of the rights of the people. That is the whole of the mystery—and a true one. So long as a man's life is useful, or even harmless only, he has the right to enjoy it. But if his life interferes with the right enjoyment of his fellow-men, from that moment he forfeits the right, and it is not only no crime, but a positive merit, to deprive him of it. This is the only way in what frightful circumstances of oppression and suffering this Society took its rise. It is true for you as you have proved it, and true for conquered your freedom so long ago, that you have conveniently forgotten what blood you shed, and what extremities you proceeded to in the conquering—it is not for you to say how far the worst of all oppressions—the oppression that carry the maddened men of an enslaved nation. The iron that has entered into our souls has gone too deep for you to pluck it out. Let us agree alone! Laugh at him, distrust him, open your eyes in wonder at that secret self which nourishes in him, sometimes under the everyday respectability and tranquillity of a man like me; sometimes under the grinding poverty, the fierce squalor, of men less lucky, less pliable,

* It is only right to mention here that I repeat Pesca's statement to me, with the careful suppression and alteration which the subject of it has rendered necessary in my own sense of duty to my friend demand. My first and last communication to the Society to which he belongs is the only one which is necessary in this portion of the narrative.

less patient than I am—but judge us not! In the time of your first Charles you might have done as justice; the long misery of your own freedom has made you incapable of doing us justice now."

All the deepest feelings of his nature seemed to force themselves to the surface in those words—all his hatred of the ages poured out, for the first time in our lives; but still, his voice never rose—still, his dread of the terrible revelation he was making to me never left him.

"So far," he resumed, "you think the Society like other Societies. Its object (in your English opinion) is anarchy and revolution. It takes the life of a bad King or a bad Minister, as if the one and the other were dangerous wild beasts, to be shot at the first opportunity. I grant you this. But the laws of the Brotherhood are the laws of the most perfect social union on the face of the earth. The members are not known to one another. There is a President in Italy, there is a President in England, to whom these his Secretary. The Presidents and the Secretaries know the members; but the members, among themselves, are all strangers until their chiefs see fit, in the political necessity of the time, or in the private necessity of the Society, to make them known to each other. With such a safeguard as this, there is no oath among us on admittance. We are identified with the Brotherhood by a secret mark, which we all bear, which lasts for life. We are bound to give up all account our ordinary business, and to report ourselves to the President or the Secretary four times a year, in the event of our services being required. We are forbidden to betray the Brotherhood, or if we injure it by serving other interests, that we die by the principles of the Society—die by the hand of a stranger who may be sent from the other end of the world to strike the blow, or by the hand of our own brother, who may have been a member unknown to us through all the years of our intimacy. Sometimes the death is delayed; sometimes it follows close on the breach of duty. It is our first business to know how to punish—our second, to know how to escape, when the word is spoken. Some of us may seem our lives through, and may not be wanted. Some of us may be called to the work, or to the preparation for the work, the very day of our admission. I myself—the little, easy, cheerful man you know—I, in my own person, could hardly lift up his handkerchief to strike down the fly that buzzes about his face—I, in my younger days, by provocation so dreadful that I will not tell you of it, entered the Brotherhood by an impulse, as I might have killed with a sword in a duel. I must remain in it now—it has got me, whatever I may think of it in my better circumstances and my cooler mood, to my dying day. While I was still in Italy, I was chosen Secretary; and all the members whose names were brought to me, to write with my President, were brought face to face also with me."

He began to understand him; I saw the end toward which his extraordinary disclosure was now tending. He waited at moment, watching me earnestly—evidently that he had anything guessed what was passing in my mind, before he resumed.

"You have drawn your own conclusion already," he said. "I see it in your face. Tell me nothing; keep me out of the secret of your thoughts. Let me make my one last sacrifice of myself, for your sake—and then have done with this subject, and return to it again, never!"

He signed to me not to answer him—rose, removed his coat, and rolled up the shirt-sleeve on his left arm.

"I promised you that this confidence should be complete," he whispered, speaking close at my ear, and with his head looking watchful at the door. "Whatever comes of it, you shall not reproach me with having hidden any thing from you which it was necessary for your interests to know. I have said that the Brotherhood identifies its members by a secret mark for life. See the place, and the mark on it, for yourself."

He raised his bare arm, and showed me, high on the upper part of it, close to the inner side, a brand deeply burned in the flesh, and stained of a bright blood-red color. I abstain from describing it more particularly than the broad report-ed. It will be sufficient to say that it was circular in form, and so small that it would have been completely covered by a shilling piece.

"A man who has this mark, branded in this place, is a member of the Brotherhood. A man who has been false to the Brotherhood is discovered, sooner or later, by the chiefs who know him—Presidents or Secretaries, as the case may be. And a man discovered by the chiefs is dead. My Second Self never dies. Remember that—what you have seen and heard; draw what conclusions you like; act as you please. But, in the name of God, remember you discover, however you do, tell me nothing! Let me remain free from a responsibility which it horrifies me to think of even! I know, in my conscience, this is not my responsibility now. For the last time, I say I swear it—I swear it solemnly, on my oath as a Christian, if that man you pointed out at the Opera knows me, he is so altered, or so disguised, that I do not know him. I am ignorant of his proceedings or his purposes in England—I never saw him, I never heard his name, to my knowledge, before to-night. I say no more. Leave me a little, Walter: I am overpowered by what has happened: I am shaken by what I have said. Let me try to be like myself again, when we meet next."

He forgot me, for the time, and, turning away from me, hid his face in his hands. I gently opened the door, so as not to disturb him, and left him to recover himself in low tones, which he might hear or not, as he pleased.

"I will keep the memory of to-night in my heart of hearts," I said. "You shall never repent the trust you have reposed in me. May I come to you to-morrow? May I come as early as nine o'clock?"

"Yes, Walter," he replied, looking up at me kindly, and speaking in English once more, as if his one anxiety now was to get back to our former relations toward each other. "Come to my little bit of breakfast, before I go my way among my pupils that I teach."

"Good-night, Pesca."

"Good-night, my friend."

IV.

My first conviction, as soon as I found myself outside the house, was that the opportunities was left me but to act at once on the information I had obtained, and to make sure of the Count that night, or to risk the loss of my only deputed till the morning, of Laura's last chance. I looked at my watch: it was ten o'clock.

Not the shadow of a doubt crossed my mind of the purpose for which the Count had left the theatre. His escape from us that evening was, beyond all question, the preliminary only to his escape from London. The mark of the Brotherhood was in my sense—I in my certain of it as if he had shown me the brand; and the betrayal of the Brotherhood was on his conscience—I had seen it in his recognition of Pesca.

It was easy to understand why that recognition had not been mutual. A man of the Count's strength of mind would never risk the terrible consequences of turning spy without looking to his personal security quite as carefully as he looked to his golden reward. The shaven face, which I had pointed out at the Opera, might even have been altered by a hundred tricks. Jane's his dark-brown hair might be a wig. The accident of time might have helped him as well; his immunity from vigilance might have come with his later years. There was every reason why Pesca should not have known him again—every reason, also, why he should have known Pesca, whose singular personal appearance made a hundred men remember him to one who would.

I have said that I felt certain of the purpose in the Count's mind when he escaped us at the theatre. Indeed I doubt, myself, if what I say with my own eyes, that he believed himself, in spite of the obvious in his appearance, to have been recognized by Pesca, and by no other person, in danger of his life? If I could get speech of him that night—if I could show him that I, too, knew of the fatal peril in which he stood—what result would follow? Plainly this. One of us must be master of the situation—one of us must force the life at the mercy of the other.

I owed it to myself to consider the chances against me, before I confronted them. I owed it to my wife to do all that lay in my power to lessen the risk.

The circumstance upon me wanted no reckoning up: they were all merged in one. If the Count discovered, by my own avowal, that the direct way to his safety lay through my life, he was probably the last man in existence who would shrink from throwing me off my guard and taking that way. He knew he had me alone within his reach. The only means of defence against him on which I could at all rely to lessen the risk, presented themselves to me, after a little careful thinking, clearly enough. Before I made any personal acknowledgment of my knowledge in his presence, I must place the discovery itself where it would be ready for instant use against him, and safe from any attempt to destroy it on his part. If I laid the mine under his feet before I approached him, and if I left instructions with a friend to apply the fire it on the expiration of a certain time, unless directions to the contrary were previously received under my own hand or from my own lips, I felt that, even if the Count's security was absolutely dependent upon mine, and I might hold the vantage-ground over him secretly, we were on his own terms.

This idea occurred to me when I was close to my own lodgings which we had taken on returning from the sea-side. I went in, without disturbing any one, by the help of my key. A light was in the hall; and I found my wife at it to my work-room, to make my preparations, and absolutely to commit myself to an interview with the Count, before either Laura or Marian could have the slightest suspicion of what I intended to do.

A letter addressed to Pesca represented the surest measure of precaution which it was now possible for me to take. It was as follows:

"The man whom I pointed out to you at the Opera is a member of the Brotherhood, and has been false to the trust. You both know the love you once bore me, use the power intrusted to you, without mercy and without delay, against that man. I have reached a clue to his life, and the forfeit of my failure has been paid with my life."

I signed and dated these lines, inclosed them in an envelope, and sealed it up. On the outside I wrote the direction: "Keep these inclosures unopened until nine o'clock to-morrow morning. If you do not hear from me, or see me, before that hour, break the seal then the clock strikes, and read the contents." I added my initials; and protected the whole by inclosing it in a second sealed envelope, addressed to Pesca at his lodgings.

Nothing remained to be done after this but to find the means of sending my letter to its destination immediately. I should then have accomplished all that lay in my power. If any thing happened to me in the Count's house, I had now provided for his answering it with his life. I had taken means of preventing his escape under any circumstances whatever were at Pesca's disposal, if he chose to exert them, I did not for an instant doubt. The extraordinary anxiety which he had expressed to remain unenlightened as to the Count's identity—or, in other words, to be left uncertain enough about facts to justify him to his own conscience in remaining passive—betrayed plainly that the means of exercising the terrible justice of the Brotherhood were ready to his hand, although as a natural human man, he had shrunk from plainly saying as much in my presence. The deadly certainty with which the mysterious organization of secrecy societies can hunt down a traitor to the cause, hide himself where he may, had been long ago exemplified, even to my superficial experience, to allow of any doubt. Considering the subject only as a reader of newspapers, I remembered in my memory that in London and in Paris, of foreigners found stabbed in the streets, whose assassins could never be traced—of bodies and parts of bodies thrown into the Thames and the Seine, by hands that could never be discovered—of deaths by secret violence which could only be accounted for in one way. I have disguised nothing relative to myself in these pages; and I do not disguise here, that I believed I had written Count Fosco's death-warrant, if the fatal emergency happened which authorized Pesca to open my enclosure.

I left my room to go down to the ground-floor of the house and speak to the servant about finding me a messenger. He happened to be ascending the stairs at the time, and we met on the landing. His son, a quick lad, was the messenger he proposed to me, on hearing what I wanted. Before he had the boy up-stairs, I gave him his directions. He was to take the letter in a cab, to put it into Professor Pesca's own hands, and to bring me back a written acknowledgment from that gentleman—returning in the cab, and keeping it at the door for my use. It was then nearly half-past two. I calculated that the boy might be back in twenty minutes, and that I might drive to St. John's Wood, on his return, in twenty minutes more.

When the lad had departed on his errand, I returned to my own room for a little while, to put certain papers in order, so that they might be easily found in case of the worst. The key of the old-fashioned bureau in which those papers were kept I sealed up, and left it on my table, with Marian's name written on the outside of the little packet in which I had inclosed it—next to the sitting-room, in which I expected to find Laura and Marian awaiting my return from the Opera. I then stood trembling for a short time when I laid it on the lock of the door.

No one was in the room but Marian. As she was reading a book she looked at her watch in surprise when I came in.

"How early you are back!" she said. "You must have gone before the Opera was over."

"Yes," I replied; "neither Pesca nor I wanted for the end. Where is Laura?"

She had one of her bad headaches this evening, and advised her to go to bed when we had done tea."

I left the room again, on the pretext of wishing to speak with Laura also. Marian's too quick eyes were beginning to look inquiringly at my face—Marian's quick instinct was beginning to suspect that I had something of weighty on my mind.

When I entered the bedchamber, and softly approached the bedside by the dim flicker of the night-lamp, my wife was asleep.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECENT STATE ELECTIONS.

The Democratic State ticket held in North Carolina on 2d inst., and in Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas on 6th, 7th, and 8th inst., will be retained in every respect. From Arkansas and Texas we have no returns worth mentioning. It is probable, however, that in the former State, where the contest lay between Douglas and Breckinridge Democrats, the latter have the majority. Gen. Smith Coffee is the Democratic candidate for Governor. Eight Congressmen have been elected; but the Republican candidate, Poole, has polled a much larger vote than any Democrat. In Kentucky, in 1859, the vote for Democrat had a majority of 16,257 over M'Kee (Opposition); now it is reported that Ellis has a majority of 6,000. Complete returns from thirty counties show a Democratic gain of 7,000. In Kentucky a Judge of the Court of Appeals was elected. The successful candidate was General Joseph Lane, the candidate of the Breckinridge party, who beat the Breckinridge candidate by several thousand majority. The defeat of the Douglas party by the Breckinridge is due to the personal popularity of General Lane; but it shows that the Breckinridge is in opposition on the part of Kentucky to commit herself to the views of the extreme Southern leaders. Lane is for neither our intrigue as to secession. Four candidates for Governor were in the field, and several candidates for Congress and State officers. It seems probable, as the Presidential votes will be given, that Douglas will receive over 10,000 Democratic opponents, and that Bell (Opposition) has elected his candidate to Congress, for the last term, from the 1st Congressional district.

STATE CONVENTIONS.

The Breckinridge democracy of New York State met at Syracuse on 8th, and on 9th nominated the following ticket for State officers: For Lieutenant-Governor—H. R. Weed, of Jefferson. For Canal Commissioner—John Van Alstyne, of Onondaga; For State Prison Inspector—Robert Denniston, of Ulster. The substance of Resolutions on the Douglas Democrats was disconcordanced, and the Richmond platform adopted.

The Fusion Democratic Convention met at Cincinnati, and Presidential electors were appointed, with instructions to cast their vote of the State for candidate having the highest number of votes. The Hon. Thomas Ewing appeared to be the leading man in the Convention.

The New Jersey Republicans met at Trenton on 8th, appointed Presidential electors, affirmed the Chicago platform, and passed various resolutions of no public importance.

THE FILIBUSTER WALKER AGAIN.

The New Orleans Delta confirms the statement that General Walker left the island of Roatan on 30th ult., but denies that the cover of Central America was his immediate destination. When he found that he could get no possession of the British authorities, he very prudently determined to avoid becoming involved in any distinct with the Government of Honduras or of England, and so set sail for another island in the vicinity, whence, the Delta intimates, we have heard the last of him, except as he may be heard from by the Bay Islanders, or by the San Juan River. By this time, in all probability, he is in Nicaragua.

MORE METEORS.

Three distinct meteors have been seen above our horizon almost within as many weeks—and that is unusual in the age, when course was tracked over a distance of more than a thousand miles by the electric wire, and then subsequently in many of the Southern States; and the Boston Journal says that another has been seen to-night in this vicinity, making a small air, on Monday night.

THE SCIENTIFIC ASSOCIATION.

The newspaper reports of the publication of their opus last week to the publication of reports of the proceedings of the American Scientific Association, which body has been holding its fourteenth annual meeting at the metropolis of the Union. Now, this Association, as for the consideration of this body of various embryo schools of philosophy, such as ethnology, geology, physiology, natural history, and the recent meteoric phenomena. The proceedings of the Association were concluded on Wednesday, 8th inst. The next annual meeting will be held in Montreal, Canada, in April next.

MRS. DOUGLAS AT NEWPORT.

The Boston Journal's correspondent, Burleigh, writes as follows of Mr. Douglas's last report. Mrs. Douglas was dressed in the Di Vernon style—a jaunty school dress hat, draped like an inverted cup, with a short white ball hanging on the edge, gave her a youthful and school-girl appearance—with a dark riding habit, half skirt and half sack, a cross between a riding habit and a loose morning gown, and a pair of boots that would do for a young Miss who had thrown her brides aside for August, and had taken a run with the hounds in the mountains of Newport, rather than the less-excellent of the lady of the White House. Mrs. Douglas has been here at Newport she entertained her friends with the incidents of her journey over the Western prairies, and they were no comical enough. How at Council Bluffs she was not even found grace enough to get a bed, and must go and herself all about. How some ancient young men insisted on having a ball in her honor, and how she had to sit out mortuary lady by mistake, and made her such a complimentary address. How at Omaha, the city of Douglas-carried Rhode Island she must save cloaks, and how hard she found it to get them. How the Mormons have an delectable—and other matters. How she would not go to the opera because she had heard Alboni, and took on the crew that her husband was addressing, and then at the same time, with a woman's tact, would not intended for her own ears—all related with infinite relish and glowing good-humor, with almost childish grace."

A SUPPOSED MURDER.

Much excitement was caused last week by rumors of a supposed murder in Jersey City. On the night of 7th, on the morning of its two fishermen found, near the Hackensack River, a man lying on the road in a pool of blood, hair, and brains, while close by was a pool of blood, whence it was inferred that the man had been killed. Some of which was also covered with blood, giving rise to the supposition that the body had been dragged, cut to pieces and sunk in the ocean. Other indications that a murder had been committed were found in the shape of a dress spots that they heard the noise of a scuffle and the report of a pistol on the night.

A thorough examination was made by the authorities, and the effect was that the body was found to be that of the stewards of one of the boats, who procures wood and coal at points on the river. It is said that, in obtaining them together, smeared the mixture over a child in a boat—and so created a belief that an atrocious murder had been committed.

ABDUCTION OF A BOY.

The other day occurred the trial, on the decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts restoring Charles T. Hice, the minor child of Mr. Hice, of Hingham, to his mother, Elizabeth N. Thorndike, of Boston, to his father. The boy was taken away from his mother by his father, and sent to Nahant, kept by Mr. Estil. Two open carriages drove up to the residence of Mrs. Thorndike (Mr. Hice), and lines were alighted and entered. One of them seized the trucker boy, and carried him to another carriage, and drove off. The third rallied stole the boy, and thrusting him into one of the carriages, drove off with him. Mrs. Thorndike then took refuge in the teacher and followed. The first took upon a circuitous route to Nahant, where the boy handed delivered was offered for him. A man was sent to the Hingham jail for the part he took in the affair. Others have been sent in every direction to apprehend them. It is supposed they will flee with the boy to the Hice's country, probably by way of Canada.

THE PRESIDENT ON HIS WAY TO THE "GREAT HASTRICK."

President Buchanan, accompanied by Miss Lane, Secretary Toucey, and a large party of friends and officials, visited the Great Eastern in Annapolis Roads on Wednesday. The ship left for Newfoundland, on her return to New York, on Friday evening.

PERSONAL.

Monsieur De Lesseps arrived before the public again. He is about throwing a tongues bridge across the Niagara River, near the Falls, and has commenced the work. He is not in honor of the Prince of Wales.

Mr. Thackeray, the novelist, is in the family, were among the passengers by the Thomas Powell on Tuesday last. He is distinguished by a white hat, and is going to the Isle of Point, where they are spending a few days.

Friends of Governor Wise will be glad to hear of his health as such that it is extremely doubtful whether he again ventures out into the open air during the season. The venerable statesman is sojourning at Detroit.

Mr. Lincoln's counsel in the case before Judge Davis for non-attendance as juryman. The Governor had the usual excuse to offer—that he had business of importance to do.

We regret to learn that Dr. Carnochan is suffering very severely from suppurative inflammation of the right eye, and that serious apprehensions are entertained for the perpetual effusion of a late portion of the sight. We hope that the Doctor will take care of his head, which to this distinguished gentleman is of more value than to any other person, perhaps, to himself and the community.

We are gratifying to the friends of Rev. William S. Morrison, and lady, to learn that letters have been received announcing their safe arrival, on May 17, at their way to the Mission field in China. It will be remembered that Mr. and Mrs. Morrison sailed from in February last, in the ship N. B. Palmer. The agreeable society and courteous attentions of Captain Low and his amiable lady, had rendered the voyage thus far an exceedingly pleasant one to the missionary party.

Achmi-Beg Tatarabey, of Beyrout, has presented to the Sultan a very valuable horse fine Arabian stallion and two mares, whose arrived at Bostan is looked for daily.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE C

THE CITY OF MONTREAL, CANADA.

We publish herewith a general view of the city of Montreal, Canada, where the Prince of Wales will be received in a few days. Montreal, though not the capital of the Province, is its greatest and richest city: the grand reception of the royal visitor will take place there.

Montreal is over two hundred years old. When the French first ascended the St. Lawrence, they found a ruined Indian settlement called Hochelaga, on the island of Montreal; but they did not think much of the site, and devoted their chief attention to building up a town at Quebec. It was not till 1641 that Monsieur de Montmagny, the successor of Champlain, aided by the Jesuits, staked out an inclosure and erected a French fort on the site of the present city of Montreal.

The idea of the first settlers of Montreal was religious, not commercial. A society of thirty-five pious Catholics, among whom certain Jesuits held the predominance, obtained a concession of the island from the King of France, and proposed to convert it into an asylum for the Indians and the poor. Every one was to be received there on a footing of equality, and enabled to earn his living by his labor; the only condition required of new-comers was that they should be Roman Catholics. After sixteen years' trial of the experiment, the Society abandoned it in despair — very few Indians or Europeans having accepted their terms and settled. The island was ceded to the Seminary of Montreal, then as now the most powerful corporation in that section of country. The Seminary held the island for thirty-five years; then, failing, as their predecessors had done, they re-ceded it to the King of France, reserving, however, in their possession the choicest sites and richest valleys.

During the next half century Montreal was the scene of many Indian outrages and hard-fought fights. In those days the Five Nations were powerful, and could bring imposing armies into the field. It was as much as the French could do to keep a footing on the island, and to repel the savages who every few years swooped down upon it with sword and torch. In 1721, the Chevalier de Callières built "a poor palisade with bastions, and a little redoubt on a small eminence." In 1740 it was surrounded by a wall, which long ago disappeared. — Fifteen to twenty years later we hear of it as a straggling town, stretching for a mile along the river bank; mostly owned by religious bodies—the Seminary, the Fathers of St. Sulpice the Knights Hospitallers, and various convents of nuns; carrying on a brisk trade in furs and other indigenous produce with the Indians in June and July; and boasting two good platform bat eries by way of defense. A wag who traveled at the time says that Montreal deserves to be remembered as the place where the worst rum in the world is sold. In every respect, except so far as the Indian trade was concerned, Montreal took rank below Quebec.

In the war which terminated in the conquest of Canada by the British, Montreal took a secondary part. Quebec, Niagara, and Ticonderoga had fallen into the hands of the English before Montreal was attacked; M. de Montcalm was dead; the Franco-Canadian army was demoralized; the invaders were flushed with victory, and strong in numbers; so that altogether, when the British General landed his army on the island, there was no decent pretext for resistance, and the city passed out of the hands of the French without a struggle in 1760.

Just fifteen years afterward — during which it may be presumed that Montreal had not greatly prospered, as we learn that its fortifications were in decay, and its population not over two or three thousand— Ethan Allen made a wild attempt to seize the place, was captured, and sent in irons to England. Montgomery was more successful. After reducing St. Johns, he entered Montreal in November, 1775, and took prisoners General Prescott and the garrison. That winter Montreal was held by the American forces, and, after the unsuccessful attack upon Quebec, was governed by the famous Arnold. Want of support compelled this General to evacuate the place in June, 1776; since which time it has always remained in the possession of the British.

During the last war an imposing expedition against Montreal was fitted out on the upper lakes, and actually began to sail down the river. But it was unfortunate in every respect; the officers quarreled with each other; the chief was unfit for the command; the army was ill-equipped; the season was late; so, after a skirmish by the way, the expedition returned, having effected nothing.

As a commercial city Montreal has won a high position. It is beyond all question the first city in British North America. The people seem to have an energy which reminds one of the United States. — Happily situate, at the head of ocean navigation, and at the mouth of the Ottawa and Upper St. Lawrence, it has naturally become a general dépôt for Canadian produce. The Grank Trunk Railway will doubtless increase its importance, and assist

A RIDE FOR A DAY.

THE ROMANCE OF A LIFE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

I.

I HAD heard and read frequently of the exhilarating sensations of horse exercise. My fit low-standard was full of stories of the hunting-field and the race-course. Wherever, indeed, a horse figured in a narrative there was an almost certainty of meeting some incident to stir the blood and warm up enthusiasm; and even the passing glimpses one caught of sporting prints in shop-windows were all suggestive of the pleasure imparted by a noble and chivalrous pastime.

I never closed my eyes all night, revolving such thoughts in my head. I had so worked up my enthusiasm that I felt like one who is about to cross the frontier of some new land where people, language, ways, and habits are all unknown to him. "By this hour to-morrow night," thought I, "I shall be in the land of strangers, who have never seen so much as heard of me before. There, will invade no traditions of the scoffs and gibes I have so long endured; none will have received the disparaging estimate of my abilities, which my class-fellows love to propagate; I shall simply be the traveler who arrived at nightfall and took on a re-creation pulfrey—a stranger, sad-looking, but gentle withal, of courteous address, blandly demanding lodging for the night. 'Look to my fellow hostler,' shall I say, as I enter the honey-suckle-covered porch of the 'Golden Blondel,' I will call him—Blondel is accustomed to kindly usage." With what quiet dignity, the repose of a consciousness, do I follow the lively waiter as he shows me to my room! It is humble, but neat and orderly. I am contented. I tell him no. I am rated above the luxury; quick as a gilded and glittering existence. I am in search of repose and solitude. I order my tea, and if I ask the name of the village, I only care to show by my inattention that I have not heard the answer, nor do I care for it.

Now I shall be left alone, for one they are canvassing me in the bar, and what they think of me in the stable. I am, doubtless, a sort of a youth heart-broken by infidelity in love; or moyn hap, a dreadful criminal. I almost think I liked this last. At all events, the interest was a pleasure; not to say that there is to men who are not constitutionally courageous an intense pleasure in being able to excite terror in others.

I sit at my tea with the window open, the moonlight beams across the floor, and I have extinguished the candles, the better to drink in its mild radiance. I know that all this puzzles the girl, who has just forced on the kettle, and I am delighted at being such mystery to every one.

What a mystery must my volume of Uhland have been to them, for I see they have been turning over the pages while I was absent in the stable. Perhaps they are interested to know who and what I am, whence I have come, and whither I am going; and now comes in the landlord on a tiptoe walk, as he can't endure it any longer, and is resolved to find out where, at least, I am bound for. Cunning dog, he tells me that if I am going to the Seven Churches a short road lies through Sir Somebody's demesne, and that I should do well to send my card with compliments, and the permission will be promptly accorded me. I resist haughtily, and reply that I only desire a name on those of my own acquaintance, and that I never so much as heard of his baronet before. Is he not overcome with shame? Does he not shrink under the half severity of my rebuke? And now, once more alone, I revel in the immeasurable freedom of a whole world before me. And what a book is this same world! Not like the novels and romances which deceive it, and whose contraptions you can guess ere you have finished the first chapter—w'ill knowing how Frederick was misled at his birth, and how miserably were the last hours of that wretch Conrad. No; the world's tales were full of surprises and unexpected turns, and so far from leading back to the main road, went boldly away from it forever. To track out these meanderings, see where they led to, and how they lost themselves, would give an interest to existence far higher than any ordinary round offers. I am startled suddenly from my reverie. I hear a horse's feet on the silent street. I look out—day is just breaking—and perceive Blondel at the door; my hour of adventure has struck, and noiselessly descending the stairs, I issue forth.

"He is a trifle tender on the fore feet, your honor," said Tim, as I mounted, "but when you get him off the stones on a nice piece of soft road, he'll go like a four-year old."

"But he is young, Tim, isn't he?" asked I, as I touched him with my half-crown.

"Well, not to tell your honor a lie, he is not," said Tim, with the energy of a man whose veracity had cost him something little less than a spasm.

"How old would you call him, then?" asked I, in that affected ease that seemed to say, "Not that it matters to me if he were Methuselah."

"I couldn't come to his age exactly, your honor," replied he, "but I remember seeing him, fifteen years ago, dancing a hornpipe, more by token for his own beauty; it was at Cooke's Circus in Abbey Street, and there wasn't a hair's difference between him now and then, except, perhaps, that he is not as white in the face, where you just see the mark a little darker now, that's all."

"But that is a star, plain enough," said I, half vexed.

"Well, it is, and it is not," muttered Tim, doggedly, for he was not quite satisfied with my rights to disagree with him.

"He's gentle, at all events?" said I, more confidently.

"He's a lamb, that's what he is!" replied he. "If you were to see him in the field with the cows run over his back, when he's wounded in Timour the Tartar, you wouldn't believe he was a livin' baste."

"Poor fellow!" said I, caressing him. He turned his mild eye upon me, and we were friends from that hour.

What a glorious morning it was, as I gained the outskirts of the city, and entered one of those shady alleys that lead to the first slopes of the mountains! The birds were just opening their morning hymn, and the fresh, still odor of the night dew was yet in a thousand delicious perfumes. The road on either side of me was one succession of gardens, villas, and ornamental cottages, whose grounds were laid out in the perfection of landscape gardening. There were but few people abroad as yet, for it was early hour, and in the smokeless chimneys and cloud-shutters I could read that all slept—kept in that luxurious repose which is morning, and seems to revel in the sense of her unqualified loveliness. "Ah, Pets," said I to myself, "thou hast chosen the wisest part; then will see the world after this own guise, and not as others see it." Here a reader can stop a while to look at a picture-gallery the slightest chan.e of place, a move to the left or right, a chance approach or retreat, and you have not served a long confusion of color and gloss a rich and beautiful picture? So it is in the actual world, and just as much depends on the point from which objects are viewed. Do not be discouraged, then, by the dark aspect of events. It may be that by the slightest change in side or in bias, some unlooked-for sunlight shall slant down and light up all the scene. Thus musing, I gained a little grassy slope, where the road took sudden, and gently touching Blondel with my heel he broke out into a delightful canter, and as I kept skimming the motion, it seemed a perfect ecstasy to sit there floating at will through the thin air, with the panorama of wood, water, and mountain around me.

Emerging at length from the thickly wooded road, I found myself on the Three Rock Mountain, and in my slackened speed had full time to gaze upon the bay beneath me, broken with many a picturesque promontory, and dotted by the broad bluff of Howth, and the more distant Lambay. No, it is not finer than Naples, I did not say it was; but I will say it is very well, and I thought it could not be surpassed. Indeed I went further, and in my enthusiasm defied Naples in this fashion:

Though no volcano's lurid light
Over thy blue sea steals along,
Nor fiery heights the sun-set smite
With radiance of his simple song—

Though neat cottages, a laborer's daughters
With tinkling lute thy echoes wake,
Mingling their voices with the waters,
As 'neath the prow the ripples break;

Although no cliffs with myrtle crown'd,
Rich-cest to thy sea-side come,
Nor olives, bending to the ground,
Relieve the laurel's darker green;

Yet—yet—

Ah, there was the difficulty—I had begun with the plaintiff, and I really hadn't a word to say for the defendant—not a line that could set the Pigeon House and the Baillie Light, Dalkey Island and Killiney! What a dolt! But, to be sure, I had my remedy in the law of my wind, and the air of the mountain was brisk enough almost to be sharp; and so, writing comparisons across, I set forward in high spirits.

As I rode into Enniskerry to breakfast I had the satisfaction of overhearing several very flattering comments upon Blondel, which rather consoled me for some less laudatory remarks upon my own inexperience. "I'll be bound he was possibly be a more ignorant swesman than to say a man rides like a tailor? Why, of all trades, who so constantly astride—excepting only a tailor? and yet he is the especial mark of this impertinence.

I strolled briskly on after breakfast, and soon found myself in the deep shady woods that lead to the Dargle. Delicious grove made for lovers, arbors sacred to pienics, how I enjoyed spots to dally with Amaryllis or a lobster salad, and to drink out of cocoa-nut cups of champagne. In good truth, I hurried through the picturesque demesne, associated as it was with a thousand little recollections of city junketings, and rode on for the Glen of the Downs. Blondel and I had now established a most admirable understanding with each other. It was a sort of reciprocity treaty, by which I bound myself never to control him, he to have concession not to unseat me. He gave the initiative to the system by setting off at his pleasant little rocking canter whenever he chanced upon a bit of favorable ground, and invariably pulled up when the road was stony or uneven; thus showing me that he was a horse with what Lord Brougham would call "a wise discretion." In like manner would he halt to pluck any stray wisp of wild grass that grew along the hedge sides, and occasionally shake his thirst at convenient streamlets. If I dismounted to walk at his side he moved along unheld, his head almost touching my elbow, and his plaintive blue eye mildly beaming on me with an expression that almost spoke—nay, it did speak. I'm sure I felt it, as though I could swear to it, whispering, "Yes, Potts, two more friendless creatures than ourselves are not to be found. The world wants not either of us; not that we abuse it, despise it, or treat it ungenerously—rather the reverse, we endure favorably, and, if need would, occasion serving, befriend it; but we are not, so to say, at its." There must be few and there, a man or a horse that would understand or appreciate us, but they stand alone—they are not belonging to classes. They are, like ourselves, exceptional." If his expression said this much, there was much unspoken melancholy in his sad glance ance—that which seemed to say, "What a deal of sorrow could I reveal if I might—what injuries, what wrong, what cruel misconception of my nature and disposition, what mistaken notions of my character and intentions! What pretentious stupidity, too, have I seen preferred before me—nay, I'll not say before, but even cost a or more silky forelock—" "Ah, Blondel, take courage; men are just as ungenerous, just as erring!" I'll not add that I have had my triumphs too," would be seen to say, as, cocking his ears, and arching his neck a more proud toss of the head, his tail would describe an arch like a waterfall; "no salmon-colored silk stockings danced attendance on my track; I was ever ridden in the Haute Ecole by Monsieur L'Etrier himself, the stately gentleman in jack-boots and snow-white cravat, who twice five minutes no persuasive braves could ever prolong. And though at times I would take off his hat whereever his is seen to worship, I used it as though it were my own, bowing gracefully over it, nothing rude in the gesture, for I felt all the dignity of the horse in my heart. And now it is all past and over; no more chalked saddles; no more cocked hats; never again am I to be told that Peri of Paradise hanging with disheveled hair over the back of that stern monster in the leopard skin, and shall my car be slandered with that welcome 'Here we are!' as those emblems of drollery come bounding over each other into the ring? I thought—nay, I was certain at times—that I could read in his thoughtful face the painful sorrows of one who had outlived popularity, and who had survived to see himself supplanted and dethroned; some docile Hanoverian, some frisky bark, perhaps, having carried away the suffrages of that ever fickle public.

I am willing to confess it was on this reading of my horse and his character that I attached myself so strongly to him. There are no two destinies which seem to do so well together as that of him who is beaten down by sheer distrust of himself, and that of the man who has been seized upon as the last resource of a party. Even though the one is going out of office, and the other is going out of it, if they meet on the threshold they stop to form a friendship. Though Blondel was not a man, he supplied to my friendlessness the place of one.

The inn was near its setting as I rode down the little hill into the village of Ashford, a picturesque little spot in the midst of mountains, and with a bright, clear stream bounding through it as fearlessly as though in all the liberty of open country. I tried to make my entrance what stage people call effective. I threw myself, albeit a little jaded, into an attitude of easy indifference, crossed my hat a little to one side, and suffered the sprig of laburnum with which I had adorned it to droop in graceful guise over my shoulder. The villagers stared, some saluted me, and, taken perhaps by the cool acquiescence of my manner as I received the courtesy, were well disposed to believe me of some note. Even these small tributes, administered to the world's vanity, I duly elevated and cheered me; and I felt that I was not—taking sunset, village, the mountains, the tumbling rivulet, and my own figure into account—I was not, I say, very unlike the sort of "get up" with which many a thrilling story in those volumes I had read so much so, that it was not without an effort I could refrain from addressing one of the loiterers in the street with, "Last from the mutiny, which is the best hostel here?"

Even, however, without this inquiry I rode into the little stable-yard of the Lamb, and dismounted. I gave up my horse, and walked into the inn. I was now how others felt—I—I greatly doubt if they will have the honesty to tell—but for myself I am free to confess that I never entered a room for the first without a most uncomfortable conflict within—a struggle made up of two very antagonistic impulses—the wish to attract something important, and a lively terror lest the pretense should turn out to be costly. This moved and swayed by opposing motives, I sought a compromise by assuming that I was incog., for the present a nobody, and to be treated without any special distinction, and to whom the acme of respect would be a seeming indifference.

"What sort of village called?" said I, carelessly, to the waiter, as he laid the cloth for dinner.

"Ashford, your honor. 'Tis down in all the books."

"Very like," said I, in the same careless tone. "Is it noted for any thing; or is there any thing remarkable in the neighborhood?"

"Indeed there is, Sir, and plenty. There's Glenmalure and the Devil's Glen; and there's Mr. Snow Malone's place, that every body goes to see; and there's the fishing of Doyle's River —trout, eight, nine, maybe twelve, pounds' weight; and there's Mr. Reeves's cottage—a fairies cottage belike—at Kinmacwood, but to be sure, they must be an order for that."

"Oh, I never give myself such trouble," said I indolently. "Who have you got in the house at present?"

"There's young Lord Keldrum, Sir, and two more with him, for the fishing; and the next room to you here, there's Father Dyke, from Inistioge, and he's going, by the same token, to ride with him the end to-day."

"Don't mention to his lordship that I am here," said I, hastily. "I desire to be quite unknown down here."

The waiter pondered the most implicit obedience to my commands, without ever vouchsafing any misgivings as to the possibility of his disclosing what he did not know.

To his question as to my dinner I carelessly said, as though I were in a West-End club, "Never mind soup—a little fish—a cutlet and something. Or order it yourself—I am indifferent."

The waiter had scarcely left the room when I was startled by the sound of voices, so close to me as to seem at my side. They came from a little wooden balcony to the adjoining room, which, by the unanimous bow-window, I recognized to be the state apartment of the inn, and which the possession of Lord Keldrum and his party. They were talking away in that gay, rattling, discursive fashion very young men do among each other, and discussed fishing-flies, size of fish, and tackle, with occasional divergence into remarks on the neighborhood—the gentleman's scenery—and the landlady's beauty.

"By-the-way, Kel," cried one, "it was in your visit to the bar that you met your priest, wasn't it?"

"Yes; I offered him a cigar, and we began to chat together, and so I asked him to dine with us here."

"And he refused?"

"Yes; I am not sure since changed his mind, and sent me a message to say he'll be with us at eight."

"I should like to see your father's face, Kel, when he heard of your entertaining the Reverend Father Dyke at dinner."

"Well, I suppose he would say it was carrying conciliation a little too far; but as the adage says, 'A la guerre—'"

At this moment another burst in among them, calling out, "You'd never guess who's just arrived here, in strict incog., and having bribed like a waiter, to silence. Burgoyne!"

"Not Jack Burgoyne?"

"Jack himself. I had the portrait so correctly drawn by the waiter that there's no mistaking him. He has the long hair, green complexion, sheepish look, all perfect; he came on a hack—a little cream-colored pad he got at Dycer's—and finished the ride unknown."

"What can he be up to now? Some sly dodge, without doubt."

"I think not, if," said his lordship. "Courteney has got two three-year olds down here at his uncle's, one of them under heavy engagements for the spring meeting. Master Jack has taken a run down to have a look at them."

"By Jove, Kel, you're right! He's always wide awake; and that stupid, leaden-eyed look he has has done him good service in the world."

"I say, old Oxley, shall we dash in and unearth him, and let him know that we know nothing of his being here at all?"

"What does Hammond say?" asked the other.

"I'd say leave him to himself," replied a deep voice. "You can't go and see him without asking him to dinner; and he'll think into an after, do what we will."

"Not exactly if we don't play," said Oxley.

"Wouldn't he, though? Why, he'd screw a bet out of a bishop."

"I'd do it, Kel, as Tomkinson did," said his lordship; "he had him down at his lodge in Scotland, and bet him fifty pounds that he couldn't ride a mule without a saddle. Jack booked the bet and won it, and Tomkinson thanked the company."

"What a devil of a villain my counterpart must be!" said I, and I stared in the glass to see if I could discover the sheepishness that Jack's portrait was to possess, as curious closely, "thought I," and try if I can detect that marvelous simplicity that accounts—" Nothing of the kind; I was pale, to be sure, and my hair a light brown, but so was Shelley's; indeed, there was a wild, poetic character in my face that I was startled at, and I could recognize many things in our natures that seemed to correspond. It was the poetic development in my nature that shrunk from all the petty cares of everyday life which vulgar people set down as simplicity; and thus,

"The soaring thoughts that ennobled the stars Caused ignominies to them."

As I uttered the consolatory lines, I felt two hands firmly pressed over my eyes, while a friendly voice cried out, "I defy you, old fellow! run fairly to earth!" "Ask him if he knows you," whispered another, but in a voice I could catch.

"Who am I, Jack?" cried the first speaker. "Situated as I now am, I am utterly unable to pronounce; but of one thing I am assured—I am perfectly certain I am not called Jack."

The slow and measured intonation of my voice seemed to electrify them, for my captor relinquished his hold and fell back, while the two others, after a few seconds of blank surprise, burst into a roar of laughter, a sentiment which the other could not resist from, while he struggled to master some words of apology.

"Perhaps I can explain your mistake, gentlemen," said I, blandly; "I am supposed to be extremely like the Prince of Salms Hokinstrahlen—"

"No, no!" burst in Lord Keldrum, whose voice I recognized, "we never saw the prince. It was by the blunder of the waiter that we fell into this embarrassment; we fancied you were—"

"Mr. Burgoyne," chimed I in.

"Exactly, Jack Burgoyne; but you're not a bit like him."

"Strange, then; but I'm constantly mistaken for him, and when in London, I'm actually persecuted by people calling out, 'When did you come up, Jack?' 'Where do you hang out?' 'How have you been?' 'Dine with me to-day—to-morrow—Saturday?' and so on; and although, as I have remarked, these are only so many embarrassments for me, they all show how popular must be my prototype." I had purposely made this speech of mine a little long, for I saw by the disconcerted looks of the party that they did not see how to wind up "the situation," and, like all awkward men, I grow garrulous where I ought to have been silent. While I thus rambled on Lord Keldrum had exchanged a word or two, scrawled more, with one of his friends, and as I finished he turned toward me, and with an air of much courtesy said,

"We owe you every apology for this intrusion, and hope you will pardon it; there is, however, but one way in which we can certainly feel assured that we have your forgiveness, that is, by your joining us at dinner. I see that your own is in preparation, so pray let me countermand it, and say that you are our guest."

"Lord Keldrum," said one of the party, presenting the card, "my name is Edmonstone, and this is Captain Oxley, Colstream Guards."

I saw that this move required an exchange of ratifications, and so I bowed and said, "Algernon Sydney Potts."

"There are Staffordshire Potteses?"

"No relation," said I, stiffly, for it was Hammond made the remark, and there was about him a certain sneering manner that I could not abide.

"Well, Mr. Potts, it is agreed," said Lord Keldrum, with his peculiar urbanity, "we will see you at eight. I need not say there's no dressing. You'll find us in this fishing costume you see now."

I trust my reader, who has dined out any day he pleased and in any society he has liked these years past, will see how as if I do not enter into any detailed account of my reasons for accepting this invitation. Enough if I freely own that to me, A. S. Potts, such an unexpected honor was about the same surprise as if I had been announced governor of a colony or bishop in a new settlement.

"At eight sharp, Mr. Potts."

"The next table down the passage."

"And just as you are, remember!" were the three parting admonitions; and they left me.

MRS. HADDOCK'S HAIR-PINS.

CHAPTER I.

THE night-mail lumbering through the heavy snow one bitterly December night, some forty years ago, bore a shivering freight of liberhoused passengers on their comfortless journey across the barren moors of Derbyshire, and among them Mrs. Gurdlestone's maid, Hester Burgess, in the rumble. Hester Burgess had a dreary and forlorn prospect before her when she set out to travel two hundred miles to seek a home with strangers.

In these days waiters were really waiters, and no mistake about them. The coldest, most biting of December winds kept company with the comminated itself down the travelers' necks, got under their cloaks, sought out the weakest points in their overalls, and nipped, and attacked them savagely, while a heavy snow fell upon their backs and soaked them through. Perhaps the greatest sufferer was these discomforts was the young woman Hester, who, although kindly wrapped up in the guard's extra coat, shivered with cold, and was very miserable; and as it was that at a baiting-place some thirty miles off her destination the coachman descended from his box and opened the coach-door beggar permission of a neatly tucked-up bundle of wrappers therein reclining to admit the poor frozen maid. A responsive grunt being taken for acquiescence, Hester was admitted accordingly, and fell asleep in the corner.

She awoke with a start just before daybreak, to find that the bundle of wrappers had taken the form of a woman—a very ugly one—was close to her, with a pair of cold gray eyes fixed searchingly upon her.

Oh, let me alone!" cried.

"What makes you call out in your sleep?" the other traveler asked, sharply. "What makes you cry out 'Murder!' in your sleep?"

"I didn't know I did, Sir."

"You did, and woke me. Don't do so again."

The ugly face retreating, the gray eyes closing, the wrappers readjusted, all became quiet, as before; but Hester, sleeping, she scarce knew why, kept a watch upon her companion, and, hardly breathing or moving a limb, sat bolt upright throughout the rest of the night.

CHAPTER II.

"HERE 's the Pollards!" said the guard, opening the door about an hour after daybreak. "And here 's the carriage, Sir!"

Much to Hester's surprise, her traveling companion took his place in the hooded carriage at the corner of the road. The driver back her sat beside him on the box, and as they drove along informed her that the gentleman inside was Mr. Silas Gurdlestone—Mr. Ralph, the Master's brother; that Mr. Ralph, who lay dangerously ill, had sent for him, wishing to make an end to a sort of coolness which had existed between them ever since he, Mr. Ralph, was married to his good lady, on whom, they did say, Mr. Silas was himself, before her marriage, a little sweet. Rogers (he was the driver) recollected when the master was about to be married—a time when there was a power of surmise and conjecture as to how Mr. Silas would like it; how, on the bridal morning, directly after leaving the church, he had disappeared, and how their next heard from him in some foreign country, where he said he intended to pass the remainder of his life. "Mr. Silas, Sir," says Silas, Rogers said, wagging his noddle solemnly, "very, very strange."

The bridal place upon earth must surely have been the Pollards. It was a bare, ugly, red-brick building, having, on the one hand a newly erected garden, on the other, a large stagnant ditch, upon the banks of which, and inclining over the water, grew in fantastic confusion many-trunked pollards, from which the house derived its name. This dwelling had long been the property of Mrs. Gurdlestone's family; but since her father's death had until lately remained untenanted. It was with the intention of renovating it and making it his country residence that Mr. Ralph had now come down with his wife and her sister, but he falling ill immediately upon his arrival the repairs had improvements had been left to the workmen's eyes. You may be sure the town-servants were all in a state of bustle and excitement. Why, such a sight to see and be frightened at, in such luminous peril of falling off the top part of that gentleman's hair-dressing, as Mr. Silas's periwig! As for Hester, her recent grief, the breaking up of a happy home, her present friendless condition—all swept up her mind, and, with a sense of melancholy of the place, combined to render her life a very sad and weary one. But there was soon other cause for sadness.

Somehow Mr. Ralph grew worse and worse in spite of doctors and drugs, and Hester, as his wife watched by his bedside; Mr. Silas, too, was unremitting in his care for and attention to his brother, and, indeed, in administering to the wellcises to him. One night there was a slight change for the better, and Mr. Silas had persuaded Mrs. Gurdlestone to go and get a little rest, repose while he took her place in the sick room. She, poor thing, fagged and jaded by long watching, with a little persuasion, consented; and when all the household retired to their respective chambers, except the watcher. Thus, for a while, the time passed silently, and then there was a long, dry, stillness of the sleeping house a loud continuous knocking at Mrs. Gurdlestone's door, and Hester, pale and anxious, answered to the summons, and found Mr. Silas, trembling and violently excited, who sent in a hurried message:

"He's gone!—dead—of a sudden! I thought I heard his breath stop, and drew the curtain."

The dismal words wounded on the ear.

It was too true: he was indeed dead—his hands twisted in the bed-clothes, his eyes wide open, a strange look of dread and horror in them, and quite cold!

Then the sleepers, awakened by the unwonted bustle, pressing screams, came crowding, half dressed, to the spot, their white faces looking horrible in the flaring candlelight. The nearest doctor was summoned, and all sorts of remedies suggested—but in vain. Hester, while attending her fainting mistress, refused to pick up something lying by the dead man's bed.

"What is it?" Mr. Silas said, quietly, taking the object from her fingers.

It was but a straightened hair-pin. He pinched her slightly in pulling it away, and must have scratched himself with it, for there was a mark of blood upon her hand.

CHAPTER III.

A GREATER gloom than ever fell upon the house after the master's death. The servants one by one gave warning, and left; and so Hester at last was the only one of the London establishment.

It was dull indeed! The stagnant pool and neglected garden were at any time but dreary objects for contemplation. The awkward, ill-educated country servants afforded but indifferent companionship for Hester, who had been brought up with no idea of getting on in the world by any but such society, and so grew to be very sad and silent and drop-down.

Mrs. Gurdlestone's sister (Miss Ethel) had permanently taken up her abode at the Pollards, and Mr. Silas still continued to visit on the matters of business referring to the late Mr. Ralph, although he had on several occasions fixed a day for his departure. As well as Hester could learn from scraps of conversation up stairs, Miss Ethel disliked him very much, and wished her sister to give him a hint that his presence there was not needed. Whatever may have been Mrs. Gurdlestone's wishes upon the subject, she was too considerate of the feelings of others, or too much wrapped up in her great grief, to be otherwise than passive, and Silas went and came as he pleased.

One night, about a month after the master's death, Hester Burgess sat alone by the fast-dying fire in the servants' room, for the cook had gone to watch until her mistress summoned her to attend her toilet on retiring to rest; and this night she was so much later than usual that all the other servants had been in bed full half an hour. The great clock upon the stairs ticked loudly, and the wind moaned and rustled among the evergreens outside the window like the stealthy whispering of thieves; all else was still as the grave. And as Hester was sitting anxiously watching and expressing sense of loneliness came over her; and with a start she remembered to get up and go to her mistress's room. Mrs. Gurdlestone and Miss Ethel were in the former's bedroom, which was divided from the staircase by a long, dark ante-chamber. The door leading into Mrs. Gurdlestone's room, and that upon the stairs, were both ajar, and Hester entering noiselessly at one would have knocked at the other, had she not perceived a dark figure, with its back toward her, standing between her and the light. She stopped involuntarily, held her breath, and listened.

Miss Ethel spoke: "But, Mary, how can you be so weak—so blind as to—"

"What would you have me do?" the other lady said, complainingly. "I'm sure I do not keep him here. I wish he'd go if he offends you. But then he has been so kind and so attentive; and he is my dear husband's brother!"

"I tell you, Mary, I hate him! And mark my words, if he is not some day more nearly related to you than he is now."

"Ethel!"

"He will, Mary, though I pray God I may not live to see it!"

There was a rustling sound, as though one of the ladies had risen. A figure passed Hester quickly in the dark; and before she had time to speak or move the bedroom door opened wide, and Miss Ethel came out with a light.

"What are you doing here?" she inquired, sharply.

"I came to see if I was wanted," the servant stammered out with a trembling look Miss Ethel swept out of the room.

Mrs. Gurdlestone had always been in delicate health, and since her husband's death had almost entirely kept her own room, where Miss Ethel was in constant attendance upon her. Mr. Silas, however, frequently came in to consult her upon business matters, or to chat away an hour. Now it was Miss Ethel who chose to be ill; she was so until the day after that on which Hester had heard the rejected conversation that she was obliged to keep her bed, and the doctor was summoned. Mrs. Gurdlestone was called in to see her. Mr. Silas said that it was a trifling cold she had taken.

She had been ill almost three days when the door for calling in one evening, it came on to rain heavily, and the wind to blow. Throughout the night the rain poured down in torrents, and continued so long that Mr. Adams (that was the doctor's name) considered it a favorable persuasion, to accept the shelter of the Pollards' for the night, for he lived some miles off, and must cross a wild and open country to get to his own dwelling. It was a most fortunate that he did remain. During the evening Miss Ethel was much worse, and twice he went up and saw her. It was determined that the gentlemen should sit up all night, and that Hester should watch with the invalid and administer her medicine.

Hester took her place in an arm-chair by the fire with a book, which she read before her, so that she could tell the time at which the medicine should be administered. When the cook brought up her supper at ten o'clock Hester left the gentlemen were smoking and driving in the dining-room.

"I don't think the doctor fancies there's much danger," cook said, "for he's so merry like, and has been singing a song."

"I hope, whispered Hester, "he will not drink too much."

"Lor' bless you, child! Here, take your supper, and here's a glass of wine Mr. Silas has sent you to give you strength. Do you mind sitting up alone?"

"Not much. Good-night."

"Good-night."

When Hester had finished her supper she mixed another dose for the sick lady, and resumed her book.

She must have been asleep for hours. The candle had burned low in the socket; a streak of daylight was stealing in between the heavy window-curtains, and the fire was out. She woke up with a start, cold and frightened. The room was very still, very still. She listened for the sleeper's breathing, and heard only her own heart throbbing and a faint buzzing in her ears. To stare forward, to draw the window-curtain, and to turn toward the bed, was the work of a moment. It required no such effort to see the white face and wide-open eyes could only be those of the dead.

CHAPTER IV.

THE girl's screams awoke the doctor and Mr. Silas, who came hurrying up stairs and rushed into the room. Long afterward Hester recollected how unnerved Mr. Adams stood by the bed—how his hands shook, and how unintelligibly he spoke—how calm and collected Mr. Silas was throughout the scene. Long afterward she recollected, too, among all the dreadful details belonging to the death and funeral, that she picked up in the ashes of the fire a small hair-pin, which had been thrown into the fire, but not consumed. The circumstance was in itself so trivial that, had it not in some sort connected this death with that of the former one, she would not have given it a second thought. As it was, her thoughts dwelt upon it, she scarce knew why.

For many weeks after the funeral the whole house was plunged in gloom and darkness. The servants were again changed, excepting Hester, who would have gone also, but not her mistress implored her to remain. The sick lady seemed to droop more and more. She never left her room; she never read nor worked; she hardly ever spoke, except sometimes with Mr. Silas about legal business, of which there appeared to Hester's mean comprehension to be a most complicated account for her mistress, for whom she had from the first entertained a great regard; and, indeed, ever-suffering, gentle, uncomplaining, who could help but love her?

The sick lady wasted away slowly. The spring ripened into summer, and still she grew no better; the summer began to wane, the days to shorten, the dead leaves fell and drifted with a ghostly music, as the sick lady and her attendant sat silently in the twilight as those calm autumn evenings do word the end.

Winter was coming round again, and grew more worse. About November she took to her bed. Hester was in constant attendance upon her; indeed, she almost forbade at her absence. For hours she would sit holding the faithful girl's hand in hers, and sometimes she would form plans of what they would do next year, when she was better. It was determined that, as soon as she was well enough to go out, she should go to London, and change of air would no doubt lead to her perfect recovery.

Still she sank, slowly but surely. Then Hester began to fancy that there was a change in the expression of her face: a sort of dread and fear seemed settling upon it. Now, one evening, when Hester was leaving the room to go to bed (she slept in an adjoining apartment), her mistress called her back.

"Hester," she said, "you have been a very good girl, very kind and patient with me, and you shall not be forgotten when I die."

"Dear mistress, do not speak so."

"Yes, Hester, I am sure I shall go before long. But you will not be left all my time is over? With you I feel safe."

"And safe, ma'am?"

"Hush, Hester!" the sick lady said, half raising herself in the bed, and drawing the girl closer to her. "I am afraid of—Mr. Silas."

Hester felt instinctively whom she meant. The mistress read her own terror in the servant's face; and as they sat silently clasped in each other's arms, all of a sudden they both became conscious of another's presence in the room. A dusky form flitted across the light; a hand held up a handkerchief, between the drawn curtains at the bottom of the bed; then a human head, hollow-cheeked and red-balls, peered in upon the affrighted women, with a wolfish glare half-hidden in its widespread eyes.

"How is the patient?" asked Mr. Silas, with a smile.

CHAPTER V.

THE same eyes watched her as, crossing the threshold of her own room, Hester locked back at Silas's receding figure on the stairs. Hester sat out the night, restlessly tossing in an uneasy wakefulness or troubled slumber, the same head and hand were ever present to her mental vision. How could she lie there? A hundred times she fancied that there was some one handling the lock of the door. Then she was sure that she heard a noise in her mistress's room. Should she go to her? No. All was again quiet; and again she closed her eyes. So she passed the weary hours of daylight, when fatigue and anxiety overcame her, and she slept. But not for long. Her mistress's voice was first calling loudly, but clearly, distinct, and close to her—

"Hester!"

She awoke at the sound, and sat up to listen. All was still: it must have been a dream. Again she lay down, and again a whisper filled the room—

"Hester!"

She took the curtain of the bed on one side. No, there was no one but herself present. Without another thought she rushed into her mistress's room and threw herself upon the bed, clasped the cold face in her hands, clasped the cold form to her breast, sobbing and moaning distractedly—and so Mr. Silas found whom she had lost. There was the old frightened look upon the dead lady's face—the look which the sudden face had worn—the same which Hester remembered on the face of Mr. Ralph; and there was upon the bosom of the dead woman the same mark, like the prick of a pin, just over the heart.

The house was soon alarmed, and the servants came crowding in, as they had done before on a similar occasion; but Hester—terrified, stupefied, and giddy with the horrible thoughts which possessed her—drew away from them all, and, in a mood any further questions, sought refuge in the garden. She walked to the edge of the stagnant pool, at the back of the house, and sat down in a little ruined arbor, to think what she should do. She had not lost sight of her whom she was trying right before her on the path, as ther straightened hair-pin!

She stooped to raise it, trembling as she did so. As she was picking it in her fingers, a dark form pasted between her and the sun, casting a cold shadow upon her, and, looking up, she read in Silas's white face the certainty that he knew her thought. Then, with a shriek—

CHAPTER VI.

DAYS, and weeks, and months passed by, and Hester's wits still wandered. Her good Aunt Sobby brought her back up to town, change of scene and friends restored her to her former health.

After having married, and survived her husband, Mrs. Haddock became the inmate of this gloomy old house, where now she sits telling us the story.

And Mr. Silas. What of him? He is the owner of the Pollards now, and of a large house in town, and has many servants. He is a rich man, and has very strange stories of wild orgies, gambling, drunkenness, and debauchery in which, they say, he spent some twenty years. But that is over; and for these ten years past he has lain bed-ridden. Without friend or relation, with no one to care for him or attend to him, save his hired nurses—dragging on a wretched existence from day to day—with nothing to live for, yet afraid to die; paralyzed, helpless, unutterably lonely and miserable, old Silas Gurdlestone awaits the dread summons calling him to that bourne from whence no man returns to take account of his deeds. God be merciful to him!

ON THE WATER.

ON THE ROAD.

GARRETT J. LEYDECKER, CADET AT WEST POINT.

CHARLES F. SCHULTZ, NAVAL SCHOLAR AT ANNAPOLIS.

TWO PRIZE SCHOLARS FROM OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

THE appointment to a cadetship at West Point and a naval scholarship at Annapolis being within the gift of the Hon. Daniel E. Sickles, that gentleman, with a spirit worthy of all commendation, announced through the City Superintendent of Public Schools, that he would bestow the appointments upon the two scholars in the public schools of his Congressional District who should prove themselves, in a public examination, most worthy. The examination—a severe and protracted one—resulted in the recommendation of Master Garrett J. Leydecker for the cadetship, and Master Charles F. Schultz for the naval scholarship, and they have since been appointed. We publish their portraits herewith. It is high praise of Master Schultz to say that, during his pupilage of three and a half years in the public schools, he never received a demerit mark for misconduct.

Master Garrett J. Leydecker is the son of worthy though not wealthy parents, his father being employed as clerk in a mercantile establishment. Young Leydecker entered the Primary Department of Ward School No. 38 at the early age of six years. He there proved to be a studious and a bright boy, and passed rapidly through all the intermediate classes, from the lowest in the Primary to the highest in the Grammar Department, and was pronounced fit for admission to the Free Academy at the examination of candidates in July, 1857. At that examination he could not be presented, inasmuch as he had not yet attained the age required by law (14 years), and accordingly, with characteristic energy, applied himself to the task of keeping pace in his studies with his associates who were admitted at that time. Although prosecuting the studies under disadvantages, when his position is compared with those who were daily receiving instruction at the Free Academy, at the following examination of classes in February, 1858, having then reached the prescribed age, he was placed in the class with his associates in No. 35, and maintained his position, as at the next regular promotion, July, 1858, he was advanced to the Freshman Class. The test through which he has just passed proves that since that time he has continued his active prosecution of study, and that he is calculated to be a credit to West Point.

Master Charles F. Shultz, who last week received his appointment to the Naval School at Annapolis, was born at Stettin, in Prussia, in 1846, and came to this country in 1857. Two weeks after his arrival he was placed in Ward School No. 29. He then did not understand a word of the English language, excepting a few short sentences. In a note to us he says: "Here I studied geography, spelling and defining, and arithmetic. At first I was rather embarrassed, but after a little while I got along very well. Before I was promoted into the next class, which was done in next January, I could almost speak English as well as I can now. I was promoted every examination after this, until I reached the first class, in 1859, having skipped the second. Mr. Annan, the principal, then took me in the class preparing for admission into the Free Academy. I was examined for admission to that institution on the 10th and 11th of July, this year, and admitted. I then heard that pupils from the First, Third, and Eighth Wards would be examined for admission to the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I told my father about it, and he told me to try for Annapolis. I was accordingly examined and accepted. Father is a shoemaker by trade."

The example set by Mr. Sickles is one that is worthy of imitation by Congressmen from every section of the country. If the scholarships and cadetships were always made rewards of merit, our boys would have a fresh stimulus to exertion.

CHAPTER XLIV.

SNUFF OUT OF A DIAMOND BOX.

ANOTHER week rolled on. They were all sitting over their dessert at their last dinner at Escondido, for they were all going to leave old Clinker in the morning.

"Clinker," said Piron, "you told me yesterday that you had a note from Colonel Lawton, saying he would not take passage in the brig with us to New Orleans, as his business obliged him to leave before we could sail?"

Clinker choked out something like "Yes," as if it were the last sound a boly could sigh with three or four hundred tons on his back.

"I'm doosed glad to hear it, Piron; for your military friend didn't entice my fancy at all, and I don't believe any more of his patriot service than I do in Clinker's earthquake. That Colonel is a baste; and if my words prove true, I'll have a thousand pounds to old Clinker there."

Paddy Burns's words did prove true; and old Clinker was with him when he gave a quake the earth had nothing to do with, it being entirely of an apoplectic nature; but he got the thousand pounds nevertheless.

"For once in your life, Burns, I agree with ye; and if that military mon went to shout grouse with me in the Highlands I'd tramp behind him, and keep both barrels of me gun cocked. The devil take his black wig and his green eyes!—and he passing himself off for a Scot too! Tut, mon!"

"By-the-way, Clinker," said Piron, during a pause in the conversation, "if the Colonel is not going with us I must take him back his magnificent snuff-box he forgot when he left us so suddenly the other morning. Here it is, with the letters of his name on it in brilliants. I thought it too valuable to send by one of the blacks, and I kept it to carry myself."

How singular it was that the Colonel should have forgotten his royal treasure! Keep your wits about you, Captain Brand, or one of these days you'll be forgetting your pistols.

"Given to him by a connection of his family, was it, Paddy? Well, mon, let's take a peench for the honor of Sackved Street," and then puts it along to Meester Darcandu."

The Doctor was sitting in his calm, grave way, listening to the disjointed words—like dried nuts dropping on the ground—from the shriveled lips of Clinker; but as he abstractedly put his fingers in the box, and turned his eyes languidly as he pushed down the lid, he gave a bound from his chair—with the box clutched in his left hand—with a jar of the room and table that even made Clinker believe the forty year earthquake had come back again.

Standing there with his tall, majestic figure, like a statue of bronze, his right arm poised with clenched hand aloft in a threatening attitude; his dark, grizzled locks bristling above his head; the black eyes flaming with an inhuman light, as if prepared to crush, with the power of a god, the pigmies around him, he said, in a deep, low voice, which made the glasses ring and shudder,

"Who owns this bauble?"

"It belongs to a Colonel Lawton, who has been staying here!" exclaimed Piron, quickly and hurriedly.

"What sort of man?" came again from those terrible lungs, without relaxing a muscle of his frame.

"A square-built, tallish fellow, of about forty, with greenish blue eyes, a black wig, and a glorious sapphire ring on the only finger of his left hand!" roared Burns and Stewart together.

Again came the jar of the earthquake to make the building, table, glasses, and all shake, as Paul Darcentat strode with his heels of adamant out of the sala, and to the veranda; then a bound, which was heard in the room; and after five minutes' stupid silence Banou appeared.

The broken gentleman had torn rather than led his master's barb from the stable, and scarcely waiting for a saddle, had thrown himself like an Indian across his back. There!—his master might hear the clattering of the hoofs up the stony.

"The mon's daft—clean daft, mon!" "Be me sowl, it's the only pair of eyes I iver wouldn't like to look at over me saw-handled friend, Joe Manion!" "He's taken the box with him," crackled Clinker.

But that was the last that Paddy Burns or Stewart or Clinker ever saw of man or box. Piron rose and listened to the sound of the receding hoofs from the veranda; and when he resumed his place his lips were sealed for the night. He saw, however, and the rest of them heard a good deal about the man and the box in time to come.

Did that blooded horse, as he dashed round the curve of the peak, with his thin nostrils blazing red in the dark night, know who his rider was, and on what errand he was bound? It was not snuff that distended those wide nostrils as he plunged down the broken road, through the close, deep forest, over rocks and water-courses, without missing a step with his sure, ringing hoofs; and mounting the sharp gorge beyond with the leap of a stag, his mane and tail streaming in the calm, thick night; the eyes lanterns of burning light, flashing out before his precipitous tread in jets of fire, as his feet struck the flinty stones, with a regular, enduring throb from his heaving chest, as an encouraging hand patted his shoulder and urged him onward.

Down the mountain again, with never a shy or a snort—the horse knowing the rider, and the man the noble beast; the lizards wheeling merrily, and the parrakeets on the tree-tops waking up to chatter with satisfaction. Then into the beaten track along by the sea-shore, the horse increasing his stride at every minute, the spume flying in flakes from his flaming nostrils, and the man bending to his hot neck, smoothing away the white foam; until, with a panting snigger, horse and rider stood still in the town of Kingston.

"Here, my boys, rub this your master's horse down well, and walk him about the court-yard for an hour. There! Take him between you!"

One last pat of the steed's arched neck, a graceful neigh as the dark face pressed against his broad head, and Paul Darcantat strode away in the gray light of the morning.

"Guorra mighty! Nimble Jack, look at dis! Bress my modder in hebben, it am one gold ounce apiece, sure as dis gemmen's name Ring Finger Bill! De Lord be good to dat old massa! Him must hab plenty ob shiner to hove him away on poor dam niggers!"

Even while the tall man strode on toward the port, and as the happy blacks were chattering over their supper, and walking the gallant steed up and down the paved court-yard, a dull, heavy-sailing Spanish brigantine was slowly sagging past Gallows Point and the Apostles' Battery, when, creeping on by the frowning forts of Port Royal, she held her course to sea.

Very different sort of a craft from the comfortfeir brigantine with clean, lean lines slipping out from the Tiger's Trap one sultry evening before a hurricane, which went careering, with a sea hound after her, down to the Garrote Gorge. Different kind of a crew too, and Captain Brand must have remarked the contrast, with his keen, critical, nautical eye—that is, if he chanced to sail in both brigantines, as there is much reason for believing he did—with great disgust, on board the dirty, dumpy old ballahoo now just clear of Drunkenman's Key, and heading along shore for Hicbiire Point, bound for St. Jago de Cuba.

CHAPTER XLV.

LILIES AND SEA-WEED.

BY day and night, under sun or moon, and in breeze or calm—by the resounding surge—on the rippling water—in saloon and grove, picnicking and boating—under vine or awning—all around in the whirling waltz, the measured contradanza —amidst the tinkle of guitar or trill of piano, the rattle and crash of the full band on board the frigate—gently rocking on the narrow deck of the Rosalie, or down in the brig of teak—there was ever a white arm linked in the arm of blue—now timidly, then with a confiding pressure—now a furtive look of blue eyes into dark—then a fixed, steady gaze from the brown to the light—here a palpitating pause, and then the blue arms waxed around the waving stem—two white arms clasping, with a passionate caress, the neck of the weed—and, yes! the Lily floating on the white cheek of the pond had been caught by the strong weed, and with the receding tide was going out to sea! Ay, the sailor had won the maiden!

But while the Lily rocked hither and thither on the pond, with its blond leaves and petals of blue, and its pliant stem in danger at every ebb-tide, who was there to watch it from the bank? That they did, thinking of the time when they were lilies of the pond themselves, with no fears of danger near! But at last it came, and, like blooming flowers, they swung to and fro in the rain, drooping water or tow from their petals and leaves—more in dewy sorrow than in fear—and waiting for sunshine. Bending their beautiful heads of sweet perfume, while, one moment, peeping out with their dark violet eyes and listening, as the wind shook them, with a trembling of apprehension, and clinging hopefully to the straight support on which they reclined.

By day and night, in burning sun with not a drop to drink, and in the sultry night with no morsel of food to eat—through the searing sand in the streets and lanes, down by the grays—to every vessel in the crowded harbor—in every hotel and lodging-house in Kingston—up and down Spanish Town—away off to Port Royal—occasionally going on board the frigate for gold, then on shore again—in tribal wassail and drunken dance, gaudy as ever especially, and here drinking houses, maroon and negro huts and wretched haunts of vice—scattering gold like confetti, rum, and vice—he and to it—in large yellow drops too—and still strolling on, questioning, gleaming with new revenging plots, and with resume then or body, without drink or meat—went Paul Dacrastel.

Oh, Paul Dacrastel, morally villain saw you from the very moment you took that pinch of snuff out of his blue enamelled box! Ay! even before, when you first met your uncle with the broken road, while a goodly barb was curbed back in the gloomy forest till you had passed, with his white face in his waistcoat pocket. And in all your ceaseless wanderings, by day and night, that now timid, terror-stricken villain has been following you. Dodging behind corners—under the well-worn cloths of monte banks—in the lairs of pugilistic—gambling dens—nests of infamy! Every where and in all places steering clear of you!

Oh, Paul Dacrastel, deceived man you are!

And while you are doing all this just turn your eyes out to the calm spot off Montego Bay, where that lady of the brigantine is beckoning you. The dirty, surly captains kicking and beating the hands from taffrail to bowsprit—particularly one great sad fellow, without a hat—and in a few dry thin hairs to shield his skull from the scorching sun; cursing him, as he is puffs a cigarette or a dollar in his belt, or an extra pair of trowsers in the forecastle, with bare feet, and still, cold eyes, now turning on green—eating nothing but beef and drinking patriot water—never sleeping for vermin—kicked and cuffed about the decks!

But yet he smiled with a devilish satisfaction, Paul, for he had escaped you, and was bound to St. Jago de Cuba! From there he would charter—alas, penniless—a small boat, and run over to the Dooe Legnas Keys, where there was ten thousand pounds in mildewed gold! Paul Dacrastel had discovered it—which was not probable—and he—the scoundrel—would gather it up in bags, and sink away to some other part of the world!

You must be very quick, Captain Braud, for the leaky brigantine does not sail so fast as the Coulpevle, and your ancient company, Mr. Anacio, is just out of prison. His old, fat, banana wife is very sorry for it, but that's none of your business.

And you, Doctor Paul! Don't you pity that dying, dirty wretch, with his manifold sores, and soul-decaying gore out of those greenish, frozen eyes, where a ray of mercy never entered, but whose ice lids lately crack as your shadow stamps across them?

No! not a ray of pity or mercy for the infamous villain; not even a twitch of the left eyelid of his bloody, mutilated white hand! No! not the faintest hope of pity! He shall die in such torments as even a pirate never devised in his hell!

But you are worn out, Dacrastel; your prey has escaped you. The people think you're dead, as you are, by proxy; and though your stride is the same, and your frame still as nervous as a galvanized corpse, yet flesh and blood can't stand it. Go on board the Mosonguhela and talk to that true friend whose counsels you have ever listened to and never were rebelling in your heart or take that noble, gallant youth in your arms and console him—for he needs consolation—and think of the mouse who gnawed the net years and years ago.

Well, you will, Paul Dacrastel; but before you do, you will step into that little jeweler's shop and buy a trifle for old Clinker there, out at Escondido. You want a ring, the finest gem that can be found on the island of Jamaica. There it is—its equal not to be bought in the whole West Indies—and worth fifty dollars at least.

"I gave a military man an ounce for the setting alone, but the sapphire-looking stone may be glass. He was going to sail the next morning to a Spanish brigantine for St. Jago de Cuba, and wanted the money to pay his bill at the lodging-house adjoining. The Señor might take it for any price he chose to put upon it."

What sort of an old drinker is precious stones and trinkets turn pale than his old topaz face as he yelled frantically for his older Creole wife? The Señor had entered the ring as he left his elbows through the glass cases which contained the time-honored jewellery, and dashed a yellow shower of heavy gold ounces over the floor of the little shop, smashing the glass door of that too in his exit! And when the little toddling fat woman appeared in the most indecent dress possible to conceive of, with scarcely time to light her paper cigar, she exclaimed,

"Es Jesucita Sandoval! Que, diavonia con ere! A crazy man—a demon with gold!" And forthwith she picked up the pieces and locked at them reminiscently in the palm of her hand. "Son forma, Canpeche! All right, old Deary; we'll have such a pedrida to-day! Baked duck with garbanzos! So shut the door! There are the ounces you gave the officer men for the ring, and I'll guard the rest."

That old woman did, too, and that very night she was—in the most skilful way—from her back door—in the midst of a violent quarrel, the last ounce, and locked all up in her own little brass-nailed trunk for a rainy season for them both, together with her jewels and red bandana.

Paul Dacrastel whirled and spun round the corners and along the sandy streets till he reached the landing, moving like a whirlwind and clearing every thing from his track. There he sprang into the first boat he saw, seized the sculls, and spite the shrieks and remonstrances of the old nigger whose property it was, and who jumped overboard with a howl of dismay, he rowed himself by long and powerful strokes to a neighboring boat where, with the assistance of another ancient crony, he was both let down upon the valley of shrieks which alarmed the harbor, while the boat went shooting like a javelin toward the Mosonguhela.

However, those old stump-tailed African bathmen found a gold ounce in their boat after it had been set adrift by the American frigate. What a jolly snapping of teeth over a tough old grouse stuffed with onions that night, with two respectable married ladies and some bottle of rum beside them! You can almost sniff the fragrance of onions, even at this distance—smell, ha, and shall, mayhap, wag, one night, in lands where stuffed goose and comely colored ladies are desired.

CHAPTER XLVI.

PARTING.

THERE had been a small party on board the Mosonguhela the night before to bid the Commodore good-by—all old friends of both parties, Sir Fipps, Burns, Stewart, Savage, and Captain Blunt. Clinker was not there, for he never went where it was damp, and if he got musty it must be from within as well as without. The Martha Blunt, under the careful management of young Binks, the mate, with Banou and all the baggage on board, was lying down by the Key, and Captain's boats down the harbor, with her yards manheaded all ready to sheet home the sails when the sea-pies shot ashore, and the long, graceful mate and the passengers to come on board.

The lights were twinkling from lattice and revelain in the town, and here and there the lanterns of the French and English Admirals were shining from the tops of their flagships, while the glare of the gleams from the beacon on the Pallissades Point flickered and dazzled over the gemmed masts anchored in the harbor. A strong wind was still spread on the after deck of the Mosonguhela; and there, while the officer of the watch paced the forward part of the deck with the midshipmen to leeward, the sentries on the high platform outside and on the forecastle, the party of ladies and gentlemen could sit silently and watch the lanterns.

Softly, like the cool breath of a slumbering child, came a faint air from the land. The bell of the frigate, clanging in its hoarse throat, struck the midnight. The sentries on the two posts cried, "All's well!" The old brig was letting full her topsails; and the sound of the men in the rattlings rose clearly on the air.

"Cleveland!" said Piron, quietly, "while the ladies and our friends are getting into the barge, come down with me to your cabin. I wish to have a parting word with you."

So they go down.

"Now, my dear friend, you have seen as well as I how wildly those young people are in love with each other. So has my wife. I am sure Clevelan'd, her son, and pretty Rosalie seems more in love with him than our niece. I have not had the heart to put a thorn in the path of their happiness, and God grant it may all come right. But, Cleveland, you know that we come from an old and noble stock. Ever since the Conquest has never crossed our escutcheon, and I can not yet make up my mind to an immediate engagement. Do you not consider that you—Sir Clevelan'd hear me out. I do not, however, carry my prejudices to any absurd extent, nor have I objection to the marriage of my son—but only to her mother and my wife; but I wish you to explain the way and feel, in your own kind manner, to your friend's son. Say to him what a trial it has been to us—how we all love him—he pretend his handsome face deserves—"

"and after he has learned all, if he still persists in urging his suit when the cruise is over, he shall have our consent—only now there are many work changes in them both; and meanwhile I shall not mention the matter to our little Rosalie, as we have for the present—"

"Spoken like a true father and a noble gentleman, my dear Piron! I have thought as you and your excellent wife do on this matter; but, like you, I have not had the courage to give even a hint of warning to Henry. I shall, however, break the matter gently to him, and send my coxswain for his father also, whom I have not seen for a week, and who, they tell me, has been raging about Kingston ever since he ran away from you at Escondido. His son loves him devotedly; and a word from him will do more than I could say in a lifetime."

"The ladies are in the barge, Commodore," squeaked Midshipman Mouse, as he popped his tiny head into the cabin.

"Very well, Sir. And tell Lieutenant Dacrastel that I wish to see him 'se-nerve morning, before church service. Come, Piron!"

On the lower grating of the accommodation ladder stood the Commodore with his first lieutenant as the barge shoved off.

"I am heartily obliged to you, Commodore Cleveland," said Piron, "for your kind wishes to me; and if Mr. Hardy will permit, I'll give the boats' crews a glass of grog for their exertion in rowing the ladies."

Certainly! Jacob knew what was proper under the circumstances, and liked a moderate toss himself after a hard night's work as well as the lusty sailors in the boats, and the youngsters. Rat and Martin, who steered them.

So the barge shoved off, with no other words spoken, though there were white handkerchiefs waved with various fans, and red bandanas, less somewhat moist; while following in the barge's wake went a light whale-boat gig, pulled by four old tars, who would make her leap, when they had a mind, half out of water; for it was in those brawny arms to do it. But now they merely dipped the long oar-blades in the water, and could not keep up with the barge.

They knew each other pretty well-nigh—that their gallant, considerate young Captain there in the stern-sheets, with his white jacket in the moon, who was always thinking about the barge, and something more yielding than white-laced rope in his fippers; and that the sweet little curls under the cap of that wife with her head throwing off the sparkling spray as she lay under his bows, was in no hurry to go to sea—not caring much, either, whether she was homed, so long as she found good holding ground when she got to anchor—in her lovers' eyes, and cargo ready for another voyage—not she!

Finally, old Jacob Blunt, Master, again in his elements with the barge, with Mr. Blanche Binks cutting the anchor forward; all sail made, sheets home, and every thing ship-shape, with a fresh wind, and the Martha Blunt gaily gliding astern, went steering out to sea, bound to New Orleans, by way of the Windward Passage.

As the last boat left the brig's side she cast off; and with the waves breaking over her, those four old sons of Daddy Neptune bared their tattooed arms—illustrative of ships, anchors, and maidens—and bent their bodies with a will toward the harbor!

"Take keer, Sir, if it's the same to you, or we'll be on that ledge off the 'Yostle's Battery.' It looks jist a leetle too near for me!" in the Yarrin's Passage as I was wunne nearly 'racked on, in the Sweeter, sixteen-gun brig."

"No fear, my boy! Steady, starboard!"

"Beg your parding, Mr. Darcantel, but that 'ere vessel you is heading for is that old chimney of a Spanish steamer, our craft is all here, under the quarter of the Mosonguhela."

"Ah yes, Charley; I see the Rosalie."

What made them all look over the larboard round one to the other, as their sixteen-feet oars rattled with a clash on the brass rullocks—and shut one eye tight, as if they were squinting themselves? Probably they were thinking of a prayer-book in the cabin somewhere, who lived somewhere in a sea-port town long years ago. But yet they loved that young slip of sea-weed, whose head was hidden on the bottom of the blue jacket, his epaulet lopsided on his shoulder, his sword belt downward, and his brown eyes tracing the lines of the vessel where pretty feet had once rested, while he jerked the tiller ropes from side to side, and his gig went wild by reef and point toward the Rosalie.

When the gig's oars at last, in spite of her bumpings against the larboard quarter of the lieutenant, trailed alongside the schooner, and while her crew were cracking a few biscuit and jokes on deck, and Charley hung up the latter end's masts, her Captain hurried down to his small cabin, and changed his fig for service on board the frigate.

CHAPTER XLVII.

DEVOTION.

SUNDAY morning at Kingston harbor. The deep-toned bells from cathedral and church were swelled off from the town; the troops at Park Camp hurried on their shoes and rubbed good; matrons and maidens, with bare heads, fans, and mantillas, going along demurely; portly judges, heroes, and planters trudging beside palanquins of their Saxon spouses; negroes in white; Creoles in brown, cigarritos put out for a time; white-robed priests and rubicund sons of organs and chants or prayers and sermons from kits and pulpits, left the people busy in worshiping God according to their several beliefs.

On the calm harbor, too, and in Port Royal, lay the men-of-war, the church pennants taking the place of the ensigns at the peaks, the bells tolling, and the ships—every one clean, and orderly—ere attending Divine service.

On board the Mosonguhela the great spar-deck was scrubbed and washed—that old chap officer with his spy-glassing old quarter-master, and the sentries on gangway and forecastle. The marines, in white, were furnished down in concentric coils, the guns without a speck of dust on their shining coats, the captain polished like an old brass candlestick, and every thing slow and aloft in a faultless condition.

As Harry Darcantel came rather languidly over the gangway, and went down to the maindeck, where the five hundred sailors in snowy-white mustering clothes were assembled, Commodore Cleveland beckoned to him with his finger as he stood talking at the cabin-door to his first lieutenant.

Hardly, I do not feel well this morning;

make my excuses to the chaplain, and go on with the service. Come in, Harry. Orderly, allow no one, not even the servants, to enter the cabin—except Doctor Darcantel, in case he should come on board."

The stiff soldier laid his white-gloved finger on the visor of his hat. Then the chaplain, standing on his flag-draped pulpit at the main-mast, with those five hundred quiet, attentive sailors seated on capstan-bars and match-tubs between his silent company and an open space, his mild, persuasive voice, as he read the sublime service from the good lessons before him. Then, after a short but impressive sermon, adapted to the comprehension of the honest tars around him, with a kindly word, and a few words of benediction to the old veterans who, before the bell, opened the Holy Book and delivered the parting benediction.

As he began the service, in spite of the warning of the sentry at the gangway, came boys on to the frigate's solid side, and as she went down with the rolling, bobbing back from the recoil of the concussion a tall, powerful man leaped out of her, and by a mighty spring caught the man-rope of the roof gangway, and swung himself through the open port of the gun-deck. Drawing his lofty head with reverential awe as the last solemn words of the benediction were uttered by the chaplain, he joined, in a deep, guttural voice, the word "Amen," and strode on and entered the cabin.

The curtains were closely drawn of the aftercabin, even to admit not the slightest of the young sea-breeze which was fluttering in from Port Royal, and there stood that noble officer, with his strong arm thrown around his gallant youth—the picture of abject woe—talking in his kind, feeling accents, trying to console him, though the tears of the night in his eyes and sagging lips, by all the love and affection he bore him through so many years, to be a man, and trust to his good conscience and his right arm to cleave his way through the clouds and gloom in which surrounded him.

"There, Henry, you are calmer now. Sit down here in my state-room, and while you think of that first girl you ever knew, a thoughtful, depraved mother, Madame Rosalie, who loves you for the resemblance she thinks you bear to her little boy, who was murdered by pirates just seventeen years ago off this very island."

"What do you say, Cleveland?" said a voice behind him, with much deep, suppressed energy that the Commodore fairly started. "What did you say about a lost child and a Madame Rosalie?"

Paul Dacrastel stood there in the softened crimson light of the cabin; his sinewy hand upraised, his gaunt breast heaving, with unshorn beard and tangled, grizzly locks, the iron jaw half open, and his dark, terrible eyes gleaming with unearthly fire.

"Speak, Harry Cleveland! For the wife you love, speak the truth!"

"My dear, dearest friend; do be calm! Why have you been so long away from me? I wanted you sadly, but you did not know that the poor boy has had his first lesson in this world's grief, and I have had mine in the past few years, cruelty! That the grave he has so often stood over, under the magnolia, does not contain his brother; another child!"

"Merciful God!" said Paul Darcantel, sinking down on his knees, with his hands clasped together, while the first tears for more than twenty years streamed from his agonized eyes. "There is a Providence in it all! That boy is but my son! I, a wretched lost child, Christ's grasp, and that woman must be his mother!"

Lower and lower the lofty head bent, till it touched the floor, the long hands clasped tight together—and those eyes! Ah, those parched eyes! So dry and dry!

"Paul, Paul! What is this I hear? For the love of Heaven and those angels who are waiting for you, explain!"

"My father—my more than father, I am not illegitimate, then! No such shame may cause your boy to blush for his mother?"

While strong and loving arms raised the exhausted man from the deck, and while he becomes once more the same distressed Paul Darcantel, and with hand grasped in hand is rapidly recounting unknown years of his existence, let us leave the cabin.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TELEGRAPH.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—[Extract from Harper's Weekly, August 7, 1860.

An article in your Weekly for August 4th on the subject of Atlantic Telegraphs attracts me to address you particularly as regards the old company), that, with your permission, I will give you the exact speed of the electric current through the whole length of the first Atlantic Cable, taken on the spot by the writer.

It will be remembered Queenstown, Ireland, was the rendezvous of the fleet previous to departure for Valentia Bay. It was at the former place, on the 1st of August, 1857, that a message was made between the wire on board the Niagara and Agamemnon, distant from each other a distance of a hundred miles. Experiment proved that it required three-fourths of a second for the "spark" to pass through. This was on the very eve of departure (the fleet started August 2d). Previous to this the time was never less than from 1¼ to 1 second for the transmission of a spark.

It will be seen by this that, up to the last moment, the passage of the electricity did not justify the belief that a "remunerative speed" had been obtained, and in all probability could not be until a more perfect system of electrical and mechanical arrangements was perfected.

Respectfully, TELEGRAPHER.

THE GAME OF LIFE.

BY ELIZA COOK.

With eager hand Hope deftly weaves
The manches that our pride would don,
While busy-finger'd Care unreaves
The garments as we put them on.—
We rear our palaces of joy,
And tread them with exulting shout,
Till, crumbling round, its plainly found
Some corner-stones have been left out.
And thus we play the game of Life,
Shaded and sunbeam ever blending;
'Mid flowers of Peace and tares of Strife
Gaily beginning—sadly ending.

The maiden greets her swain to-day,
The gay lip murmurs, and she feels him;
Now she believes whate'er he'll say,
A month has gone,—alas! she doubts him;
The lover hangs upon a charm,
With glowing trust and earnest seeing;
Next year he rouses from his trance,
And scoffs at the one he late was wooing.
And thus we play the game of Life,
Our dreams dispell'd, our plans defeated,
And when we're lost with pain and cost,
Still stand, as ready to be cheated.

The cooing infant's rosy mouth
Aptly receives the sweeten'd potion;
When wars are calm, and winds are south,
None see the death-rocks in the ocean.
The rich man toils to "gather up,"
Meaning to bask in Fortune's clover,
And while he pours into his cup,
Perceives not it is running over.
And thus we play the game of Life,
Now simply snared, now wisely brooding,
Now foiled by sunlex, now spreading wiles,
Living deluded and deluding.

The Poet prattles to the stars,
Philosophers dissect the thunder,
But both are doom'd by cynical lurs,
And stand outside to watch and wonder.
We moralize on battle-plains,
Where blood has poured, and fame was won,
We turn and see the baby's glee
Over his mimic sword and gun.
And thus we play the game of Life,
Twixt holy Thought, and fearful Deed.
Some only stay to work and pray,
And some but live for Crime and Greed.

Our feet of clay trip up each other,
Our wings of ether seek the sky:
We breathe—we are—child follows mother,
Yet none can tell us "How?" or "Why?"
Our hearts, like clocks, keep ticking fast,
We climb and laugh, we fall and weep,
Till, tired of guessing, at the last
We solve the riddle in a sleep,
And thus we play the game of Life,
In motley garbs of Grief and Pleasure,
Till we are dust in that green vest
For which the sexton takes our measure.

$5. RABBITT'S SOAP. Price per Box $5. No. 2. R. T. RABBITT, the well-known Saleratus manufacturer, is bringing out a new and useful article, as follows:
68 Put up in boxes of 50 pounds each, in 1 pound bars, price $5 per box. This Soap is rapidly taking the place of all other Soaps wherever it is introduced, and will sell as far as 3 pounds of any other family Soap. It will wash in either hard or soft water; it does not injure the fabric—on the contrary, it preserves it and frees the colors. It will remove paint, grease, and stains of all kinds. But little labor is required where this Soap is used. Directions sent in each box for making ONE POUND OF THE ARTICLE AND INTO THREE GALLONS OF HARD-SOME SOFT SOAP. Each box has a key and gives it a trial. If you do not want a whole box yourself, get your neighbors to join you and divide it. Believing that no family which has once used this Soap will ever be without it, and being desirous to give its merit widely known, I have made arrangements with the proprietors of the following papers (many of whose have tried the Soap and know its value), by which I am able for the present to offer to any person remitting to me $5 in any safe way, a Box, the United States, one box of the above Soap, and a receipt for one year's subscription to either of the following New York papers, viz.:

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For September, 1860.

THE Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE believe that, in variety and interest of matter and beauty of illustration, the present Number is exceeded by no one which they have offered to their readers. Mr. O'BRIEN'S thoughtful Poem, "The Sewing Bird," touches upon the great evil—the source of so many others—the want of employment for women. FOSDICK CRAYON'S lively paper presents a genial view of New England life and character seen through Southern eyes. Mrs. TAYLOR'S article upon Spiders—which will be continued in a future Number—is a result of years of study, which have won for the author the reputation of one of the most accomplished microscopists and close observers of insect life now living, and have gained for her the appointment of State Entomologist of Georgia. Mr. HEADLEY'S stirring account of "Eaton's Barbary Expedition" is the first complete narrative ever published of one of the most daring exploits in our history. The conclusion of Mr. LOWELL'S "Cruise of the Two Deacons" embodies a moral applicable to political as well as religious polemics. Mr. THACKERAY'S sketch of George the Second, and Mr. RUSKIN'S eloquent paper, are by far the best articles contained in our advance copies of the foreign Magazines for the month. These, with the other contents of the Magazine, have been carefully selected from the constantly increasing materials at the disposal of the Editors, whose own comments upon current events and topics furnish an epitome of the world's progress for the month.

The New American Watch.

IN ORDER TO MEET THE REQUIREMENTS OF gentlemen who prefer a thinner watch than those usually made by us, we have lately issued a new style of watch on the three-quarter plate model, especially designed for this purpose.

In establishing this new series, it has also been our design to produce a watch in every way superior to the best and highest priced products of the most reputable of English and Swiss watch manufacturers; and no labor or expense has been spared to this end.

In all respects of fine and durable material, of external and internal finish, of accurate compensation and adjustment, of mathematically just proportions, and, of practical results, our new three-quarter plate watch challenges comparison with any in the world.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH JUST TAKEN BY WATKINS, OF LONDON.]

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

We publish on the preceding page a portrait of the Prince of Wales from a photograph taken by Watkins of Parliament Street, London, just before the Prince sailed from England. As the Prince is just now the hero of the day, our readers will probably be well pleased to compare this portrait with the one we published in our number of August 4, which was pronounced by the correspondents in company with the Prince to be an uncommonly good likeness.

THE SUCTION POST.

When a lounger, on a very hot day, sits down under an awning, and goes to work upon his cobweb-cylinder, he feels with satisfaction how immediately and how smoothly the liquor glides up the straw upon the application of his lips to it. But the odds are that he never associated with this movement the Post-office or the London Parcels Delivery Company in any manner whatever. Yet the power at work in that straw is destined to revolutionize the machinery of those very important metropolitan establishments.

For some years the International Telegraph Company have employed this new power to expedite their own business. Thus their office at Lothbury has been for some time put in communication with the Stock Exchange and their station at Cornhill, Mincing Lane, and written messages are sucked through tubes, thus avoiding the necessity of repeating each message. We illustrate the apparatus doing its ordinary work, only the other day, in the large telegraphic apartment of the Company in Broadway Street, Moorgate Street. Five metal tubes, of from two to three inches in diameter, are seen trained against the wall, and coming to an end at the termination possible to that of the attendant who ministers to them. In connection with their bottoms other smaller pipes are soldered on at right angles; these lead down to an air-pump below, worked by a small steam-engine. Above another air-pump and reservoir, of course, at the other end of the pipe, and thus suction is established to and fro through its whole length. We are now looking at the station which we hear a whistle; this is to give notice that a dispatch is about to be put into the tube at Mincing Lane, two-and-a-half miles distant. It will be necessary, therefore, to exhaust the air between the end we are watching and that point. A brass trap-door at the end of the apparatus opens instantly, but a cock is turned, the air-pump below begins to suck, and in a few seconds you hear the blast against the end of the tube—the little door is opened, and a cylinder of gutta-percha, incased in flannel, about the size of a tobacco-box, is thrown in, but loosely, is immediately ejected upon the counter; the cylinder is opened at one end, and there we find the dispatch.

Now it is quite clear that it is only necessary to enlarge the tubes and to employ more powerful engines and steam-power, in order to convey not only letters and dispatches, book parcels, etc., in the same manner. And this a new company are forming with about to do. They purpose in their prospectus to unite all the district post-offices in the metropolis with the central office in Saint Martin's-le-Grand.

At the present moment the contract rate at which the mail-carts go in eight miles per hour. The Pneumatic Company can convey messages at the rate of thirty miles an hour, and this speed can be doubled if necessary. The same system will be ultimately adopted for bringing the mail-bags to and from the railway stations. A pipe between the Charing Cross post-office and Saint Martin's-le-Grand is about to be laid; so that the public service will very speedily test its capabilities, if further testing, indeed, be needed.

The company are also about to lay down a pipe between the Stock and the Exchange, for the conveyance of samples of merchandise, thus practically bringing the Isle of Dogs into Cornhill; and for all we know the invention may further be extended to relieve the gorged streets of the metropolis of some of its heavy traffic.

THE RECOVERY FROM THE CRISIS.

COMMERCIAL movements are always slow; it takes years to collect materials for a financial crisis, and years to set in order the scaffolding for a new edifice of prosperity. The crisis of 1857 was inevitable from the outbreak of the Crimean war; it is now likely that the real work of restoration has only just begun.

It has begun, however, and for that let us give God thanks. On whichever side we look we see the signs of reviving animation, increasing enterprise, increased production, restored vitality, re-established confidence. The number of vessels employed in the first of the great factories is considerably greater than has ever been known heretofore; the consumption of cotton has increased, it is expected, this year, be thirty-three per cent. in excess of that of any previous year. The yield of wheat in the West is over twenty-five per cent. more than the harvest of 1856, the largest harvest on record; corn is expected to show a still larger increase. Cotton may not do, this year, as well as last, in consequence of the short summer drought; but the crop will certainly be in excess of that of any previous year except 1859. The railroad interest is mending rapidly; the average receipts show an increase of from forty to sixty per cent. over last year. More ships and steamers are being built than usual; it is evident that new struggles are going to be made with England for the supremacy of the seas. The mines—iron, coal, lead, and gold—are yielding more metal than they have done for years.

Thus we see once more on the advancing wave of prosperity. How long the tide may flow before the ebb comes depends on the common sense and discretion of the people at large. If people generally become elated at the prospect of prosperity, and begin to spend as much as or more than they earn, if the increase of wealth leads to an excessive expansion of credit, and every one begins to run in debt with a view of paying off not only our own insist on squandering upon dress and household luxuries the sums which they spent in 1856 and the early part of 1857, it is evident that our race will be swift, and that a fresh financial crisis will speedily overtake us. Nothing but caution, prudence, economy, and habits of saving among individuals can render the present condition permanent. The choice rests with the people: they must decide.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN CANADA.

Our humorous poets have thus far forgotten to seize the humors of the Prince's tour through the British Provinces. The Prince himself, by virtue of the colonists; the funny servility of some learned bodies; the desperate partisanship of some petty politicians; the agonies of the Princess best some fair subject should presume to walk arm in arm with him in the dance; the incorrigible laws which guard the Prince against being spoken to on a subject; the inevitable proffer of his left hand, the right being only used for kissing not for shaking hands; the lavish expenditure of money in honor of the Prince, all will probably gaze with more interest on Canada's natural beauties than on her triumphal arches—all these, and a thousand more, are serious pen, and we hardly understand how they have been neglected so long.

We trust, when the Man arises who shall treat this theme, that he will have the good sense to treat it with genial kindly humor, and not with any thing like ill-nature or venom. In all the processions of the Prince thus far, droll as some of the events have been, there has been nothing ridiculous, and certainly nothing deserving reprobation. On the whole, the Prince has conducted himself with rare discretion and judgment. His replies to addresses have not by any means been stereotyped, and have all been sensible and judicious. He has made no mistakes; hurt no one's feelings; damped no one's enthusiasm. Perhaps there never was a royal personage which left so little room for serious criticism. If the Prince, when he comes to reign over Great Britain, is as well advised as he has been on this tour, the British will be a fortunate people.

The most trying ordeal for his Royal Highness is to come, however. His reception here will not be half so enthusiastic. Our City Fathers and Mothers have met and resolved to entertain him grandly in the Academy of Music. The matter is then taken up by the Board of the Common Council, which is a great blessing; but there is a wide margin for blunders even under this safeguard. The blunders will not arise from the incognito under which the Prince will travel. What excuse is there for fixing Baron Renfrew? How far are the barriers of etiquette to be drawn? What will the Prince say to his New York entertainers? We trust that all these matters may be carefully thought of in advance, and that nothing may occur to mar a reception which should be perfect in its way. The spirit exists here to do the Prince honor worthily; let us hope that the execution may be felicitous.

A KING FOR CANADA.

Some of our contemporaries, moralising on the progress of the Prince of Wales through the British Provinces, predict that he will shortly be inaugurated as Viceroy of the United British North America. Those who hold this opinion do not understand the temper of the colonists. They are intensely loyal—to wards, and as against foreign nations, such as the United States. But as between themselves and Great Britain they are, and ought to be, imbued with a very strong local patriotism and a decided jealousy of British interference. For nearly twenty years, indeed ever since self-government was inaugurated in Canada, each successive English governor has been more unpopular than the last. The best English governor they ever had was Lord Elgin, and him they heartily stoned to death. The reason is very simple.

The Canadians are at heart thoroughly freemen and Democrats. They want to govern themselves. They have the intelligence and capacity to do so, and they know it. As it is, their governors possess very little real power—no more than the Queen in England; they merely draw their $30,000 a year for obeying the orders of the elective Parliament; and yet they are perpetually reviled by the local papers. Any contemptible wretch could upset Elgin by an attempt to convert Canada into a Viceroyalty like Ireland would result in a rebellion, far more serious in its character than that of 1837–8.

That the British Provinces will shortly be united or confederated, there is every reason to believe. Rumors of this effect have that the executive chief of the whole will not be appointed by England, but elected by the British North American people. No Prince will ever rule over Canada.

THE LOUNGER.

AN EXPLANATION.

Of course the friends of Mr. Page the painter must have been amazed to read in the Lounger of last week that Page is a "gay painter" and "believes profoundly in advertising."

The Lounger hastens to explain that the article called "The Painter" should have followed the one called "The Merry Painter," and that it is to the latter that the "gay," etc., refer. No man could more utterly disbelieve what is known as "advertising" than William Page.

THE CITY DINING THE PRINCE.

A MEETING of New York citizens has appointed a committee to take charge of an ovation to the Prince of Wales. That includes the most eminent men of letters, clergymen, lawyers, and merchants of every kind in the city. It is strictly a representation of the "solid men" of society; and the experiment will now be fairly tried whether it is possible to have a public reception of a distinguished guest which is worthy of the fame of the city.

Of course there must be a dinner. There must be a public eating of that kind. And it is therefore a good thing that there is so spacious and splendid a hall in Academy for the occasion. Brilliantly illuminated and thronged with ladies, making hanging gardens of the boxes above the parquet, it will be as pretty a spectacle as we are likely to see there.

But why should the ladies be confined to the boxes? Why should no such gentleman who buys a ticket to the table be allowed to buy one for a lady also? Then when the table tickets were all sold, the ladies would be content to go up stairs and look on. The fine effect of the spectacle will be greatly heightened by the mingling of the bright toilets of the ladies with the somber regulation black broadcloth of the gentlemen. Moreover, it is intended to have the elegant wives of partners of a private party. It is not a public spree of the Rookh kind, and it may fairly be presumed that there will be no appearance of irregularity upon the part of the guests at the banquet. It is not a partisan or political assembly. It is meant to be a mere festival of welcome to a guest who is also a friend.

There is no reason to suppose that they will not be, except that it is rather the habit for public dinners to be composed of men only. This has been the rule, of course, because men did not wish the invitation of their society to the other sex. But this is the very occasion upon which they do want it. The Prince of Wales will visit the future King of England shall always remember that he dined with hundreds of Americans, as quietly and elegantly as he had been dining with the Court at Windsor Castle. Oh, Jenkins, do you think the thing possible?

And oh, Jenkins, couldn't you say a word to the orators? Let us have it thick, but not too thick. Let it be distinctly stated that we are one family: that we have a common language, common interests, and common religion; that Shakespeare and Milton belong to us both; and that playing our bonds we are to bless the world:—let that all be set forth at length and with velvet eloquence. Then let us stop talking, clear away the tables, and fall to dancing. The Prince is fond of it. You told us that he danced eleven times one evening, and that, too, after dinner. And "the rests his partners frequently." That is another great point.

It is suggested that it is not the custom in England to admit ladies to public dinners, and it would strike the Prince as "odd." So it might, but we thought New York was in America.

A GREAT EVENT.

As I passed up the East River on an afternoon of last week I saw upon the shore opposite Blackwell's Island a crowd of men and women clustering upon the rocks that overhang the water, and sitting and sauntering among the trees. The bits of green grass from the river had a peculiar air of lawns. The trees were stately and full-leaved. There were graceful inequalities of surface, and the people scattered every where had a peaceful air of tranquil happiness. There were buildings also, and benches, and a platform. Altogether it was a very pretty pastoral sight. There was something in it to remind a spectator of Claude's pictures.

And if a man had looked in under the silken canopy which stretched over the old Roman Colosseum like a firmament—if he had seen the myriads of people sitting there, rising upward and backward into remote tiers of glittering life—and had remembered that this was the flower of the most civilized of nations, how sadly he would have been puzzled if he had been told that this festive scene was simply a gladiatorial shambles, and that these pretty people were all gathered to see men murder each other! "The doomed salute thee, Cesar!" is the way we see it in Gerome's picture, and among it, compelled the bestiality of Rome, and understand why. But what it had conquered, and said, and its prosperity had culminated, it perished miserably, as it deserved.

There was something of the same melancholy contrast between the festal aspect of the groups in the grounds by the river and the occasion of their assembly. To be sure prize-fighting is another kind of gladiatorial show, and the occasion in question was only a sham prize-fight, or hardly so much as a mock—if we were to honor a prize-fighter. Let us suppose that the affable and gentlemanly pugilist had slain his fellow with the last round, and of Farnborough, would he have been seriously different from a gladiator who had plunged his short sword through the body of his adversary? Undoubtedly he would have been. How? Because the old gladiator was compelled by his victors to fight with his fellow-prisoner, while the affable and gentlemanly fighter of Farnborough would, in the case supposed, have slain his antagonist without compulsion, utterly unprovoked, and without any offense upon the part of his victim. There is just that difference between these scenes and the modern gladiator, and it is infinitely in favor of the former.

And suppose, again, that Sayers had been killed in the ring—why, in that case, instead of thirty thousand people at the national ovation to the Farnborough hero there would have been three hundred thousand. The national honor would then have been completely vindicated. The whole world would have seen that we were the bravest, most honest, most manly nation that was ever known. And the Druses would have said, "If Christ is the Christian civilization they make such a row-de-dow about, let us strike again!"

THE LAST TRIUMPH OF "PRACTICAL MEN."

THE Great Eastern has left us. The ship of which for two or three years we have all been dreaming, and looking at pictures, and wondering, and laughing, and doubting, and betting—she has gone now, and in the range of chances we shall probably never see her again. Her builders seem to have made the same mistake that the unhappy Haydon made in painting, and the Roman Room subjects in moulding. The mistake was in supposing that force, or grandeur, or use necessarily kept in dirt. A picture is not necessarily a work of high art because it is a certain subject painted upon an enormous canvas. The statue of an emperor was not heroic and impressive merely because it was four times as large as life. And the Great Eastern is neither the fastest, nor safest, nor most economical of ships because she is the biggest. She may be called the great British folly; but, like many things so called, she has a great deal that is excellent and memorable to look back upon.

But how about our friends the "practical men?" They built her—they subscribed for her—they believed in her—they bragged upon her. If a poet goes up in a balloon of any kind, the practical men look on, and shrug their shoulders, and say "poor devil!" If a subscription is proposed for Garibaldi or Kossuth, the practical men squint wisely, and ask if publishing is dead—if you want to see fancy running riot—study the practical men, and watch their performances, and the poets, and Kossuth, and Garibaldi will seem to you the only people of ordinary common sense in the world.

Practical men blew the South Sea bubble. Practical men made King Hudson. Practical men built the Great Eastern. Practical men subscribed to our intercontinental railroads. Practical men elected. Practical men allow the city taxes to crawl up to the dizzy height. Practical men think that the true way to answer great public questions is to hold your tongue. Practical men think, when the delegate begins, that it isn't going to be much of a shower. And then practical men go home and forbid the marriage of daughter Mary with young Matthew Melody, because he does not know the value of money—because he is not a practical man.

In Scott's "Antiquary," Sir Arthur Wardour is a practical man. How he laughs at that wise visionary Oldbuck! Yes—and how easily Dousterswivel, with his incantations and divining-rods, leads Sir Arthur by the nose!

It will do us harm to preach this little sermon from that tremendous text of the Great Eastern. We Loungers and other useless people have plenty of time to study the actions of practical men, and to perceive why it is that they esteem us so lightly. It is because they are busy with Great Eastern and their great works. They triumphantly ask, "While lounging through life is all very well, what dividend does lounging provide? Tell us that, for we are practical men." And the Great Eastern —and the Atlantic Cable—what is their dividend? Do you think Brunel revived is dead? Don't you individually know that Sir Arthur is living?

And so a prosperous voyage to the great ship!

AN IMPERIAL LETTER.

THE real power and character of Louis Napoleon are shown in nothing he has ever done more fully than in his late letter to M. Persigny, the French Ambassador in England. It is a letter unique in history. It shows that the Emperor of France feels no secure on his throne, and so essentially strong that he can treat upon the elaborate forms and ceremonious delays of diplomacy, and say directly, as one man to another, precisely what he thinks and means.

That he may be telling an untruth is possible. That is always possible when a man speaks. But the simplicity, clearness, and frankness with which he states his points are beyond praise, as they are beyond precedent in such correspondence.

The traditional fear of England is that France will descend upon her coasts and actually occupy London. It is a disease of terror which periodically shows itself. The Nestor of the English press was last year and shook his warning finger. The nation took fright. It is true in the first place that only an army drill in the field—only an excuse for assembling and marshaling the army, can be made suddenly valid England. It began to form volunteer companies. The drum rattled, the fife shrieked, throughout the kingdom. Latterly we have had only the scenes of the reviews in London—of the horse pulling by the Queen of the string that fired a rifle—and finally the speech of Lord Derby openly asking for extraordinary means to put the nation in a state of defence.

Directly upon that speech comes the letter of Louis Napoleon. It sounds like the voice of a man in a hubbub of children. "Let us understand one another in good time, like honest men as we are, and not like thieves who desire to cheat each other." It is clear that Louis Napoleon, dealing in the solemn formality of English diplomacy, is like to get the answer that Mr. Cleman got at the Circumlocution Office: "Look here! upon my soul, you mustn't come into the place saying you want to know, you know." The Emperor of France deliberately says want to know, you know, and England is aghast.

Upon the whole, and whatever doubt of his honesty may be suggested in this letter, Louis Napoleon has certainly shown his entire superiority to the system of British statesmanship. While the English gentlemen and lounger and listen for the French cannon in the Channel—while it is as firm a faith among the people of England that a Bonaparte is waiting to eat them up as it used to be that King Arthur was not dead—the ruler of France smiles and tells what he means to do; and trying to convince them that a man who, at this day, finds himself Emperor of France, has other work on hand than "humbling England," sends out his Uncle Napoleon dead at St. Helena. Some things may be considered settled: among them, for instance, that we are two or four; that England can never permanently occupy France, and nice verse; and that the present condition of affairs forbids any treaty between those two nations upon such a point as revenge for Waterloo. It may be said with the utmost truth that Louis Napoleon has always stated precisely what he meant, so far as England was concerned—that the event has always justified his words, and that the last thing sant English terror of a French invasion is due to their own skepticism of their professed amity. England takes the word of France, and sleeps tranquilly; France takes the hand of England, and holds it honestly.

"In Heaven's name," says Napoleon, "let the eminent men who are placed at the head of the English Government" set aside petty jealousies and unjust suspicions." It need not lay them aside because Louis Napoleon promises fairly, but because his deeds have hitherto justified his words.

HAS A MAN A RIGHT TO HIS OWN?

MY DEAR LOUNGER,—I have a profound respect for the rights of man, but I am perplexed to know and depend upon you to relieve me. The point is this: Is it part of the rights of other men to trample upon me? You have I, as the proprietor of a pretty country place, to endure all day? After working hard at my business for many years, I accumulated money enough to purchase a small, but, as I think, very pleasant place, within less than two hundred miles of New York. It is true that I live all the year in the country, I thought "it would be a good thing," as Mr. Sparrowgrass says, to have a house tolerably near some summer resort or small watering-place, that the monotony might be relieved, and I found just the place.

Indeed, Mr. Lounger—and pardon my pause to say it—is it not remarkable that, if any body advertises for a very particular object, of any kind whatsoever—from a necklace with a sapphire at the handle to a country seat upon the water, with an old farm, a mossy grove, and all city conveniences—there is always somebody sure to respond that, by the rarest luck in the world, he happens to have in a very large way in question, which, for private reasons, he was just ready to part with for half its value? It is remarkable, isn't it?

Well, I bought my place (as above), and it was pleasant and convenient. But when the summer came, and the visitors came with it to the watering-place, they seemed to imagine that they had bought a right to the whole neighborhood with their eighteen dollars a week. That sum really entitled them to a well-shaken bed cell, with a small sideboard, one table (unsteady upon its legs), one wooden chair, one ditto wash-stand, and one square looking-glass, with a free use of the horsehair rocking-chair and rattling piano in the public parlor. And if they chose to add to this their share of the dust on the highway, it was all right, and nobody complained.

But the joke is—I mean the misery is—that these people seem to have left all idea of private property behind them. They respect my gate and my neighbor's no more than the dirt that blows over them. They walk about my grounds as freely, pick my flowers, and eat my fruit as generously as if they were the trees and all, but belonged to my bed tenants. Every soon put up boards painted with large, ugly letters—"No Admission," "Private Grounds," "Not open to the Public," etc., but without the least result. Then I locked my gate—and it was broken down! And palings were pulled off to let women through, more easily! My place was overrun. My peace was gone. My wife was indignant. My daughters in the midst of their youth and beauty got a round from the bushes. So I bought a bull-dog. Unhappily he was as dangerous to the family as to any stranger. So when he arrived I took lodgings near by, at a high rate, for my wife and the children, and gave the brute free range of the grounds. Result—I sold my property at a low hand—and behold, the bull-dog dead—poisoned, I have reason to believe, with strychnine in a chop.

Then I rented a cottage for the season. I put up fresh notices, and I posted myself with a huge club in the garden walks. Presently, on a bright morning, came a lovely party of ladies and following: Can a lovely party of ladies and following. They are three ladies and one gentleman. As they approach I say to myself, What did you bring, ladies make some smothered joke upon my appearance. I take the gentleman aside, and say to him, imperiously, "Sir, do you know that these are private grounds? You will please to move off immediately."

Mr. Lounger, what do you think the man does? He pulls out his card, hands it to me, says that I have insulted him, and challenges me!

I write merely for information. I only want to know whether the wretched people who own country-places near summer resorts have any right to their property at all; and whether a vulgar cockney hires his three-legged pine table in his hot white cell, he also buys the entire region round.

YOURS, BENONI STOCKING.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN ancient monster hints that possibly long trains were worn to hide huge feet—a sneer which is indulged in by a timid insulting creature, a fiend in petti'coats, who tells us:

"E knuwe a mayden tuyce to see:
Fayre was she thenne;
Mex vuke is long—as hir feete may be:
Blynde-ave! Blynde-ave!
All ye that have suche wyttoes be,
Truste not to more than ye can see!"

THE PAPAL BRIGADIER'S RETURN.

The Irish Boy is come back from Rome,]
In a seedy suit you'll deed him:
He brings large hopes but little riches home,
And his coat slit up behind him.
"Lord of lords!" the Irish Boy says he says,
"Though priests may howl, he says:
Some take from out the papal purse,
Some greenhorns, duped, not crazy."

The Boy was done, but the Papal chair
Could not keep his wits from wool under;
The swag he expected he didn't gain:
So he found he'd made a blunder.
And said, "No Pope shall humbug me;
My wits are always wakened."
I'll never fight, grain, against the Free,
For Liberty and for Reform!

With reference to George IV.'s known dislike to Peel, and contempt for his plebeian origin, and supposed want of "polish," Sydney Smith said of Peel, at a dinner:

"Peel, when in the ministry, and on a visit at the Pavilion [Brighton], was sent for to the King in the middle of the night to attend his Majesty in what was then dinner dress. He found the King in full dress, expecting him; and the King supposed to be his last moments. Peel was highly flattered by the King's address: 'Peel, Peel, what he could scarcely utter, said,

"'Oh, my dear John, God bless you! I shall never see you again.' And as Peel was leaving the room, he added, 'Peel, I have made that dressing-gown, my dear Peel!' It sets very badly indeed. God bless you, my dear John! Never employ that tailor again.'"

At a dinner-party at Lord Lyndhurst's, at which Sydney Smith was present, the conversation turned on the question, in India, as to the best punishments, an instance of which was recent. When the subject was pretty well exhausted, Sydney Smith, with a look of horror, asserting that no wife who truly loved her husband could ever be tortured him.

"But, if Lord Lyndhurst were to die, you would be very sorry, would you not, Mrs. Sydney Smith?"

"Lady Lyndhurst," he replied, "would, no doubt, be a disconsolate wife, consider her duty to burn herself, but it would be our duty to put her out; and when the end of the lord Chancellor's life arrived, we should not be but cut like an ordinary widow." And then he went on: "Let's see, I suppose all the judges and then of the lawyers."

"And where, Mr. Smith, are the clergy?"

"All gone to congratulate the new Chancellor."

Throw a piece of meat among boars and a pure of pot among dogs, and what will behave most outrageously—the men or the beasts?

"What is meant by the definition of the needle?" ask. A dunnish of a boarding-school.

"When it runs up into the quick of the nail," was the reply.

Lady Yarmouth asked Garrick one day why Love was always represented as a child. He replied, "Because Love never reaches the age of wisdom and experience."

Mr. Herrin "was never more astonished in the whole course of his life," but when his friend Jones asked him to take a chair, he said he would "wait till one came round."

What part of a ship is like a farmer?—The tiller.

"Oh yes; medicines are cheap there."

STEDY THE FACE.—A story is told of the great French actress, which finely illustrates his knowledge of human nature. He was traveling in Germany, in entire ignorance of its language and currency. Having obtained some small change for some of his French coins, he used to pay couchmen and others in the following manner: Taking a handful of the unanimal specimens from his pocket, he would hand them, one by one, into the coachbox's hands, keeping his eye fixed all the time on the receiver's face. As soon as he perceived the least twinkle of a smile he took back the last coin deposited in the hand, and substituted for it one of smaller value. He afterward found that in pursuing this method he had not overpaid his coachman.

The following trifling anecdote is given as an illustration of Charles Lamb's playfulness:

He was dining one day at Mr. Gillman's. Returning to town in the stage-coach, which was filled with Mr. Gillman's guests, he fell asleep for a minute or two at Kentish Town. A woman asked the coachman, 'Are you full inside?' Lamb, who overheard, put his head through the window, and said, 'I am quite full inside; that last piece of pudding at Mr. Gillman's did the business for me.'

The tongue discovers the state of the mind no less than the pulse. Before you feel the latter, before the philosopher or the physician can judge, the patient must open his mouth.

"TICKETS, SIR!"—A good story is related of a conductor on a railroad, who was a strict church-going man, and was always found punctually in his church on the Sabbath. One Saturday evening his train was in very late, and he did not get home at a time to retire to bed which, however, did not prevent his attending Divine service as usual. During the sermon he unfortunately fell into a troubled sleep, soothed by the monotonous voice of the minister, and in his dreams he thought his seat, throat his hat under his arm, and giving his neighbor his ticket, he exclaimed, "Ticket, Sir!" The astonished neighbor also sprang to his feet, which thoroughly aroused the conductor, and he left the church in a hurry, feeling all eyes turned toward him, instantly comprehended his position, and "Ticket, Sir!" amidst a suppressed titter from the whole congregation.

"John, you seem to gain flesh every day; the grocery business must agree with you." "What did you say, Sam?"

"Well, Simon, I really don't know; but it strikes me it was a pound of butter."

A Frenchman, intending to compliment a young lady by calling her a gentle lamb, said, "She is one mutton as is small."

A late well-known member of the Scottish bar, when a boy, was remarkable for a dandy, and smiled neat and sharp in his temper. He was going to pay a visit in the country, and was making a great fuss about his preparing and putting up of his habiliments. His old aunt was annoyed at last by his bustle, and stopped him by the answer had contemptuous question.

"Where's the use, Jamie, of dressing, that ye mak sic a grand wark about your claes?"

The young coxcomb was stopped, and pettishly replied: "I am going to the devil."

"Deed, Bubbly Jock," was the quiet answer, "ye needna be sae nice; he'll just tak ye as ye are."

HINT TO TRAVELERS.—"Do you see this stick, Sir?" said a very quiet gentleman to Sydney Smith. "This stick has been all round the world, Sir."

"Indeed," said Sydney Smith, "and Sydney; "and yet it is only a stick?"

"The story is remarkable, but pertinent.

A young ensign of a regiment, residing in lodgings the sitting-room of which was very small, was visited by one of his brother officers, who, on taking his leave, said, "Well, Charles, and how much longer do you mean to stop in this wretched hole?" To which he stiffly replied, "Until I become a kernel."

A young man becoming engaged recently, was desirous of presenting his betrothed with a ring appropriately inscribed, but being at a loss what to have engraved on it, called upon a friend for advice. "Well," said the old man, "put on. 'When this you see remember me.'" The young lover was delighted with the idea, and on receiving a beautiful ring, with this inscription: "When this you see remember me," he was astonished.

ON A LADY WITH BRIGHT EYES AND A LOUD VOICE.

Miss Sarah is made of fearful stuff,
Her eyes are bright, her voice is loud;
But then her voice—as loud and rough—
Is not so bright as her eyes are.
You hear her lightning well enough,
But where's the thunder?

A wag, named Tracy, was one evening accosted by a lady named Grimes, thus:

"Tracy, I say dear Mr. Tracy,
That after T you are so racy?"

To which he replied:

"Because, my dear, at various times,
If we leave out G we thus have rimes."

JET-BEDRAGGLED PROFESSIONAL.—"Ain't they put out their lights?" said a fop.

"Be BUFFO. "Not a bit on it; all the winders is blazin' away as if they was a-goin' to have to pay for 'em all!"

JET BUFFO. "Wot a shame to keep a feller out of his bed in this way! Why can't they go to bed like Christians?" (Exit, yawning.)

A man who has a heart of iron can at least boast of always having metal in his chest.

The heat of us sometimes fall into traps and scrapes when least expected. The students at Cornell are not exempt from this danger, and it was most humorously exemplified at the "Junior Exhibition" a few nights ago, by the most distinguished and illustrious personage sometimes employed in human affairs—the man who rocks the cradle. The amiable lady in question had just completed a speech on the "Influence of Woman," and her fervent opinion, when Colonel P—— entered. "See, Colonel," said she, "what a comfort it is to have you here ready for me to read!" The Hon. Colonel, having read it, said, "Now, Miss ——, you have done well enough; it is so, you ever read my thing so vile?" "Never, upon my word." "Then you must have a natural genius for it, to wrote it myself." "Your M——?" said the Colonel, in confusion. "Yes, my mother-in-law." "No, no, Colonel, first thoughts are commonly the best. I agree with you, and I shall therefore continue to write for myself."

A verdant Irish girl just arrived was sent to an intelligence office by the Commissioner of Emigration to find a place at service. She entered a restaurant, where "a stout lady" was wanted, and while waiting for her turn to be interrogated, she espied a dish of light blue cigar lighting a Victorian match on the side of it, and, supposing it to be a dish of fish, was sorely half frightened to see the match blaze up, and the cigar smoke issue from its breath. "Why, what is the matter with you?" said the proprietor, seeing her rush in with such confusion. "Och, sure, Sir, but ye's aint me to the said Nick him self in human form." "What does he want? has he dared to insult a help from my office?" inquired the man. "Yes, Sir," replied the girl, "he's in the shop, Sir." "What did he do? Tell me, and I'll fix him for it," said he, quite enraged. "Why, Sir, while I was talking to him about the wages, he lighted up the bottom of his fist, and put it between his lips to finger, Sir, and gave one strake, and the fire flew out of his fist, and burned the whole of his hand right off to it, right afore my own face! He's the said Nick, sure, Sir!"

A MESSAGE TO COOK.—"Mary, this hoister sauce is quite cold. Misses has sent me down with it, and says you must 'eat it directly, and bring it up again."

"Doctor," said an old lady, the other day, to her family physician, "can you tell me how it is that some folks is born dumb?"

"Why—here's—why, certainly, madam," replied the doctor; "it's owing to the fact that they came into the world without speech."

"La, me!" remarked the old lady. "Now just see what it is to have a physic education; I've been one of my man mess'n a hundred times that se same thing!"

Next to "twenty-four grains," there is nothing like a tame mouse to make a penny valk.

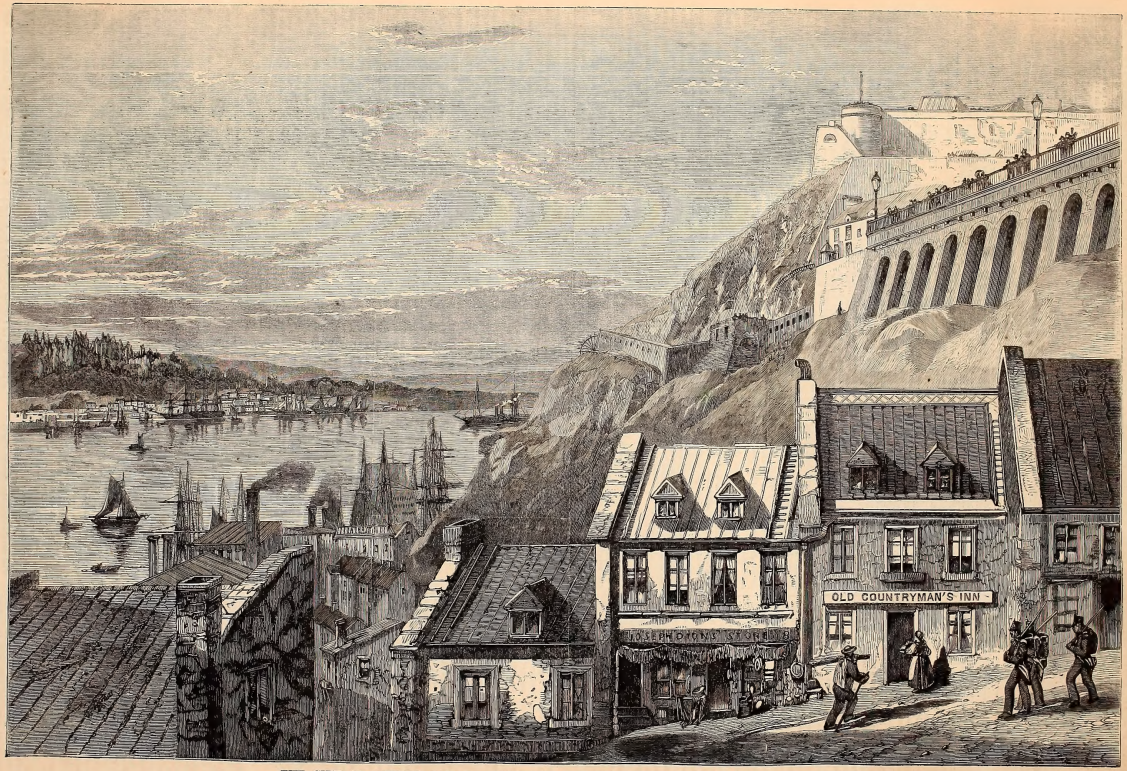
THE CITY OF QUEBEC.

By the time this paper is in the hands of our readers the Prince of Wales will have arrived at Quebec, and we accordingly publish, on the following pages, a fine picture of that time-honored old city, taken from the famous Prescott Gate, in the assault upon which, in the first war, the gallant Montgomery fell.

Of all the cities of this continent Quebec has perhaps the noblest historical associations. Founded over two years before the first house was built by a white man on the island of Manhattan, it was, until the days of the Canadian Rebellion and insurrection, for many many years, the northernmost settlement of white men on the continent—the outpost of civilization; and during the long summer of its early peace ensettlements, it had its share of Indian strife, it suffered less, perhaps from this cause than any other place of equal importance. This was due, in part, to its commanding position, partly to the elaborate works of defense erected by Champlain, and more than all to the humanity and kindness of the French monks and nuns who were the first teachers there, and who made the Indians friends perforce.



Quebec is the only place on this continent where the old French system of government by intendants and creatures of the Royal Council at Paris was thoroughly established. Its archives contain ample testimony to the truth of the picture drawn by De Tocqueville in his "Old Régime and Revolution;" even now the relics of that old régime can perhaps be better studied here than abroad at Quebec than in any part of France. There were intendants and their subordinates, and servants bound to service, tithes and property held in seigneuries, mutation fines and banal mills; dashing sprigs of Parisian nobility, sent out to Canada to expiate some scrape at Versailles, and ship-loads of women sent from Bicetre by the despotic edict of the King's mother, to enable almost the intestinal himself; and under all a peasantry mostly recruited from Normandy and Brittany, quiet, orderly, amiable, knowing little, and seeking not to know more, content to be a great man's serfs, to grind their corn at his mill, to hold their land under him, and to pay him homage and duty whenever they were required so to do. Our picture will enable some to realize this old time; while others have left their mark on every street and on almost every institution in Quebec.

We have not space to detail the history of the old town. All remember how Quebec was assailed, unsuccessfully, by Sir William Phipps in 1690, and how, after a glorious battle, it was taken by General Wolfe in 1759. The walls, which are shown in our picture, were erected at that time, though they have since been much strengthened and improved.

On New-Year's morning 1776, up the steep hill shown in our engraving, James Montgomery marched over snow and ice to storm the gate from the top of which our picture was taken. The terrifling obstacles had been overcome; but just as hope began to dawn in the breasts of the assailants, a discharge of grape from one of the British guns killed their leader, and defeated the attack. It was at last at a desperate but successful moment as Quebec was, with its fortifications, it would have been successfully defended against a much larger force than that could have been gathered from Montgomery's handful of heroes, or Arnold's exhausted and broken-down army. This was the last attack ever made upon Quebec.

The Province of Canada from its British army made but little change in Quebec. Lord Dorchester preserved its ancient laws, priests and nuns kept their enormous property; the feudal lords their seigniories; their tenants their ancient rights and customs, and their laws." The only change was that a British soldier sat in the "palace" instead of a French intendant. In 1791 the Province was established—a poormockery of the country: still it did say thing but legislate for the country; still it lasted over thirty years, until the people grew weary of bureaucratic tyranny and insisted upon a measure of representation. This they obtained in 1841; but the struggle cost Quebec its position as the capital. The Provincial Government during the next few years or so, had to hold its meetings as Ulysses after the siege of Troy, and about as many hardships to endure. It went to Montreal, and was burned down by the mob that was starved; to Toronto, then back to Quebec, then again to Toronto, then again to Quebec, where it now is the latter city, under an arrangement similar to that which prevails in Connecticut, and which obliges the Governor and public officers to oscillate every four years between Quebec and Toronto. It is eventually to go to Ottawa City—late Bytown.

Quebec is now a city of 50,000 souls, a most interesting old city—perhaps the most picturesque,

THE CITY OF QUEBEC, CANADA, FROM THE TOP OF PRESCOTT GATE.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

"SHE SAT ALONE, ON THE COLD GRAY STONE."

VIOLET.

SHE stood where I had used to wait
For her, beneath the gaunt old yew,
And near a column of the gate
That open'd on the avenue.

She stood, amid such tearful gloom;
But close behind her, out of reach,
Lay many a mound of orchard bloom,
And trellis'd blossoms of the peach.

Those peaches blooming to the south,
Those orchard blossoms, seem'd to me
Like kisses of her rosy mouth,
Revived on trellis and on tree:

Kisses, that die not when the thrill
Of joy that answer'd them is mute;
But such as turn to use, and fill
The summer of our days with fruit.

And she, impressing half the sole
Of one small foot against the ground,
Stood resting on the yew-tree bole,
A-tiptoe to each sylvan sound:

She, whom I thought so still and shy,
Express'd in every subtle move
Of lifted hand and open eye
The large expectancy of love;

Until, with all her dewy hair
Dissolved into a golden flame
Of sunshine on the sunless air,
She came to meet me as I came.

But in her face no sunlight shone;
No sunlight, but the sad unrest
Of shade, that sinks from zone to zone
When twilight glimmers in the west.

What grief had touch'd her on the nerve?
For grief alone it is, that stirs
The full ineffable reserve
Of quiet spirits such as hers:

'Twas this—that we had met to part;
That I was going, and that she
Had nothing left but her true heart,
Made strong by memories of me.

What wonder then she quite forgot
Her old repression and control,
And loosened at once and stinted not
The tender tumult of her soul?

What wonder, that she droop'd and lay
In silence, and at length in tears,
On that which should have been the stay
And comfort of her matron years?

But from her bosom, as she leant,
She took a nested violet,
And gave it me—"because 'twas meant
For those who never can forget."

This is the flower: 'tis dry, or wet
With something I may call my own.
Why did I rouse this old regret?
It irks me, now, to be alone:

Triumphs, indeed! Why, after all,
My life has but a leaden hue:
My heart grows like the heart of Saul,
For hatred, and for madness too.

Why sits that smirking minstrel there?
I hate him, and the songs he sings;
They only bring the foul despair
Of inaccessible sweet things:

Why lives he still? Because the ruth
Of those pure days may never die:
He lives, because his name is Youth;
Because his harp is—Memory.

THE BETRAYED.

SHE sat alone, on a cold gray stone,
Where the river made a desolate moan.

The sycamore-trees stood white and bare,
Like sheeted ghosts in the dusky air.

A black cloud floated along the sky,
And a night-bird utter'd a dismal cry.

Sadly she thought of the innocent time,
Wildly she wept for her shame and crime.

Darker and deeper the shadows grow:
He promised to meet her an hour ago.

She sat alone, on the cold gray stone,
And the river flow'd with a sadder moan.

She heard the hum of the distant town,
The patter of dead leaves falling down.

She heard the toad in the long dank grass,
But never his tread—alas, alas!

The morning came with its golden light,
To the sycamore-trees so bare and white.

The mists that slept on the river's brim
Went up like the wings of the cherubim.

The water-lilies so cold and fair
Were tangled with tresses of bright brown hair.

The osiers bent with a quiet grace
Over a form with a still, white face.

The river flow'd with a desolate moan,
And dead leaves fell on the cold gray stone.

WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONTINUED.

We had not been married quite a month yet. If my heart was heavy, if my resolution for a moment faltered again, when I looked at her face turned faithfully to my pillow in her sleep, when I saw her hand resting open on the coverlet, as if it was waiting unconsciously for mine, surely there was some excuse for me? I only allowed myself a few minutes to kneel down at the bedside, and to look close at her—so close that her breath, as it came and went, fluttered on my face. I only touched her hand and her cheek with my lips at parting. She stirred in her sleep, and murmured my name, but without waking. I lingered for an instant at the door to look at her again. "God bless and keep you, my darling!" I whispered, and left her.

Marian was at the stair-head waiting for me. She had a folded slip of paper in her hand.

"The landlord's son has brought this for you," she said. "He has got a cab at the door; he says you ordered him to keep it at your disposal."

"Quite right, Marian. I want the cab; I am going out again."

I descended the stairs as I spoke, and looked into the sitting-room to read the slip of paper by the light on the table. It contained these two sentences, in Pesce's handwriting:

"Your letter is received. If I don't see you before the time you mention, I will break the seal when the clock strikes."

I placed the paper in my pocket-book and made for the door. Marian met me on the threshold, and pushed me back into the room, where the candle-light fell full on my face. She held me by both hands, and her eyes fastened searchingly on mine.

"I see!" she said, in a low, eager whisper. "You are trying the last chance to-night."

"Yes, the last chance and the best," I whispered back.

"Not alone! Oh, Walter, for God's sake, not alone! Let me go with you. Don't refuse me because I'm only a woman. I must go! I will go! I'll wait outside in the cab!"

It was my turn now to hold her. She tried to break away from me, and get down first to the door.

"If you want to help me," I said, "stop here, and sleep in my wife's room to-night. Only let me go away with my mind easy about Laura, and I answer for every thing else. Come, Marian, give me a kiss, and show that you have the courage to wait till I come back."

I dared not allow her time to say a word more. She tried to hold me again. I unclasped her hands, and was out of the room in a moment. The boy below heard me on the stairs, and opened the hall door. I jumped into the cab before the driver could get off the box. "Forest Road, St. John's Wood," I called to him through the front window. "Double fare, if you get there in a quarter of an hour." "I'll do it, Sir." I looked at my watch. Eleven o'clock—not a minute to lose.

The rapid motion of the cab; the sense that every instant new was bringing me nearer to the Count; the conviction that I was embarked at last, without let or hinderance, on my hazardous enterprise, heated me into such a fever of excitement, that I shouted to the man to go faster and faster. As we left the streets, and crossed St. John's Wood Road, my impatience so completely overpowered me, that I stood up in the cab and stretched my head out of the window to see the end of the journey before we reached it. Just as a church clock in the distance struck the quarter past, we turned into the Forest Road. I stopped the driver a little away from the Count's house—paid, and dismissed him—and walked on to the door.

As I approached the garden gate, I saw another person advancing toward it also, from the direction opposite to mine. We met under the gas-lamp in the road, and looked at each other. I instantly recognized the light-haired foreigner, with the scar on his cheek; and I thought he recognized me. He said nothing; and, instead of stopping at the house, as I did, he slowly walked on. Was he in the Forest Road by accident? or had he followed the Count home from the Opera?

I did not pursue those questions. After waiting a little, till the foreigner had slowly passed out of sight, I rang the gate bell. It was then twenty minutes past eleven—late enough to make it quite easy for the Count to get rid of me by the excuse that he was in bed.

The only way of providing against this contingency was to send in my name, without asking any preliminary questions, and to let him know, at the same time, that I had a serious motive for wishing to see him at that late hour. Accordingly, while I was waiting, I took out my card, and wrote under my name, "On important business." The maid-servant answered the door while I was writing the last word in pencil, and asked me distrustfully what I "pleased to want."

"Be so good as to take that to your master," I replied, giving her the card.

I saw, by the girl's hesitation of manner, that, if I had asked for the Count in the first instance, she would only have followed her instructions by telling me he was not at home. She was staggered by the confidence with which I gave her the card. After staring at me in great perturbation, she went back into the house with my message, closing the door, and leaving me to wait in the garden.

In a minute or so she reappeared. "Her master's compliments, and would I be so obliging as to say what my business was?" "Take my compliments back," I replied; "and say that the business can not be mentioned to any one but your master." She left me again, again returned, and this time asked me to walk in.

There was no lamp in the hall; but by the dim light of the kitchen candle which the girl had brought up-stairs with her, I saw an elderly lady steal noiselessly out of a back room on the ground-floor. She cast one viperish look at me as I entered the hall, but said nothing, and went slowly up stairs without returning my bow. My familiarity with Mariam's journal sufficiently assured me that the elderly lady was Madame Fosco.

The servant led me to the room which the Countess had just left. I entered it, and found myself face to face with the Count.

He was still in his evening dress, except his coat, which he had thrown across a chair. His shirt-sleeves were turned up at the wrists, but no higher. A carpet-bag was on one side of him, and a box on the other. Books, papers, and articles of wearing apparel were scattered about the room. On a table, at one side of the door, stood the cage, so well known to me by description, which contained his white mice. The canaries and the cockatoo were probably in some other room. He was seated before the box, packing it, when I went in, and rose with some papers in his hand to receive me. His face still bore the plain traces of the shock that had overwhelmed him at the Opera. His fat cheeks hung loose; his cold grey eyes were furtively vigilant; his voice, look, and manner were all sharply suspicious alike, as he advanced a step to meet me, and requested, with distant civility, that I would take a chair.

"I AM THINKING," SAID HE, "WHETHER I SHALL ADD TO THE DISORDER IN THIS ROOM BY SCATTERING YOUR BRAINS ABOUT THE FIRE-PLACE."

"You come here on business, Sir?" he said.

"I am at a loss to know what that business can possibly be."

The unconcealed curiosity with which he looked hard in my face while he spoke convinced me that I had passed unnoticed by him at the Opera. He had seen Fosca first; and from that moment, till he left the theatre, he had evidently seen nothing else. My name would necessarily suggest to him that I had not come into the house with other views than the purpose toward himself; but he appeared to be utterly ignorant, thus far, of the real nature of my errand to him.

"I am fortunate in finding you here to-night," I said. "You seem to be on the point of taking a journey?"

"Is your business connected with my journey?"

"In some degree."

"In what degree? Do you know where I am going to?"

"No. I only know why you are leaving London."

He slipped by me with the quickness of thought, locked the door of the room, and put the key in his pocket.

"You are wrong, Mr. Hartright, are excellently well acquainted with one another by reputation," he said. "Did it by any chance occur to you, when you came to this house, that I was not the sort of man you could trifle with?"

"It did occur to me," I replied. "And I have not come to trifle with you. I am here on a matter of life and death; and if that door which you have locked was open at this moment, nothing you could say or do would induce me to pass through it."

I walked further into the room, and stood opposite to him, on the rug before the fire-place. He drew a chair in front of the door, sat down on it, with his left arm resting on the table. The cage with the white mice was close to him; and their little creatures were running out of their sleeping-place, as his heavy arm shook the table, and peered at him through the gaps in the smartened wires.

"On a matter of life and death?" he repeated to himself. "Those words are more serious, perhaps, than you think. What do you mean?"

"What I say."

The perspiration broke out thickly on his broad forehead. His left hand stole over the edge of the table. There was a drawer in it, with a lock; and the key was in the left hand finger and thumb closed over the key, but did not turn it.

"So you know why I am leaving London?" he went on. "Tell me the reason, if you please." He turned the key, and unlocked the drawer as he spoke.

"I can do better than that," I replied; "I can show you the reason, if you like."

"How can you show it?"

"You have got your coat off," I said. "Roll up the shirt sleeve on your left arm, and you will see it there."

The same livid, leaden change passed over his face which I had seen pass over it at the theatre. The deadly glitter in his eyes shone steady and straight into mine. He said nothing: his left hand slowly opened the table drawer, and softly slipped into it. The harsh grating noise of something heavy that he was moving, among the tin, sounded for a moment, then ceased. The silence that followed was so intense that the faint ticking nibble of the white mice at their wire was distinctly audible where I stood.

My life hung by a thread; and I knew it. At that final moment I thought with his mind—I felt with his fingers; I was as certain, as if I had seen it, of what he kept hidden from me in the drawer.

"Wait a little," I said. "You have got the door locked; you see I don't move—you see my hands are empty. Wait a little. I have something more to say."

"Is it not said enough?" he replied, with a sudden composure, so unnatural and so ghastly that it struck me anew as no outward violence that could have tried them. "I want one moment for my own thoughts, if you please. Do you guess what I am thinking about?"

"Perhaps I do."

"I am thinking," he said, "whether I shall add to the disorder in this room by scattering your brains about the fire-place."

If I had moved at that moment, I saw in his face that he would have done it.

"I advise you to read two lines of writing which I have in my pocket," I replied, "before you finally decide that question."

The proposal appeared to excite his curiosity. He nodded his head. I took Fosca's acknowledgment of the receipt of my letter out of my pocket-book, handed it to him at arm's-length, and resumed, to my former position in front of the fire-place.

He read the lines aloud: "Your letter is received. If I don't hear from you before the time you mention, I will break the seal when the clock strikes."

Another man in his position would have needed some explanation of these words—the Count felt no such necessity. One reading of the note showed him the precaution that I had taken, as plainly as if he had been present at the time when I adopted it. The expression of his face changed on the instant, and his hand came out of the drawer empty.

"I don't lock up my drawer, Mr. Hartright," he said; "and I shall not say that I am not vexed to see your brains about the fire-place yet. But I am a just man, even to my enemy, and I will acknowledge beforehand that they are cleverer brains than I thought them. Come to the point, Sir! You want something of me?"

"I do; and I mean to have it."

"On conditions?"

"On no conditions."

His hand dropped into the drawer again.

"Bah! we are traveling in a circle," he said; "and time flies—and the chances may change again. Your time is deplorably imprudent, Sir; moderate it on the spot! The risk of shooting you on the place where you stand is less to me than the risk of letting you out of this house, except on conditions that I dictate and approve. You have not got Professor Fosca's friend to deal with now; you are face to face with Fosca! If the lives of twenty Hartrights were the stepping-stones to my safety, over all those stones I would go, sustained by my sublime indifference, self-balanced by my philosophical calm. Respect me, if you love your own life! I summon you to answer three questions before you open your lips again. Hear them, and they are necessary to this interview. Answer them—they are necessary to me." He held up one finger of his right hand. "First question!" he said. "You come here possessed of information which may be true or may be false. Where did you get it?"

"I decline to tell you."

"No matter: I shall find out. If that information is true—mind, I say, with the whole force of my resolution, if—you are making your market of it by coming to me? Is it for love or by treachery of some other man. I note that circumstance, for future use, in my memory. Speak frogen nothing. Second question! He held up another finger. "Second question! Those times you invited me to read are without signature. Who wrote them?"

"A man whom I have every reason to depend on, and whom you have every reason to fear."

My answer reached him to some purpose. His hand hovered irresolutely over the drawer.

"How long do you give me," he asked, putting his third question in a quieter tone, "before the clock strikes and the seal is broken?"

"Time enough for you to come to my terms," I replied.

"Give me a plainer answer, Mr. Hartright. What hour is the clock to strike?"

"Nine to-morrow morning."

"Nine to-morrow morning! Yes, yes—your crap is laid for me before I can get my passport regulated and leave London. It is not exciting, it is ingenious! We will see about this presently. I can keep you hostage here, and bargain with you for your release later. Nine to-morrow! In the mean time be so good next as to mention your terms."

"You shall hear them. They are simple, and soon stated. You know whose interests I represent in coming here?"

He smiled with the most supreme composure, and carelessly waved his right hand.

"I consent to hazard a guess," he said, jeeringly. "A lady's interests, I suppose?"

"My wife's interests."

He looked at me with the first honest expression that had crossed his face in my presence—an expression of blank amazement. I could see that I said in his opinion, the words of a fortune of ten thousand pounds was your motive for it."

He said nothing. His hand hovered over-clouded suddenly by a lowering anxiety.

"Keep your gain," I said. (His face lightened again immediately, and like a mirror gave me in wider and wider astonishment.) "I am not here to disgrace myself by bargaining in the manner which you suppose—give me hands, and which has been the price of a vile crime—"

Gently, Mr. Hartright. Your moral claptrap we have an excellent name for in England—keep them for yourself and your own countrymen, if you please. I am a foreigner, accustomed to a legacy left to my excellent wife by the late Mr. Fairlie. Place the affair on those grounds, and I will discuss it, if you please, but not on any sentiments, however, the subject is deplorably sordid. I prefer to pass it over. I invite you to resume the discussion of your terms. What do you demand?"

In the first place, I demand a full confession of the conspiracy in which you have acted to my prejudice, by yourself."

He raised his finger again. "One!" he said, checking me off with the steady attention of a practical man.

"In the second place, I demand a plain proof, which does not depend on your personal reservation, of the date at which my wife left Blackwater Park, and reached London."

"So! so! you can lay your finger, I see, on the weak place," he remarked, composedly. "Two!"

"At present, no more."

"Good! You have mentioned your terms; now listen to mine." The responsibility to myself of admitting what you are pleased to call the conspiracy, is less, perhaps, upon the whole, than the responsibility of laying you dead on that hearth-rug. Let us say that I meet your proposal—on my own conditions. The statement you demand of me shall be written, and the plain proof shall be produced. You call a letter from my late lamented friend, informing me of the sad hour of his wife's arrival in London, written, signed, and dated by himself, a proof, I suppose? I can give you this. I can also send you to the man of whom I hired the carriage to fetch my visitor from the railway, on the day when she arrived. His order-book may help you to your date, even if his coachman who drove me proves to be of no use. These things I can do, and will do, on conditions. I recite them. First condition! Madame Fosca and I leave this house when and how we please, without interference of any kind on your part. Second condition! You wait here, in company with me, to see my agent, who is coming at nine o'clock in the morning to regulate my affairs. You give my agent a written order to the man who has got your sealed letter to receive the contents of it. You put here till my agent places that letter unopened in my hands. You will then allow me one clear half hour to leave the house; after which you resume your own freedom of action, and go where you please. Third condition! You promise the satisfaction of a gentleman for your impression into my private affairs, and for the language you have allowed yourself to use to me at this conference. The time and place, abroad, to be fixed in a letter from my hand when I am safe on the Continent, and that letter to contain a strip of paper measuring accurately the length of my sword. Those are my terms. Will you please to begin?—Yes or No?"

The extraordinary mixture of prompt decision, far-sighted cunning, and mountebank bravado in this speech staggered me for a moment, and only for a moment. Before I could reconsider was, whether I was justified or not in possessing myself of the means of establishing Laura's identity at the cost of allowing the scoundrel who had robbed her of it to escape me with impunity. I knew that the motive of preserving the secret of the birth of my wife's birth-place from which she had been driven out as an impostor, and of publicly erasing the lie that still pollutted her mother's tombstone, was far purer, in its freedom from all taint of evil passion, than any motive to which the man had mingled itself with my purpose from the first. And yet I can not honestly say that my own personal considerations were enough to decide the struggle in me by themselves. They were helped by my remembrance of Sir Percival's death. How could I tell at the last moment, if the working of the retribution there been snatched from my feeble hands? What right had I to decide, in my own puerile ignorance of the future, that this man, too, must escape with impunity, because he escaped me? I thought of these things—perhaps with the superstition I have been in many; perhaps with a sense working of my own responsibility. It was then, when I had fastened my hold on him at last, to loosen it again of my own accord; but I forced myself to make the sacrifice. In three words, I determined to be guided by the one higher motive of which I was certain, the motive of serving the cause of Laura and the cause of Truth.

"I accept your conditions," I said. "With one reservation on my part."

"What reservation is that to be?" he asked.

"It refers to the sealed letter," I answered. "I require you to destroy it, unopened, in my presence, as soon as you receive it from my hands."

My object in making this stipulation was simply to prevent him from carrying away written evidence of the nature of my communications with Fosca. The fact of my communication he would necessarily discover, when I gave the address to him on the next morning. But he could make no use of it on his own unsupported testimony, even if he really ventured to try the experiment, which I considered in no the slightest apprehension on Fosca's account.

I great surprise, however, he replied, after considering the question gravely for a minute or two. "It is not worth dispute; the letter shall be destroyed unopened into my hands."

He rose, as he spoke, from the chair in which he had been sitting opposite to me up to this time. His left hand appeared to be still in his mind from the whole pressure on it of the interview between us, thus far. "Our" he cried, suddenly raising his voice, "our business was but while it lasted. Take a seat, Mr. Hartright, and let us, like gallant gentlemen, exchange polite attentions in the mean time. Permit me to take the liberty of presenting you to my wife."

He unlocked and opened the door. "Eleanor!" he called out, in his deep voice. The lady of the vigorous discussion of the Opera-house, Mr. Hartright," said the Count, introducing us with easy dignity. "My angel," he went on, addressing her in the tone of a man who could sing up allow you time to make me some nice strong coffee? I have writing business to transact with Mr. Hartright, and I require the full possession of my intelligence to do justice to me!"

Madame Fosca bowed her head twice—once sternly to me, once submissively to her husband—and glided out of the room.

The Count walked to a writing-table near the window, opened his desk, and took from it several pieces of paper and a bundle of quill pens. He scattered the pens about the table, so that they might lie ready in all directions to be taken up when wanted, and then cut the paper into a heap of narrow slips, of the form used by professional writers for the pens. "I shall make this a remarkable document," he said, looking at me over his shoulder. "Habits of literary composition are perfectly familiar to me. One of the rarest of all the intellectual accomplishments that man can possess is the grand faculty of arranging his ideas. Immense privilege! I possess it! Do you?"

He marched backward and forward in the room until the coffee appeared, humming to himself, and marking the places at which objects occurred in the arrangement of his ideas, by striking his forehead, from time to time, with the palm of his hand. The enormous audacity with which he seized on the situation in which I had placed him, and made it the pedestal on which his vanity mounted for the over-reached purpose of self-display, mastered my astonishment by main force. Sincerely as I loathed the man, the prodigious strength of his character, even in its most trivial aspects, impressed me in spite of myself.

The coffee was brought in by Madame Fosca. He kissed her hand in grateful acknowledgment, and escorted her to the door. She courtesied out a cup of coffee for himself, and took it to the writing-table.

"May I pour your some coffee, Mr. Hartright?" he said, before he sat down.

I declined.

"What! you think I shall poison you?" he said, gayly. "The English intellect is sound, as far as it goes," he continued, seating himself at the table; "but it has one great defect—it is always cautious in the wrong place."

He dipped his pen in the ink, rubbed the first slip of paper before him, with a thump of his hand on the desk, cleared his throat, and began. He wrote with great rapidity and facility, in so large and bold a hand, and with such wide spaces between the lines, that he reached the bottom of the slip in twenty lines, and was minutes certainly from the time when he started at the top. Each slip as he finished it was paged, and tossed over his shoulder, out of his way, on the floor. When his first pen was worn out, that went over his shoulder also; and he proceeded to the second from the supply scattered about the table. Slip after slip, by dozens, by fifties, by hundreds, flew over his shoulder, before an entire side of me had he had snowed himself up in paper all round his chair. Hour after hour passed—and there I sat, watching; and there he sat, writing. Never stopped, except to sip his coffee; and when that was exhausted, to ring for more. Never looked round to time. One o'clock struck, two, three, four—and still the slips flew about all round him; still the unstopping pen scraped its way rapidly from top to bottom of the page; still the white chaos of paper rose higher and higher all round his chair. At four o'clock I heard the sudden clatter of the pen, indicative of the flourish with which he signed his name. "Bravo!" he cried—bringing the last slip with the contents of a young man, and looking me straight in the face with a smile of superb triumph.

"Don, Mr. Hartright" he announced, with a self-renovating thump of his fist on his broad chest. "Done with my own profound satisfaction—to your profound astonishment, no doubt, you read what I have written. The subject is exhausted: the letter—Fosca—is not. Our next care to the arrangement of my slips, to the revision of my slips, to the reading of my slips—addressed, emphatically, to your private ear. Four o'clock has just struck. Good! Arrangement, revision, reading, from four to five. Short snooze of restoration for myself, from five to six. Final preparations, from six to seven. Affair of agent and sealed letter, from seven to eight. At eight, Sir, before the door and the prey-carriage!"

He sat down cross-legged on the floor among his papers; strung them together with a bodkin and a piece of string; revised them; wrote all the titles and honors by which he was personally distinguished on the back of the first page; and then read the manuscript to me, with loud theatrical emphasis and profuse theatrical gesticulation. The moments have an extraordinary value in the estimation of a man who has been for one long of forming his own opinion of the document. It will be sufficient to mention here that I answered the purpose.

His next proceeding was to write me the address of the house in Paris to which I should direct the fly to go to the railway, and to hand me Sir Percival's letter. I read this last with breathless interest. It only contained a few lines; but it distinctly announced the arrival of "Lady Glyde" in London, by the mid-day train from Blackwater, on the 25th of July, 1850. The date which I had supposed, one day after the date of her (assumed) death on the doctor's certificate.

"Are you satisfied?" said the skimmer.

"I am."

"A quarter past five," he said, looking at his watch. "Time for my restorative snooze. I personally resemble Napoleon the Great (as you may have seen in pictures), Mr. Hartright; I resemble that immortal man in my power of commanding sleep at will. Excuse me one moment. I will summon Madame Fosca, to keep you from feeling dull."

Knowing as well as he did that he was summoning Madame Fosca to prevent me from leaving the house while he was asleep, I made no reply, and occupied myself in trying on the papers which he had placed in my possession.

The lady came in, cool, pale, and venomous as ever. "Eleanor, my angel," he said to her, "I said the Count. He placed a chair for her, kissed her hand for the second time, withdrew to a sofa, and in three minutes was as peacefully and happily asleep as the most virtuous man in existence.

Fosca took a book from the table, sat down, and looked at me with the steady, vindictive malice of a woman who never forgot and never forgave.

"I have been listening to your conversation with my husband," she said. "If I had been in his place, I would have laid you dead on the hearth-rug."

With those words she opened her book and never looked at me or spoke to me from that time till the time when her husband woke.

He opened his eyes and rose from the sofa, accurately to an hour from the time when he had gone to sleep.

"I feel infinitely refreshed," he remarked. "Eleanor, my good wife, are you all ready up stairs? That is well. My little packing here can be completed in ten minutes—my traveling-dress assumed in ten minutes more. What remains before the agent comes?" He looked about the room, and noticed the cage with his white mice in it. "Ah!" he cried, pitiously; "a last incarceration of my sympathetic companions. My innocent pets! my little cherished children! what am I to do with you? Not the penalty, we are settled however; for the present, we travel incessantly—the less baggage we carry, the better for ourselves. Oh, my cockatoo, my canaries, and my little mice—who will cherish them when their good Papa is gone?"

He walked about the room, then he thought. He had not been at all troubled about writing his confession, but he was visibly perplexed and distressed about the far more important question of the disposal of his pets. After long consideration, he suddenly sat down again at the writing-table.

"An idea!" he exclaimed. "I will offer my canaries and my cockatoo to this vast Metropolis—my agent shall present them, in my name, to the Zoological Gardens of London. The Documents that describes them shall be drawn out on the spot."

He began to write, repeating the words as they flowed from his pen.

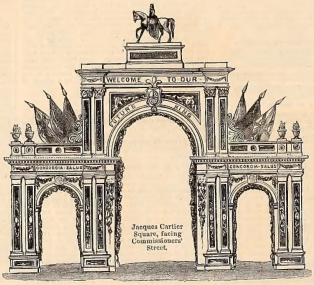
"Number One. Cockatoo of transcendant plumage: attraction, of himself, to all visitors of taste. Number Two. Canaries—of great vivacity and intelligence: worthy of the garden of Eden, worthy also of the garden of the Zoological Gardens of London. To

THE VISIT OF THE PRINC

THE VICTORIA TUBULAR BRIDGE

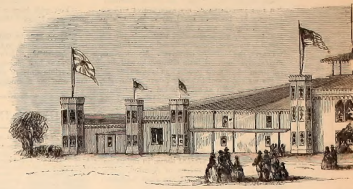
We publish herewith an engraving of the Victoria Tubular Bridge at Montreal, Canada, which the Prince of Wales has come to America to inaugurate. It is, as most of our readers may be aware, one of the noblest works of engineering in the world, and in its way perfectly unique.

We give, likewise, in illustration of the Prince's visit to Montreal, seven of the grand arches raised by the city in honor of its visitor, and the building erected for the grand ball that is to be given in his honor.



The Victoria Bridge was first planned over seven years ago, in July, 1853. The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada had then been pretty fully mapped out, and it being the design of the engineers of that work to run their road on the north side of the St. Lawrence above, and on the south side below, Montreal, a bridge at that point became an engineering as well as a commercial necessity. There were enormous difficulties in the way. The distance from shore to shore was very great: the river at that point is a rapid; in winter ice forms in large masses, which in spring travel downward with a force which, up to that time, no structure contrived by the hand of man had ever been able to withstand. With these obstacles in view, a consultation was held in July, 1853, between Mr. Ross, the engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the late Mr. Robert Stephenson, and the Victoria Tubular Bridge, on the plan of the Britannia Bridge across the Menai Straits, was forthwith planned.

It took nine months to collect material for the work; three steamers and forty barges were kept constantly busy, and an army of workmen was imported from England. On 24th May, 1854, the coffer-dam for pier No. 1 was floated to its place, and throughout that summer the work was vigorously prosecuted. On Friday, December 1, the winter's inclemency came suddenly upon the country, and stopped all out-of-door operations; and on the 6th the ice had so increased in the river that all communication was cut off, and steamboats had ceased to run. The result of this rapid change in the state of the weather was that the dams of pier No. 1, which it had been intended to tow into dock, got fixed in the ice, and the contractors were obliged to abandon them to their fate. On the 6th of January, 1855, the usual "January thaw," as it is termed, occurred, and the water in the river rose fifteen feet, and dislodged and broke up the ice, which continued for some hours to come down with the current in large quantities. At mid-day it assumed so formidable a character in the vicinity of the bridge works that the dams and other temporary erections could no longer resist its force. Suddenly the whole gave way, and in less time than we take to write it there were not two sticks left together. The piers, thus suddenly stripped of their coverings, were now to be seen in their proper proportions to all appearance untouched and unimpaired, which the result of closer examination proved to be the case.



All the work had to be begun again; but, nothing daunted, as soon as navigation opened in 1855 the engineers renewed their labors, and that year some more pier dams were successfully laid. Winter began on 30th October, and the works were then suspended till the following June. During the season of 1856 a good deal of work was done; at the close of navigation nine piers and the two abutments were complete. In 1857 five more piers were built, and the iron work was commenced. In the spring of 1858 the bridge was put to a severe test. The breaking up of the ice on the 1st of April was the most extraordinary in its effects that scientific men have ever witnessed in the colony. On the 30th of March the river was clear of ice to a certain extent above the bridge; but as yet no movement took place below; but on the following day, at 1 P.M., the river was rising fast, and on the 1st of April the general movement in the ice was observable, which continued for one hour, then suddenly stopped, the water still rising and continuing to do so till next day, and, as unexpectedly as before, a grand movement took place. The water was noticed to rise four feet in two minutes—the fields of ice accompanying this movement extending to an area of more than five hundred square miles, and so quick and overwhelming in its appearance that great numbers of the townspeople, who had congregated upon the quays in anticipation of what was to happen, had as suddenly to wheel about and run for their lives, by gaining as quickly as possible the nearest heights in the adjoining streets. This movement lasted about twenty minutes, and destroyed several portions of the substantial quay walls along the river, where it pressed the hardest, into atoms. The ice, in its progress between the piers of the bridge, was broken up by the force of the blow as soon as it came in contact with the cut-water. Occasional cakes of ice were strong enough to rise up and rear upon and against the pointed ness of the pier, until by the force of the water it was speedily made to roll over into the stream, and in a moment was out of sight. It was not until the 5th of April that the river was clear of ice, and as smooth as a mill-pond—the water having fallen seven feet. In a few days it fell to its ordinary level, and steamboats and other craft were once more able to resume their occupations on the river.

The engineers were now able also to examine with minuteness the extent and effects of the winter upon the works of the bridge. They found the preparatory measures proceeded with upon the ice in the winter for facilitating the construction of the remaining dams were all more or less disturbed, some carried away altogether, others so completely injured as to render them useless. Happily the permanent works were found to have sustained no damage whatever, excepting one stone dislatched from No. 9 pier, which was left unfinished the previous year at the height of 18 feet above water level.

This was, happily, the last disaster which the engineers were fated to encounter. Throughout 1858 and 1859 the work progressed rapidly and successfully, until, in the full of the latter year, the bridge was completed, and the railway trains of the Grand Trunk Railroad passed through it successfully. It is, as it stands, one of the greatest engineering works in the world, and well deserves that the Prince of Wales should cross the ocean to inaugurate it formally.

We can not do better than sum up this brief account with a few statistics. The first stone of pier No. 1 was laid on 20th July, 1854; the first passenger train passed through the bridge on 17th December, 1859. The following are the dimensions of the bridge (the total cost being $6,300,000): Total length of bridge, 9184 feet linear. Number of spans, 25; 24 of 242 feet; one of 330 feet. Height from surface of water to underside of centre tube, 60 feet. Height from bed of river to top of centre tube, 101 feet. Greatest depth of water, 22 feet. Greatest rapidity of current, 7 miles an hour. Cubic feet of masonry, 3,000,000. Cubic feet of timber, in temporary work, 2,500,000. Cubic yards of clay used in puddling dams, 146,000. Tons of iron in tubular 8250. Number of rivets, 2,500,000.

THE OLD PLAYER'S STORY.

I once embraced the offer of an intelligent master of a stock-farm, to visit the establishment under his charge. He received me at the door, and led me through the various rooms. The occupants were nearly all old men, a few—very few—were younger and sickly-looking, all dressed alike in the gray suit, and looking all alike, in a sullen and hopeless expression that is very saddening to one on human faces. Of course I asked questions by the score, and was answered. Few of them liked to discuss the cause of their ending their days in that place. Some few said it was misfortune; many declared it self-fellows—that their children had died; some did not know exactly what it was had brought them there. They had very little bread where they were, they said, and the water smiled.

"You've enough to eat, Brown?"

"Yes. I don't starve, but somehow never feel full, after living for so much on it, I don't pleasant sort of feeling that; still I can't help it, I am here, and shall be till I come."

The last was said half regretful, half expectant in its tone.

"He is a fair sample of your birds, I suppose," said I.

"Yes, about the average, perhaps a little better than the general run. I've rather a curious specimen of the pauper here somewhere. I like the old fellow, his is a sad case. Where's Gowling?"

"He is in the garden, Sir," said one. "Ye can just see him out of the window here, Sir, sitting under the lime-tree, there, Sir," and a finger a la-de, just a little dirty, was stretched out to indicate the place of Gowling.

I of course looked, and saw a man I should have judged to be about sixty-five sitting under the tree. He was a good head, and seemed busy reading through the wrinkles on his face, or it might have been the vacant smile I had seen on other faces, though I could hardly tell what it was at that distance.

On my going up to him, the old man rose, and took off his hat with a grace and ease of manner, and withal a certain dignity, that made me instantly raise my hat.

"I would you like to sit down, Sir?" said he; and he looked at me.

"Thank you," I stammered, and sat down. I had not recovered from my astonishment—the pauper, with his cap that never could have cost six-pence, exhibiting what is the manners and ease of a gentleman. I was astonished, and sat silent.

"You've been through the house?"

"Oh, yes—I went through this afternoon."

"Curious places. Curious people in it."

"Yes; but they are all much alike in the main features, though diverse—but manners, expression of face. Most of them are from the same class, 'the laboring poor,' as one of our poets has emphatically called them. You find them very congenial companions?"

"Not very. They are kind, or mean to be; and would be respectful, if there were not adverse influences to the existence of such a feeling. The chaplain's another against me."

"You smoke, Mr. Gowling?"

"I do, when I can," and the old man laughed—a laugh that was once utter and glorious.

I offered him my cigar-case. He made his selection, and struck a light with the fusee. I lit my own, and we sat there enjoying the first few whiffs, when I presently noticed my companion's cigar had no light—it had gone out. I looked in the fusee-box—it was empty.

"Oh, never mind. I'll keep it till another time."

I handed him a light.

"No, Sir—it's no use to me. My lungs are not what they used to be, and I can't light it unless you draw at the same time. I can light it then."

I drew my breath till the end of my cigar was almost a flame, and then the old man, with his feeble breath, kindled his own. I noticed him more as our faces were close together. His brow, rather high and rounded, was crossed in every direction by wrinkles; the eyes were dark, the eyebrows almost gone; while the cheeks more resembled parchment than aught else. The chin was shaven, and a few locks of thin gray hair just showed under the cap.

"Well," said he, after some few puffs at his cigar, "what do you think of me?"

I was blushing again. I really thought he had been too much occupied with his cigar to observe how much I noticed him.

I scarcely know. It is so unusual to find one having your education in such a place as this that I am sure I hardly know what to think of your being here."

"You talk of my education. What do you suppose I am?"

"I was going to say an actor, but that—"

"You're right; I am an actor. I am," he sighed, "much so."

"You really interest me very much. I should be glad, very glad—should take it as a favor, if you would tell me the—be—indeed, the story of your life. I am very much interested."

"My dear Sir—"

Now I did feel that it was not usual for men in the dress of paupers to address the friends of the master as "My dear Sir."

"My dear Sir, I shall be very happy if I can amuse you for a little while—I fear it's no use beginning before tea. I expect the bell to ring directly. Ah, there it is. Will you come in and see the carnivora fed, as they used to say when I was young?"

I went in with him, arm in arm—how the paupers did stare at seeing me walking thus—arm in arm!—and then I saw them sitting down at a long table—the little wedge of bread and the smaller one of cheese were distributed, and disposed of with a flavor over a longer time. I noticed my companion had a cup of tea brought him, which was a favor accorded to but few: half the cup and it was over, and we came out again into the garden and sat down once more. He seemed revived.

"I like tea. Tea was the one not allowed many stimulants here, and I only get this every day by the order of the doctor. A young fellow I used to know many years ago. I was playing Othello at the time in Bradford, and an accident having happened to one of the shifters, he was called in. He set his leg—it was broken—and helped him with money afterward, I know, and I owe a thing to him. He was just beginning to practice then, and thought it a fine thing to know an actor. He orders me tea now;" and the old man was silent.

"Try another cigar, Mr. Gowling, and you'll do better;" and he did. It really was a pleasure to see him slowly and weakly draw the cigar-smoke, and then as slowly and weakly let it curl out of his scarcely moved mouth—it was so quiet and yet so expressive.

He smoked on in silence for some time, and I let him without interruption.

"Did you ever," he said, at last, very. Well, to begin. I was born in this town of Burnton something less than sixty years ago. My father was a small tradesman, and was one of the best-abused he could afford :ill I was a little over thirteen. He was rather proud of me, poor old father, I used to recite my public days, and he would read, and repeat Latin and Greek orations, of which the meaning was one of the mysteries reserved for what I must have been to my hearers I don't know. My father took me away from school to the shop. He was a tailor, and I was put to learn it. Joy with a grain of life in him would choose to be a tailor as a matter of taste. As for me, it worried me to death to sit long at a time, and I hated stitch, and I used to beguile the time by reciting and reading to the few men my father employed, and they did it as a treat for me, and for the amusement it afforded them. At the age of fifteen I took part in some private theatricals in the town, and found the bustle and excitement much more pleasant than the dull shop-work. This went on till I was nearly of age, when there came to the town I went to the manager and asked him to take me. He laughed, for I was fit for nothing. Of course I was the last actor in the town to look for a man-at-arms, too young for a first, second, or even third lover, and too old for any accidental boy parts. I was disheartened, but I had not learn to leave the then detested shop. My father was rather of a serious turn. He heard of my going to the manager, and locked me in the house next ten, and fed me on bread and water. This was rather too much for me, I thought, and said when the bread and water came one morning there was no one to eat it. I was pleased to find myself with a pair of keys about my person wrapped up in a handkerchief, about 't face the world, and try to wring the hard-held honors from stern fortune's hands. That's how I began, Sir. I need scarcely tell you that sitting here I often regretted that fine May morning's work that took me from home.

"I went to one town after another, and at each applied to the manager of the theatre, and tried hard to get in as any thing. I was not; my voice was not yet set or certain. Why, young boy," said one to me, "you are all alive as a girl, and if you were to make love in a play I'm sure you'd be talking to me in, the people would insist that I had made a girl of you, and hissed you off. I take you, but you are no use to me at all. Two years hence you can come again—then I may talk to you."

I felt it was true, but still wanted to be in a theatre; so I entered a traveling circus company as a good lion, and kept at it for eight months, and then the manager joined another in the regular acting line. I was in my element. They made a lover, and wanted him to rule; their first lover could no more sit a horse than a sack could; so I was fitted out, and said and she should die with laughing if he came on; so I offered. I did well, and thought I was on the road to fortune; I was not. The first actor of the great actors were only the same men as I was, with better chances. That is more than forty years ago though. I am old now."

"After this success I became first gentleman in that company, and remained so for some years. The manager took the hint from me, I had no chance. I changed my name—first, as Gowling did not look well in a bill; and next, because I did not want to hurt my poor old father's feelings more than I could help—I took the name of Alphonsus Montague. It looked well on the bills, I used to think at one time. Somebody, I forget who, says, 'What's in a name?' I know there is a good deal in a name when you are in a family shell, and the public being judge, Alphonsus Montague was better than James Gowling, for it drew better houses.

"In the company there was a girl who took second lady. I don't say I fell in love with her; I don't think men of our class do fall in love. The constant exercising the imitative powers in delineating that passion weakens, I think, the power of feeling it as other men feel it. I liked her; she was good, industrious, rising in the profession, and I married her. There was a better woman I never lived, and she had her reward: I don't suppose that there ever was a woman more respected in any company. I never had even a row about her behavior, and then, a year after being married to her, she came and told me, just as I came off as Macduff in 'Macbeth.' I went to the manager and told him that the man must leave the place at once. The manager said it was impossible; he was a son of the noble owner of half the town; his father was then in the house; there things must be endured. I said they should not be endured by me, that he would not protect the ladies in his company, I should take the liberty of protecting my wife."

"And how did it end?"

"Why, I went to the little beast, titled as he was, and kicked him out at the stage-door. I did, and, though you would not think it to look at me now."

"And the manager?"

"Came and thanked me. Said he was much obliged to me; he had had more annoyance from the complaints of the girls about that fellow than from any other source. He raised mine and my wife's salary that same week."

"And you?" I said, while he was speaking, a number of children who came out of the house, and were dispersing in various groups to play. They were all dressed in the gray, true pauper gray, and ran and jumped as if they were not dependent on a paternal state for their support. One child, a little fair-haired girl, passed once or twice before us, and then stood still, looking at me a little way off. I looked at her, and she pulled up her dress, and looked at me, and blushed, and remained till he had done speaking.

"Whose is that pretty child, there?" said I.

"That—that's my little Alice. Here, Alice! come here, dear."

The child needed no second bidding, but ran to the old pauper; and, being lifted with no little effort on to his knee, hid her face against his breast, and would not look at me. Of course, I found some object of attraction in the garden that enabled me to let her see my face without my appearing to look at her. It was soon satisfied, apparently, for the glances became more bold and determined.

"Who is that, Papa Gowling?"

"A friend of mine; he won't hurt you."

She looked round at me. I had any intention of doing her mischief, and being satisfied, sat upright on the old man's knee.

"Papa Gowling, you see he's not going to hurt my little Alice. Won't you shake hands with Jiz?" She did.

"This your grandchild?" said I.

"Yes,—the only one left," and the voice fell as he stooped and kissed her uplifted face.

"You were saying, when the manager raised your salary after the little fracas about your wife?"

"Ah! yes, he did, and we went on very well for some time. I continued to find I was not a star. Once or twice I went up to London and heard some of the best comedians in England; but could not equal them. I don't know a more painful sensation, Sir, than that attendant on the discovery of the limit of one's powers. Every man who is truly conscious that the eminence that man has attained to whom you are listening is beyond you. Young men—very often—think that what that man has done man can do. It does not last. Most men at thirty-five know what they are to be, and feel that they will be in the rank of the race all."

"Well, some few years after I was married this comedian died, and I was left to fill—not ever be a star—a great actor. It was not in me. I was simply a respectable one. I could take any part, and did so, and well. I was said a leading act; but there I was stopped. I could go no further. I never could raise the enthusiasm of my audience. Sometimes they did not disapprove; but when I played a leading part the boxes did not fill, and the pit were not full. I could not help it, you know. I can simply say I never was or without knowing every word of the part. I was always correct, and never seemed and think parts did well. Stars liked me. They used to stand down for the benefits occasionally, and used to say 'Let me have Gowling to support me, he's a safe man, never too forward,—no clap-trap with him—he's not showy, but he's safe.' Now, you see, praise is a good thing, and I kept a-going at it for eighteen months, and then the manager joined another in the regular acting line. I was in my element. They made a lover, and wanted him to rule; their first lover could no more sit a horse than a sack could; so I was fitted out, and said and she should die with laughing if he came on; so I offered. I did well, and thought I was on the road to fortune; I was not. The first actor of the great actors were only the same men as I was, with better chances. That is more than forty years ago though. children, you see, in the Christmas pantomimes. I often wonder whether the house thinks of those kind of things."

"And the other children?"

"The boy left our company when he was about eighteen, and joined another as second gentleman. He was as good an actor as his father, and no better. He thought he was a genius, poor boy, as they all do, and married a girl who had a little money. He had no experience to teach him; so he thought he was ill-used, and left us."

"And she became of him?"

"At first we used to hear from him now and then—then there was a long silence, and his mother went herself dreadfully about him. At length it had been playing a country gentleman in a screaming farce in the halls called it, for in a small company you are a king, a waterman, a fool—all in one evening; so my wife had gone down, and when I arrived came to the door to let me in.

"'Don't be frightened, dear, here's Alfred come back!'

"I went up, and there he was; but, my God, what a wreck! His eyes blood-shot, his hands trembling, and a bad red spot on his cheeks.

"'Well, father, how are you?'

"I did not answer; I sat down and cried. He tried hard to keep it up, but he could not; he came and knelt down in front of me, covered his face with his hands, and cried like a child. His mother, poor soul, clung round his neck, and kissed him, and cried till I was beside myself. He told his story. He had made a mistake. He thought himself a great actor. Managers did not; the public backed the managers, and were right too. He had married the disappointed daughter of an wife as his father had had to console him, and he took to the actor's curse—drink. He sank lower and lower every month, till he could get nothing, and just crawled home to die.

"Our regret, I said just come off, when I was told some one wanted me at the stage-door. I went, and found the girl of the house where we lodged. She wanted me to come home directly, as I was wanted at once. Mr. Alfred was very ill. Our manager had his benefit that night, and we had got up the first-rate farce, 'Jeremy and Hawthorn.' I was dressed as the Ghost. I forgot all about dress then, and rushed home: it was too late. 'Alfred was very ill.' He lay, as I said in his mother's arms; she was dressed as the Queen, and was weeping hot, silent tears that fell on my dead boy's face, now by one. His head was sunk down on her knees by the bed-side, as I entered, and I thought the house was standing looking on. I shall never forget it—never.

"I was roused by a touch on the shoulder. A message from the theatre.

"'Manager says he should be glad if you could come back.'

"I came back, Jennings, do you think I can?'

"'Not to do any thing, Sir; but you might see him; perhaps it would be better.'

"I left them, and went back, saw the manager and told him; and though it was his benefit night, he said he would not act himself.

"'God bless you, Gowling, I am sorry for you, very sorry; if I can do any thing for you, let me know.'

"I went to the dressing-room, and as I left the place heard the applause that attended the appearance of our chief dance, and his announcement of his intention to read the parts. Managers are not all alike, and he was a good friend to me, was Charles Jennings.

"We buried the poor boy, and then went on as before. His mother never recovered the blow, and gradually sunk, and about six months after his death could no longer take her parts; so Alice and I had to do our best. I thought that a young fellow had been rather attentive to her, and was not surprised when he took me aside one night and told me he wished to marry her as her his wife. He was just such another as myself had been myself when his age. I thought it better for the happiness of the wife of a young actor than remain single behind the scenes, for she was a good girl was Alice. Well, they married, and remained in the company. I was getting old you see, then, and it was some comfort to see her with some one to take care of her. Soon after she married her mother died, and I laid in the grave, beside her son, one of the best women that ever lived. I was alone now; and old, for the wear and tear of an active life, and the late hours, tell on the strongest constitution. I was getting rheumatic, and the change from the light, and glare, and noise of the theatre to the silence and quiet of my own poor room. Just then, too, the company was broken up; and at the age I was then it was a serious thing for me. We all three tried to keep together, but it was no use. Those who wanted an old man did not want a second lady, be a third gentleman, and so we were divided.

"I went on from one to another, very poorly paid, and was at last without a shilling. Alice was married, and I found myself in the workhouse.

"I heard from Alice every week, and saved her letters for the last days, for the day was long and dull to me. I could not make new friends. The young people I met, and I was forgotten, and 'loved not pity;' so I was a lonely old man.

"Alice's husband died. I don't remember now how it was, for he was ill when he died, and he was just after this little one was born. I quite longed to see her, but she could not come, and I could not go, so we only wrote to each other. I have all her letters now, poor girl. She came to see me once afterward, and was looking ill and fagged; and soon after that visit our company was broken up again.

"I tried hard for an engagement, traveled from place to place, spent all the little I had saved, and then was laid up at a place some fifty or sixty miles from here. They took me from this to the Union when the money was gone; and after a deal of waiting and grumbling they brought me here. I thought when I was a boy, I would get the nests out of this tree that I should end my days here an old worn-out pauper. You know where it says? There's a Providence that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we may.' I've often said that on the stage. I felt it now." And the old man mused in silence.

"And your daughter?"

"Alice? She died in this house not two years ago, poor child."

"Here, do you mean?"

"Yes, there in that room." And he pointed to a window in the back part of the house. "That one, where the sun shines on it through the trees."

"Of what ailed her?" She was young.

"The same disease that carried off her brothers, consumption. She knew I was here, and spent her last money to send for me; and the doctor, good fellow that he is, would have her in here. She lingered on for about a fortnight up there, and then died screaming at sunset holding my hand, and the child lying on her breast. Poor girl! she looked so beautiful in her coffin. Ah! I've outlived them all but this little one." And the old man looked fondly on the child, and stroked her head with his hand shrivaled hand. "It's a pity to end to see them all gone—all—wife, sons, and Alice all gone. Poor Alice!" And the old pauper's eyes were full of the slow-coming tears of age.

I had a cough, and felt husky in the throat, and the wind blew the dust in my eyes.

"You and I seem to agree well, Mr. Gowling," said the voice of the master close by.

"Yes, Sir, to say I have to listen in old man's talk. It's very kind of him—very kind."

"I've been expressing my wonder to Mr. Gowling to find him here."

"Want of proper economy, Sir; nothing more. People of his profession are very reckless and improvident—very."

"You're right and you're wrong at once," said the old man. "I, who am saving myself, I, the thrifty, the whole tendency of the profession is against it. We don't earn much—I mean such as myself. Of course, a good crowd—a careful saving man—are not those which make a good actor. It is not to be ask that a man should go on the stage, have to affect the liberal notions of a spendthrift, and off the stage be a niggard.

"Still, Mr. Gowling, you admit it is possible to save."

"Oh, yes! possible, but difficult, inasmuch as the qualities that make the actor are not, nor are they usually found associated with, those of the rigid economist; and it is only the rigid economist among such men as we that can save a bit. Look, too, at the liabilities to disease, the uncertainties of the means of living we have, and you will see that we, as a class on the whole, as hardly worked for the amount of pay we receive as any class of men."

THE Uncommercial Traveler
IN LONDON CHAMBERS.
BY CHARLES DICKENS.

At one period of my uncommercial career my friend Parkle lived in a set of chambers in Gray's Inn Square. The room in which he familiarly told a "stop set," and all the eatables and drinkables introduced into them acquired a flavor of Cockle.

Two of the windows of those chambers looked down into the garden; and we have sat up there together, many a summer evening, saying how pleasant it was, and talking of many things. To my intimacy with that top set I am indebted for three of my most vivid impressions of the loneliness of life in chambers. They shall follow here, in order, first, second, and third.

First. My friend Parkle, on a time, hurt one of his legs, and it became seriously inflamed. Not knowing of his indisposition, I was on my way to see him one day, some summer evening, when I was much surprised by meeting a lively leech in Holborn. Surprised him, seemingly on his way to the West End of London. As the leech was alone, and was, of course, unable to explain his business, I could but have inclined to be so (which he had not the appearance of being), I passed him and went on. Turning the corner of Gray's Inn Lane, I was beyond expression amazed by meeting another leech—also entirely alone, and also proceeding in a westerly direction, though with less decision of purpose. Pondering on this extraordinary circumstance, and endeavoring to remember whether I had ever read, in the Histories of Insurrections, or any work on Natural History, of a migration of leeches, I ascended to the top set, past the dreary series of closed outer doors of offices and an empty set or two, which intervened between that lofty region and the world, and, entering my friend's room, I found him stretched upon his back, like Prometheus Bound, with a perfectly demented ticket-porter in attendance on him instead of the Vulture, which helpless individual, who was feeble and frightened, had (my friend explained to me, in great choler) been endeavoring for some hours to apply leeches to his leg, and as yet had only got on two out of twenty. To this unfortunate's distraction between a damp cloth on which he had placed the leeches to freshen them, and the wrathful adjurations of my friend to "Stick 'em on, Sir!" I referred the phenomenon I had encountered; the rather as two more specimens were at that moment going out at the door, while a general insurrection of the rest was in progress on the table. After a few unmitigated efforts prevailed; and when the leeches came off, and had recovered their spirits, we carefully tied them up in a decanter. But I never heard more of them than that they were all gone next morning, and that the Out-door young man in the Black, Buff, and Bottle, Leather-and-Bone, had been bitten and bloodshy some creatures not identified. They never "took" on Mr. Bright, the bankrupt's leech. I have since preserved fresh the belief that she unconsciously carried several about her, until they gradually found openings in life.

Second. On the same staircase with my friend Parkle, and on the same floor, there lived a man of law, who pursued his business elsewhere, and used those chambers as his place of residence. He there devoted himself to the study of the law (as those knew him; but after that—for English—short pause of consideration, they began to speak). Parkle cherished words of scorn for his private character only, and knew nothing of his manners, ways, or appearance. He was a man a good deal about town, but always alone. We used to remark to one another that, although we often encountered him in theatres, concert-rooms, and other public places, he was always alone. Yet he was not a gloomy man, and was of a decidedly conversational turn; insomuch that I once encountered him at evening lounge, with a cigar in his mouth, half in, half out, of Parkle's rooms, and discuss the topics of the day for half an hour. I have to relate on occasions that he had four faults to find with life; firstly, that a man was always winding up his watch; secondly, that Lincoln's Inn was small; thirdly, that it therefore wanted variety; fourthly, that there was no water laid on. That water was so much dust in his own faded chambers, certainly, that they reminded me of a sepulchre, furnished in grave-clothes and cobwebs. At a certain time, which had newly been brought to light, after having lain buried a few thousand years. One day, but sometimes only at long intervals, his principal man, being then five years married, would look in upon Parkle, in his usual laughing way, with an cigar in his mouth as usual, and say, "I am going out of town." As he never went out of town, Parkle, with the privilege of a friend, would cry, "Ay, Ay," at last. For what is a man to do? London is so small! If you go west, you come to yourself. If you go east, you come to yourself. If you go south, there's Brixton or Norwood. If you go north, you can't get rid of Barnet. Then the monotony of the dead flat, broken by nothing but of all the roads, roads—and the dust, dust, dust!" When he had said this he wished Parkle a good-evening, and came back again, and sat with his watch in his hand, "Oh, I really can not go on winding up this watch over and over again. I wish you would take care of it." So Parkle laughed, and consented; and he went out of town. The remainder of the first day of his visit to Parkle's box became choked, and no more letters could be got into it, and they began to be left at the lodge, and to accumulate there. At last Parkle and I decided on a conference with the steward to use his master's key and look into the chambers, and give them the air. Opening the door, I felt that it was found that he had hanged himself to his bedstead, and had left this written memorandum: "I should prefer to be cut down by my landlord and friend (if he will allow me to call him so), Mr. Parkle." This was the only time I ever, in my theory of chambers, had to go into lodgings immediately.

Third. While Parkle lived in Gray's Inn, and I myself was uncommercially preparing for the Bar—which is done, as every body knows, by having a friend who goes out of town, and leaving to an old woman in a chronic state of Saint Anthony's fire and dropsy, and, so decorated, boiling a tea kettle in a hollow way of four, sometimes five, who mistrusts the other three—I say, while these things were, there was a certain lofty gentleman who lived in a garret in the Temple, and was a great judge and lover of port-wine. Every day he dined at his chop-house, and took a bottle of port-wine, and every night came home to the Temple and went to bed in his lonely chambers. This had gone on for many consecutive years, when one night he had a fit on coming home, and fell and cut his head deep, but partly recovered, and groped about in search of his bed. When he was afterward discovered, dead, it was clearly established by the marks of his hands about the room that he must have done so. Now this chanced on the night of Christmas-Eve, and over him lived a merry party of his own friends and young friends, and who gave them a little party that night, in the course of which they played at Blindman's Buff. Result, that they were late, for greater sport, by the light of the fire only; and once, when they were all quietly nestling and playing about the fire, some one was merrily to pick out the prettiest sister (for which I am far from blaming him), somebody said, Hark! The Judge's footsteps surely! It was the Chairman's Buff by himself to-night! They listened, and they heard sounds of some one pulling about and shuffling furniture; and they all laughed at the conceit, and went on with their play again, presently, more merry than before. Then those two so different games of life and death were played out together, blindfold, in the two sets of chambers.

These are the occurrences which, coming to my knowledge, imbued me long ago with a strong sense of the loneliness of chambers. There was a fantastic illustration to much the same purpose implicitly believed by a strange sort of man, now dead, whom I knew when I had not quite arrived at legal years of discretion, though I was already in the uncommercial line.

This was a man who, though not more than thirty, had seen the world in divers irreconcilable capacities, had been an officer in a South American regiment among other odd things—but had not achieved much in any way of life, and was constitutionally in debt and hiding. He occupied chambers in the dreariest nature in Lyons Inn; his name, however, was not upon the door or door-post, but in lieu of it stood the name of a lady who had died in the chambers, and had given him the furniture. The story arose out of the furniture, and was to this effect: Let the former holder of the chambers, whose name was still upon the door and door-post, be Mr. Testator.

Mr. Testator lived in a set of chambers in Lyons Inn, where he had but very scanty furniture for his bedroom, and none for his sitting-room. He had lived among cobwebs in this condition, and had found it very bare and cold. One night past midnight, when he sat writing, and had still writing to do that must be done before he went to bed, he found himself out of coals. He had coals down stairs, but could never learn to ask for any; however, the cellar-key was on his mantelshelf, and if he went down and opened the cellar for himself, he could replenish the coals in his own cellar to be his. As to his laundress, she lived among the coal-wagons and Thames watermen—for there were Thames watermen at that time—on some unknown rat-hole by the river, down lanes and alleys on the other side of the Strand. As to any other person in the house, as a matter of fact, Lyons Inn was dreaming, drunk, maudlin, moody, betting, brooding over bill-discounting or removing, asleep or awake, according its own whim. Mr. Testator took his coal-scuttle in one hand, his candle and key in another, and descended to the mysterious cellars of Lyons Inn, where the late vehicles in the streets became thunderous, and all the water-pipes in the neighborhood seemed to have Macbeth's Amen sticking in their throats, and to be trying to get it out. After groping here and there among the cellars for the key, Mr. Testator at length came to a door with a rusty padlock which his key fitted. Getting the door open with much trouble, and locking it, he found no coals, but a confused pile of furniture. Alarmed by this intrusion on another man's property, the owner again, found his own cellar, filled his scuttle, and returned up stairs.

But the furniture in the cellars ran on castors across and across Mr. Testator's mind incessantly, when, in the chill hour of five in the morning, he went to bed. He accordingly wanted a table to write at, and a table expressly made to be written at had been the piece of furniture in the foremost of the lot. So, on the laundress coming from her borrow in the morning to make his kettle boil, he artfully led up to the subject of cellars and furniture; but met with a bliss had evidently no connection in her mind. When she left him, and he sat at his breakfast, thinking about the furniture, he recalled the rusty state of the padlock, and inferred that the furniture must have been stored in the cellars ever since—was perhaps Jacobean—two—dear dead, perhaps? After thinking it over a few days, in the course of which he could pump no thing out of the laundress about the furniture, he became desperate, and resolved to borrow that table. He did so that night. He had not had the table long when he found he must borrow an easy-chair; he had not had that long when he made up his mind to borrow a book-case; then a couch; then a carpet and rug. By which time he felt he was furniture stepped in so far," as that it could be no worse to borrow of the fellow-creature who occupied it all, and locked up the cellar for good. He had always locked it after every visit. He had carried up every piece of coals in the dead of the night, and, at best, had felt like a Resurrection Man. Every article was blue and furry when brought into his chambers, and had had, in a murderous and wicked sort of way, to polish it up while London slept.

Mr. Testator lived in his furnished chambers two or three years, or more, and gradually lulled himself into the belief that the furniture was his. This was his convenient state of mind when, late one night, a step came up the stairs, and a hand passed over the door-post for the knocker, and then one deep and solemn rap was rapped that might have been a spring in Mr. Testator's easy-chair to start him out of it: so promptly was it attended with that effect.

With a candle in his hand, Mr. Testator went to the door, and opened it to a very pale and very tall man; a man who stooped; a man with very high shoulders, a very narrow chest, and a very long neck. This extraordinary man was wrapped in a long threadbare black coat, fastened up the breast with one button, and had under his arm he squeezed an umbrella without a handle, as if he was playing bagpipes. He said, "I say your name, Sir, is Mr. Testator, I will not," and stopped, his eye resting on some object within the chambers.

"Can I tell you what?" asked Mr. Testator, noting this stoppage with quick alarm.

"I ask your pardon," said the stranger, "but—this is not the first time I am going to make—do I see in there any small article of property belonging to you?"

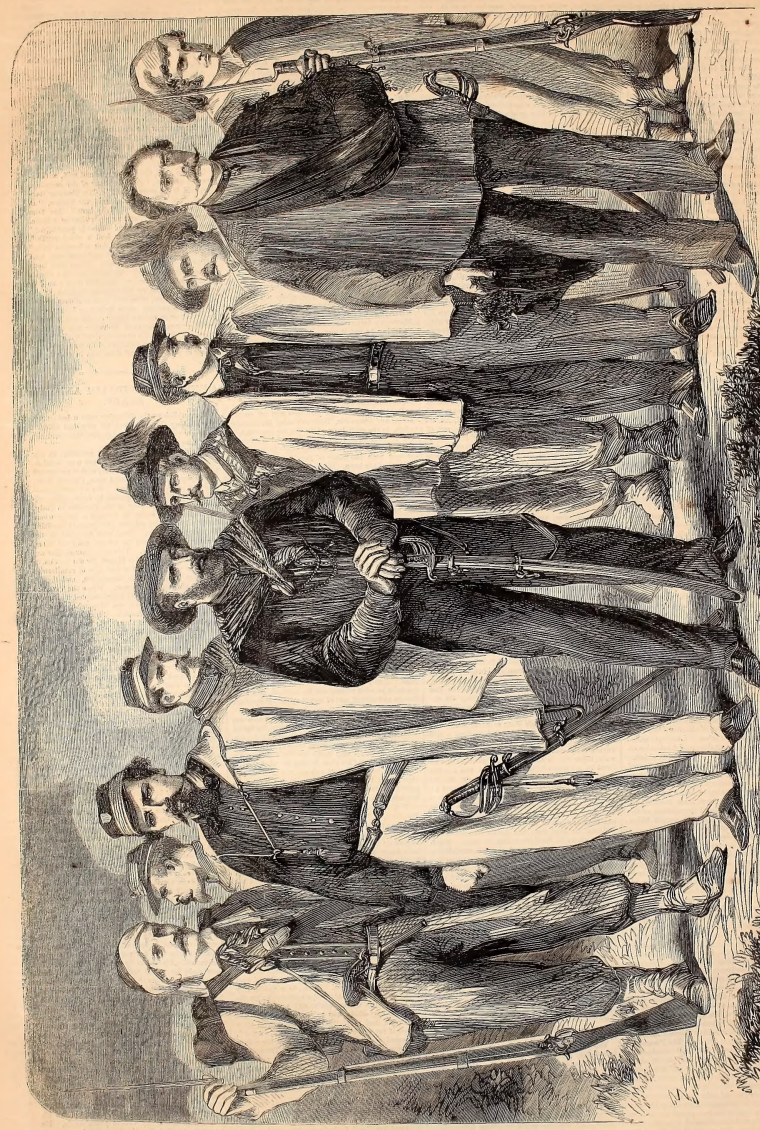
Mr. Testator was beginning to stammer that he was not aware—when the visitor slipped past him into the chambers. There, in a golden vase that froze Mr. Testator to the marrow, he examined, first, the writing-table, and said, "Mine;" then the easy-chair, and said, "Mine;" then the book-case, and said, "Mine;" then turned up a corner of the carpet, and said, "Mine;" in a word, inspected all the furniture from the cellars in turn in succession, and said, "Mine!" Toward the end of this investigation, Mr. Testator perceived that he was sodden with liquor, and that the liquor was gin. He was not unsteady with gin, either in his speech or carriage; but he was stiff with gin in both respects.

Mr. Testator was in a dreadful state, for (according to his making out of the story) the possible consequences of what he had done in reckoniess and hardhood flashed upon him in their fullness for the first time. When they had stood gazing at one another for a little while, he tremulously began:

"Sir, I am conscious that this has fallen explanation, confusion, and restitution are your due. They shall be yours. Allow me to entreat that without temper, without even natural irritation on your part, we may have a little—"

"Drop of something to drink," interposed the stranger. "I am agreeable to it."

Mr. Testator had intended to say, "a little quiet conversation," but with great relief of mind adopted this amendment. He produced a decanter of gin, and was bustling about for hot water and sugar, when he found that his visitor had already drunk half the decanter's contents. With hot water and sugar the visitor drank the remainder before he had been an hour in the chambers by the names of the church of Saint Mary in the Strand, and during the process he frequently repeated to himself, "Mine!"



The gin gone, the visitor rose and said, with increased stiffness, "At what hour of the morning, Sir, will it be convenient?" Mr. Testator hesitated, "At ten?" "Sir," said the visitor, "at ten to the moment I shall be here." He then contemplated Mr. Testator awhile—but at leisure, and said, "God bless you! How is your wife?" Mr. Testator (who never had a wife) replied, "Deeply anxious, poor soul, but otherwise well." The visitor thereupon turned and went way, and left Lewis in possession of his chairs. That hour he was never heard of. Whether he was a ghost, or a spectral illusion, or a drunken man who had an insistent fancy, or a man with a mania for owner of the furniture, who had that business there; whether he got safe home, or had no home to get to, whether he died of liquor on the way, or lived in liquor ever afterward, he never was heard of more. This was the story received with the furniture, held to be as substantially to the succeeding person in an upper set of chambers in grim Lyons Inn.

GENERAL GARIBALDI AND HIS STAFF.

WE publish on the following page a fine group, representing Garibaldi and his principal officers. They are the heroes of the day, and their portraits should be placed on record.

Of the Chief himself it is not necessary to say any thing. In our number for June 9 we published a fine portrait of the General, with a pretty full biography. His right-hand man, Colonel Türr, merits a brief sketch. He is a quite young man—only thirty-five—a Hungarian by birth, and a soldier by trade. Serving on one occasion in Italy, he was taken prisoner. In a prison-ship where he found two Croat soldiers outrageously insulting two beautiful girls. Fired with indignation, the young officer knocked the brutal fellows down, and rescued the girls. This and other similar experiences filled him with disgust for the service in which he was then at the first age of twenty-one in Hungary he joined the insurgents, and fought bravely throughout the war. When the Crimean campaign began, Colonel Türr received a commission from England, and was dispatched into the Principalities to buy horses. He was soon seized by the Austrians, and thrust into a dungeon from whose roof the water dripped incessantly. The English consul, on hearing of his capture, instantly demanded his release, which, after some delay, was granted by the Austrians; but nearly four months' imprisonment in his damp prison had given a shock to his constitution from which he has never recovered. He continued to serve in the British army till the close of the war; then, thirsting for more opportunities of distinction, he went over to Circassia, joined Schamyl, and fought for the Russians until his overworked constitution gave way entirely, and he was prostrated, in a strange country, without money and without friends. He was supposed to be dead, when the news of the outbreak of the Italian war reached the mountains of Circassia. Roused by the warcry, he rose from his bed, started by the nearest road, reached Milan in six days, and joined Garibaldi. He fought campaign after campaign by the side of Garibaldi. At length, in one of the Alpine skirmishes, he was shot in the arm and left for dead. Carried by a humane Italian lady, he was nursed tenderly for many months, and was almost recovered when the news reached him that Garibaldi had sailed for Sicily. His subsequent career is fresh in the memory of all readers. He is always mentioned in the light of the hottest encounters it seems to be an ever-recurring struggle between Garibaldi and Türr which shall expose himself the most to shot and shell. Türr has already been wounded once in the leg, but continues to perform his duties as General of Division as though nothing had happened. General Türr has been the hero of a romantic adventure. While in England, a young lady of fortune fell, and long fortune fell in love with him, and it was intimated to him that her parents would not oppose the match. He is instantly told that, had she been poor, he would willingly have sought her hand; but so many "foreign adventurers" had married their fortunes by marrying rich wives in England that he, for one, intended to pursue a different course.

Of most of the other officers depicted in our engraving there is very little to be said. General Bixio, like Garibaldi, was a sailor by trade. Twelve years ago, when Italy appeared to be awakening, he left his ship, joined Garibaldi at Rome, and fought out the war by his side. Last year, when hostilities were renewed, Bixio was one of the first to join the "Alpine Chasseurs;" and now he naturally occupies a prominent place in the Liberator's staff. General Carini is a patriot of old standing. When Sicily last rose, in 1848, he was one of the principal leaders of the people, and exploited his devotion to liberty by twelve years' exile. He joined Garibaldi before the departure from Genoa, and has since served faithfully in his army.

"COME AND SEE ME ONE OF THESE DAYS, POTTS."

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER III.

WHO has not experienced the charm of the first time in his life, when totally removed from all the accidents of his station, the circumstance of his fortune, and his other belongings, he has taken his place among perfect strangers, and been estimated by the claims of his own individuality? Is it not this which gives the utmost ecstasy of our first tour — our first journey? There are none to say, "Who is this Potts that gives himself these airs?" "What pretension has he to say this, or order that?" "What would old Potter say if he saw his son to-day?" with all the other, "What has this world come to?" and "What are we to see next?" I say, it is with a glorious sense of independence that one sees himself emancipated from all these restrains, and recognises his freedom to be that which nature has made him.

As I sat on Lord Keldrum's left — Father Dyke was on his right — was I in any real quality other than I ever am? Was my nature different, my voice, my manner, my social tone, as I received all the bland attentions of my courteous host? And yet, in my heart of hearts, I felt that if it were known to that polite company I was the son of Peter Potts, bothecary, all my conversational courage would have failed me. I would not have dared to assert fifty things I now declared, nor vouched for a hundred that I as assuredly guaranteed. If I had had to carry about me traditions of the shop in Mary's Abbey, the laboratory, and the rest of it, how could I have had the nerve to discuss any of the topics on which I now pronounced so authoritatively? And yet, these were all accidents of my existence — no more me than was the color of his whiskers mine who vaccinated me for cow-pock. The man I really was himself through all; he was neither compounded of senna and salts, nor amalgamated with sarsparilla and the acids; but by the cruel laws of a harsh conventionality it was decreed otherwise, and the trade of the father descends to the son in every estimate of all he does, and says, and thinks. The converse of the proposition I was now to feel in the success I obtained in this company. I was, as the Germans would say, "Der Herr Potts an sich, nicht nach seinen Begebenheiten" — the man Potts, not the creature of his belongings.

The man thus freed from his "antecedents," and owning no "relatives," feels like one to whom a great, a most unlimited credit has been opened, in matter of opinion. Not reduced to fashion his sentiments by some supposed standard becoming his station, he roams at will over the broad prairie of life, enough if he can show cause why he says this or thinks that, without having to defend himself for his parentage, and the place he was born in. Little wonder if, with such a sum to my credit, I drew largely on it; little wonder if I were dogmatical and demonstrative; little wonder if, when my reason grew wearied with facts, I reposed on my imagination in fiction.

Be it remembered, however, that I only became what I have set down here after an excellent dinner, a considerable quantity of Champagne, and no small share of a claret, strongbodied enough to please the priest. I didn't like that priest. From the moment we sat down at table I conceived for him a sort of distrust. He was painfully polite and civil; he had a soft, slippery, Clare accent; but there was a malicious twinkle in his eye that showed he was by nature satirical. Perhaps because we were more reading men than the others that it was we soon found ourselves pitted against each other in argument, and this not upon one, but upon every possible topic that turned up. Hammond I found also stood by the priest. Oxley was my backer, and his knowledge of Shakspire. Dyke was a shrewd, sarcastic dog in his way, but he had no chance with me. How much soever I treated his Church — he pushed me to it — what an exposé did I make of the Pope and his Government, with all their enormities and cruelties! How ruthlessly I showed them up as the sworn enemies of all freedom and enlightenment! But the priest never got angry — he was too cunning for that, and he even laughed at some of my anecdotes, as if they related many. "Don't be so hard on him, Potts," whispered my host, "he's a good fellow on the whole, you know." This speech put me into a flutter of delight. It was not alone that he called me Potts, but there was also an acceptance of me as one of his own set. We were, in fact, henceforth "nous autres." Enchanting recognition, never to be forgotten!

"But what would you do with us?" said Dyke, mildly remonstrating against some severe censures we of the landed interest might be yet driven to resort to.

"I don't know — that is to say, I have not made up my mind whether it would be better to make a clearance of you altogether, or to bribe you."

"Bribe us by all means, then!" said he, with a most serious earnestness.

"Ah! but could we rely on you?" asked I.

"That would greatly depend upon the price."

"I'll not haggle about terms, nor I'm sure would Keldrum," said Oxley, turning to him.

"You are only just to me in that," said he, smiling.

"That's all fine talking for you fellows who had the luck to be first on the list, but what are poor devils like Oxley and myself to do?" said Hammond. "Taxation comes down to second sons nowadays."

"And the Times says all right," added Oxley.

"And I say all wrong; and I say more," broke I in: "I say that of all the tyrannies of Europe, I know of none like that newspaper tyranny. The whose station, I would ask, nowadays can exempt him from its impertinent criticisms? Can Keldrum say — can I say — that we know or next day we shall not be arraigned for this, that, or t'other? I choose, for instance, to manage my estate — the property that has been in my family for centuries, the acres that have descended to us by grants as old as Magna Charta. I desire, for reasons that seem sufficient to myself, to convert arable into grass land. I say to one of my tenant farmers — Mr. Somebody — no matter, I shall not mention names, but I say to him —"

"I know the man," broke in the priest; "you mean Hedgeworth Davis, of Mount Davis."

"No, Sir, I do not," said I, angrily, for I resented this attempt to me to pry into my affairs.

"Hedgeworth! Hedgeworth! It sin't that fellow that was in the Rifles, the 2d Battalion, is it?" said Oxley.

"I repeat," said I, "that I will mention no names."

"My mother had some relatives Hedgeworths; they were from Herefordshire. How odd, Potts, if we should turn out to be connections! You said that these people were related to you."

"I hope," said I, angrily, "that I am not bound to give the birth, parentage, and education of every man whose name I may mention in conversation. At all events, I would protest that I have not prepared myself for such a demand upon my memory."

"Of course not, Potts. It would be a test no man could submit to," said his lordship.

"That Hedgeworth was in the Rifles exceeded all the fellows I ever met in drawing the long bow. There was no county he had not been in, no army he had not served with; he was related to every celebrated man in Europe; and, after all, it turned out that his parent was an attorney at Market Harborough, and sub-agent to one of our fellows who had some property there." This was said by Hammond, who directed the speech entirely to me.

"Confound the Hedgeworths all together," broke in Oxley. "They have carried us miles away from what we were talking of."

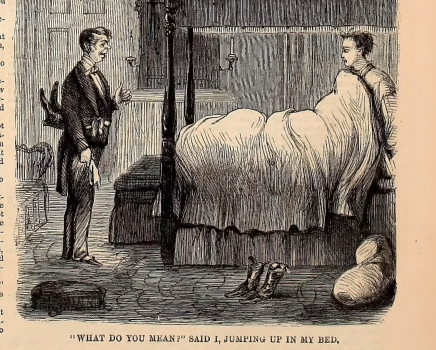
This was a sentiment that met my heartiest concurrence, and I nodded a friendly recognition to the speaker, and drank off my glass to his health.

"Who can give us a song? I'll back his reverence here to be a vocalist," cried Hammond. And, sure enough, Dyke sang one of the melodies with great feeling and taste. Oxley followed with something in less perfect taste, and we all grew very jolly, and then there came a brilliant bone and some deviled kidneys, and a warm stew which Hammond himself concocted — a most insidious liquor, which, with a strong flavor of lemons, was, at the same time, little else than rum and sugar.

There is an adage that says "in vino veritas," which I shrewdly suspect to be a great fallacy; at least, as regards my own case, I know it to be totally inapplicable. I am, in my sober senses — and I am proud to say that the exceptions from such are of the rarest — one of the most veracious of mortals; indeed, in my frank sincerity, I have often given offence to those who like a courteous hypocrisy better than an ungraceful truth. Whenever, by any chance, it has been my ill-fortune to transgress these limits, there is no bound to my imagination. There is nothing too extravagant or too vainglorious for me to say of myself. All the strange incidents of romance that I have read, all the travelers' stories, newspaper accidents, adventures by sea and land, wonderful coincidences, unexpected turns of fortune, I adapt to myself, and coolly relate them as personal experiences. Listening have afterward told me that I possess an amount of consistence, a verisimilitude in these narratives perfectly marvelous, and only to be accounted for by supposing that I myself must, for the time being, be the dupe of my own imagination. Indeed, I am sure such must be the true explanation of this curious fact. How in any other mode explain the rash words, absurd and impossible engagements I have contracted in such moments, backing myself to leap twenty-three feet on the level sward; to dive in six fathoms water and find up Heaven knows what of shells and marine curiosities from the bottom; to ride the most unmanageable of horses, and, single-handed and unarmed, to fight the fiercest bull-dog in England? Then, as to intellectual feats, what have I not engaged to perform? Sums of mental arithmetic, whole newspapers committed to memory after one reading; verse compositions, on any theme, in ten languages; and, once, a written contract to compose a whole opera, with all the scenes, within twenty-four hours. To a nature thus strangely constituted wine was a perfect magic wand, transforming a poor, weak, distrustful, modest man into a hero; and yet, even with such temptations, my excesses were extremely rare and unfrequent. Are there many, I would ask, that could resist the pleasure to such a dreamland, with only the penalty of a headache the next morning? Sense one would perhaps suggest that these were enjoyments to pay forfeit on. Well, so there were; but I was not anticipate. And now to my tale.

To Hammond's brave ale succeeded one by Oxley, made after an American receipt, and certainly both fragrant and insinuating; and then came a concession made by the priest, which he called "Father Hoey's pride." It was made in a bowl, and drunk out of lemonrinds, ingeniously slit into the wine-glasses. I remember no other particulars about it, though I can cull to mind much of the conversation that preceded it. How I gave a long historical account of my family, that we came originally from Corsica, the name Potts being a corruption of Pozzo, and that we were of the same stock as the celebrated diplomatist Pozzo di Borgo. Our acclaimed estates in the island were of fabulous value, but in asserting my right to them I should accept thirteen mortal duels, the arrears of a hundred and odd years unscored off, in anticipation of which I had at one time taken lessons from Angelo in fencing, which led to the celebrated challenge they might have read in Galignani, where I offered to meet any swordsman in Europe for ten thousand Napoleons, giving choice of the weapon to my adversary. With a tear to the memory of the poor fellow colonel that I killed at Sedan, I turned the conversation. Being in France, I incidentally mentioned some anecdotes of military life, and how I had invented the rifle certificate Minié, and, in a moment of good nature, given that excellent fellow my secret. "I will say," said I, "that he has shown more gratitude than some others nearer home, but will talk of rifled cannon another time." In a vein of episode about beaching, I mentioned the Emperor of Russia, poor dear Nicholas, and told how we had once exchanged horses, mine being known asorrowboned, and a weight-carrier; his a light Circassian mare, of purest breed, "the dam of that creature you may see below in the stable now," said I, carelessly. "Come and see me one of these days, Potts," said he, in parting; "come and pass a week with me at Constantinople." This was the first intimation he had ever given of his project against Turkey; and when I told it to the Duke of Wellington, his remark was a muttered 'Strange fellow, Potts — knows every thing!' though he made no reply to me at the time."

It was somewhere about this period that the priest began with what struck me as an attempt to outdo me as a story-teller, an effort I should have treated with the most contemptuous indifference but for the amount of attention bestowed on him by the others. Nor was this all, but actually I perceived that a kind of rivalry was attempted to be established, so that we were pitted directly against each other. Among the other self-delusions of such moments is the profound conviction I entertained that I was master of all genres of skill and address, superior to Major A. at whist, and able to give Stonehenge a pawn and the move at chess. "The priest was just as vain-glorious. "He'd like to see the man who'd play him a game of 'spoiled five'" — whatever that was — "or drafts; ay, or though it was not his pride, a bit of backgammon."



"Done, for fifty pounds; double on the game!" cried I.

"Fifty fiddle-sticks!" cried he; "where would you or I find as many shillings?"

"What do you mean, Sir?" said I, angrily. "Am I to suppose that you doubt my competence to risk such a contemptible sum, or is it to your own inability alone you would refer?"

A very acrimonious dispute followed, of which I have no clear recollection. I only remember how Hammond was out-and-out for the priest, and Oxley too tipsy to take my part with any efficiency. At last — how arranged I can't say — peace was restored, and the next thing I can recall was listening to Father Dyke giving a long, and of course a most fabulous, history of a ring that he wore on his second finger. It was given by the Pretender, he said, to his uncle, the celebrated Carmelite Monk, Father-in-O'Kelly, who for years had followed the young prince's fortunes. It was an onyx, with the letters C. E. S. engraved on it. Keldrum took an immense fancy to it; he protested that every thing that attached to that unhappy family possessed in his eyes an uncommon interest. "If you have a fancy to take up Potts's wager," said he, laughingly, "I'll give you fifty pounds for your signet ring."

The priest demurred — Hammond interposed — then there was more discussion, now warm, now jocose. Oxley tried to suggest something which we all laughed at. Keldrum placed the backgammon board meanwhile, but I can give no clear account of what ensued, though I remember that the terms of our wager were committed to writing by Hammond, and signed by Father D. and myself, and in the condition there figured a certain ring, guaranteed to have belonged to, and have been worn by, his Royal Highness Charles Edward, and a cream-colored horse, equally guaranteed as the produce of a Caucasian mare presented by the late Emperor Nicholas to the present owner. The document was witnessed by all three, Oxley's name written in two letters, and a flourish.

"WHAT DO YOU MEAN?" SAID I, JUMPING UP IN MY BED.

After that I played, and lost.

CHAPTER IV.

I CAN recall to this very hour the sensations of incipient and misery with which I awoke the morning after this debauch. Rocking pain it was, with a sort of tremulous beating all through the brain, as though a small engine had been set to work there, and that piston, and boiler, and connecting rod, were all banging, flaring, and thundering amidst my fevered senses. I was besides much puzzled to know where I was, and how I had come there. Controversial divinity, genealogy, horse-racing, the peerage, and "double sixes" were dancing a wild cotillion through my brain; and although a water-carriage had once cautiously ebrnded his head into the room, to see if I were asleep, and as guardedly withdrew it again, I never had energy to open eye to him, but lay passive and still, waiting till my mind might clear, and the cloud-fog that obscured my faculties might be wafted away.

At last—it was toward evening—the man possibly becoming alarmed at my protracted lethargy, came somewhat briskly through the room, and with that amount of noise that showed he meant no incuse no—disturbed chairs and fire-irons indiscriminately.

"Is it late or early?" asked I, faintly.

"It was early, Sir, and a beautiful morning," said he, drawing nigh, with the air of one disposed for colloquy.

I didn't exactly like to ask where I was, and tried to ascertain the fact by a little circumlocution. "I suppose," said I, yawning. "for all that is to be done in a place like this where no one might just as well stay abed, eh?"

"To be sure, a gentleman's place," said he, with that peculiar disposition to agree with you so characteristic in an Irish waiter.

"No accident," sighed I.

"No, indeed, Sir."

"No theatre?"

"Devil a one, Sir."

"No sport?"

"Yesterday was the last of the season, Sir," and signs on, his herbidap and the other gentlemen was off immediately after breakfast."

"You mean Lord—Lord—" I said, insisting on clearing slowly now, but I could not yet see clearly.

"Lord Keldrum, Sir; a real gentleman every inch of him."

"Oh, yes! to be sure—a very clerd friend of mine," muttered I. "And so his lordship is he?"

"Yes, Sir; and the last word he said was about your honor."

"About me—what was it?"

"Well, indeed, Sir," replied the waiter, with a hesitating and confused manner, "I didn't rightly understand it; but as well as I could catch the words, it was something about hoping your honor had more of that wonderful breed of horses the Emperor of Roosia gave you."

"Oh, yes! I understand," said I, stopping him abruptly. "By-the-way, how is Blondel—that is, my horse—this morning?"

"Well, he looked fresh and hearty when he went off this morning at daybreak."

"What do you mean?" cried I, jumping up in my bed. "Went off? where to?"

"—With Father Dyke on his back; and a neater hand he couldn't wish over him. 'Tim,' says he to the hostler, as he mounted, 'there's a five-shilling piece for you, for I'm sure, for I won this baste last night, and you must drink my health with me like luck till I'm back.'"

I heard no more, but sinking back into the bed, I covered my face with my hands, overcome with shame and misery. The whole mists that had blurred my faculties had now been swept clean away, and the whole history of the previous evening was revealed before me. My stupid folly, my absurd boastfulness, my egregious story-telling—how to call it worse—were all there; and, shall I acknowledge it? what pained me not less poignantly was the fact that I ventured to stake the horse I dearly loved, and actually lost him at the play-table.

As soon as I rallied from this state of self-accusation, I set to work to think what I should manage to repossess myself of my beast, my loss of which might be converted into a felony. To follow me and recover and ransom Blondel was my first care. Father Dyke would most probably not exact an unreasonable price; he, of course, never believed one word of my supernatural narative about Schamyl and the Caucasus, and he'd take me gently upon Father Dyke the Dublin Potts tipsy. It is true my purse was a very slender one, but Blondel, to any one unacquainted with his pedigree, could not be a costly animal; fifteen pounds—twenty, certainly—ought to buy what the priest would call "every hair on his tail."

It was now too late in the evening to proceed to execute the measures I had resolved on, and so I determined to lie still and ponder over them. Dismissing the waiter, with an order to bring me a cup of tea about eight o'clock, I resumed my cogitations. They were not pleasant ones: Potts a by-word for the most outrageous and incoherent balderdash and untruth—Potts in the Hen and Cry—Potts in the dock—Potts in the Times—Potts pilloried and parodied in Punch—portrait of Potts, price one penny!—these were only a few of the forms in which the descendant of the famous Corsican family of Pozzo di Borgo now presented himself to my imagination.

The courts and chairmanships of old Trinity ringing with laughter, the coarse exaggerations of tasteless scoffers, the jokes and sneers of stupidity, malice, and all uncharitableness, rang in my ears as if I heard them. All possible and impossible versions of the incident passed in review before me: my father, driven distracted by impertinent inquiries, cutting me off with a shilling, and then dying of vexation and chagrin—rewards offered for my apprehension —descriptions, not in any way flatteries, of my personal appearance—paragraphs in local papers hinting that the notorious Potts was supposed to have been seen in our neighborhood yesterday, with sly suggestions of looking after stable doors, etc. I could bear it no longer, I jumped up, and rang the bell violently.

"You know this Father Dyke, waiter? In what part of the country does he live?"

"He's parish priest of Inistiogue," said he, "the snuggest place in the county."

"How far from this may it be?"

"It's a matter of three-and-twenty miles; and by the same token, he said he'd not draw bridle till he got home to-night, for there was a fair at Graigue to-morrow, and if he wasn't pleased with the baste he'd sell him there."

I groaned deeply, for here was a new complication, entirely unlooked for. "I can't possibly mean," gasped I out, "that a respectable clergyman would expose for sale a horse lent to him casually by a friend." The thought struck me that this protest of mine should be thus early recorded.

The waiter scratched his head, and looked confused. Whether another version of the event possessed him, or that the question staggered his convictions, I am unable to say, but he made no reply. "It is true," continued I, in the same strain, "that I met his reverence last night for the first time. My friend Lord Keldrum made us acquainted; but seeing him received at my table as a friend, I actually felt, and said to myself, 'The man Keldrum admits to his table is the equal of any one.' Could any thing be more unlike a gentleman?"

"No, indeed, Sir; nothing," said the waiter, obsequiously.

"Well, then," resumed I, "some day or other it may chance that you will be called on to remember and recall this conversation between us; if so, it will be important that you should have a clear and distinct memory of the fact, that when I awoke in the morning, and asked for my horse, the answer you made me was—What was the answer you made me?"

"The answer I gave you, Sir, said the fellow, sturdily, and with an effrontery I can never forget—"the answer I made was, that the man that won him took him away."

"You're an insolent scoundrel," cried I, boiling over with passion. "You have not the pardon for this outrage on your knees, I'll include you in the indictment for conspiracy."

So far from appearing to be penitential, as I proposed, the fellow grinned from ear to ear, and left the room. It was a long time before I could recover my temper and my composure. That this rascal's evidence would be fatal to me, if the question ever came to trial, was as clear as noonday; and less clear was it that he knew this himself. "I must go back at once to Town," thought I, "and surrender myself to the law. If a compromise be practicable, why I'll perish at the stake." I forgot there was no stake, but there was wood enough, and to spare, picking and wheel-treading, and oyster-shell pounding, and other small plays of this nature, infinitely more degrading and revolting than all the cruelties of our barbarous ancestors.

Now, in no record of lives of adventure had I ever met account of a case like mine. The Silvio Pellicos of Pentonville are yet unwritten martyrs. Prison discipline would vulgarize the greatest epic that ever was written. "Any thing rather than this," said I, aloud. "Proscribed, outlawed, hunted down, but never, gray coated and hob-nailed. Death a Potts be sentenced to the 'crank,' or black-holed as refractory!—Bring me my bill!" cried I, in a voice of indignant anger. "I will go forth into the world of darkness and tempest—I will meet the storm and the lightning—I will bid the conflict of the elements thou man's—than man's—" I wasn't exactly sure what, but there was no need of the word, for a gust of wind had the fastened my umbrella in my face as I issued forth, and left me breathless, as the door closed behind me.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

ALL ALIVE AGAIN.

BEFORE the hands were turned to from dinner, the cabin-bell rang so violently that the orderly's brass scale-plate fixtures on his leather hat fairly rang too as he opened the sacred door.

"Tell the first lieutenant I want him."

The dismayed soldier forgot to lay his white worsted finger on his visor as he slammed to the door and marched out on the gun-deck.

"Mr. Hunt, my manner do I insist a Jack at the fore and fire a gun for a pilot! Get the frigate under way, Sir, and be quick about it!"

"Ay, ay, Sir!"

As Hardy rapidly passed his old cronies, who were cramping along the deck as he mounted the after ladder, he said, with a wave:

"By the Lord! I haven't seen the Commodore in such a hurry since he blew that Pirate out of water at Darien."

In a minute the Monongahela's bell struck two, and the boatswain and his mates, piping as if their hairy throats would split, roared out, "All hands!" and a moment later, "All hands unmoor ship!"

"What the blazes does that mean?" said a cook of a mess to the old quarter-master, who had just come down from his watch.

"Mean? why, you lazy blind duff'r biler, it means that I've lost my blessed dinner!"

"Hello!" says Rat to Beaver, "what's that? Unmoor ship on my liberty day! I swear I'm foreign!"

No you won't, reefers, but you'll trip aloft as fast as your little legs will carry you—Mouse in company—cats in the main, and dogs in irons in and squeak there as much as you like; but jump about and look sharp that nothing goes wrong, or Mr. Hardy will be down upon you like a mad tack.

Bang, from the bow port, and the union-jack at the fore!

"God bless my soul, fellows, this is the most infernal ingratitude I ever heard of!" cried the ward-room; "all of us engaged to dine and dance in Kingston this evening, and—"

"It's all up, Sir, up anchor, gentlemen!" "—and away they all went.

Down went the mess-kids, and down came the awnings, and the sentry left his station to drive in went the bars to both capstans, the nippers clapped on, and the muddy cables coming in at the bows of the ship, and above the running gear was rove, the Sunday bunts to the sails cast off, and the two hundred hammocks dancing about on the decks, spars, and rigging of that American double-banked frigate as if they could always work her single-handed by the combined efforts of their good Commodore there, who was looking at them from the quarter-deck.

"Mamma," said Rose, the shining ebony pilot, in his snowy suit, as he took off his fine white Panama hat, "dis is de ole pilot, So, Peter Cracknell, dat Massa Hardy ask to tek work dere outside. Suppose you tink ob beating dis big frigate troo de channel? Unpossible, wid dis breeze!"

"Peter Crabpref," said the old sailing-master, to whom these observations were addressed, "you just mind your own business, and let those gentlemen there in the epaulets; for if you do, you'll never see Mrs. Cracknell more. You had better have your wits about you, too, and plenty of water under the keel, for the Commodore is fond of water!"

"Sartainly, massa ossifa! I is old Peter, and never yet touch a nail of man-of-war coppers to do reef."

On board the pigmy black schooner near, half a dozen old salt veterans were squinting at the big ship, and making most delicious speculation as to what all the row meant. Old Harry Hawkins, especially, who was the cook, and also the gunner and boatswain of the little vessel, observed that, "In the event of our bein' wanted, ye see, Harry, as how, as well to-morrow's flood tackle stretched along for heavin' in, and get the prop from under the main-boom."

Even as he spoke, a few bits of square duning went up in balls to the mizzen of the frigate, and, blowing out clear, said, as plain as flags could speak, "We're under weigh standin' by."

At the same moment the Rosalie's gig came bounding like a bobbin over the water with the tall gentlemanly figure of the young commander in the stern-sheets. There was a great, nervous, hasty look about him, all this, but with pressure as affectionate as the soft dimpled fingers he himself had held the night before. Gig not steered at all, and now, but going straight as a bullet to the schooner.

The stirring sounds of the fifes as the sailors danced round with the bars in the capstans, with a beating step to keep time to the lively music, were still heard on board the frigate, and these came from the schooner.

"The anchor's under foot, Sir! The anchor's at the bow, Sir!"

"Then, my captain! Aloft, sail-loosers! Trice up! Lay out! Loose away!" Almost at the last command, the schooner was under way of, "All ready with the fore! the main! the mizzen!" "Let fall—sheet home! hoist away the topsails!"

Again were heard the quick notes of the fifes on both decks, and in less than five minutes more the schooner was under way, and the Monongahela under a cloud of canvas, began to move.

But where was the Rosalie, late Centipede, all this time? Why, she was standing under never a tack through the narrow strait, lying over under the big ship's lee, as dimly like a witch on a black broomstick, as she shoots out to sea.

And who is that tall man on that narrow deck clapping on to sheet and tackle, though there was no need of assistance, or skill, or seamanship to be displayed on board that craft, except by way of love of the thing? And why does he, during a pause when there was nothing more that could possibly be done for nearly two weeks, or rather during a great huge old seaman by both hands till he almost jarred the schooner to her keel? Ben Brown the helmsman, whom you have heard of on board the Martha Bland, who, by some accidental word he dropped near to the tall gentleman, caused that hand-grasping collision.

It was not another five minutes before the other thirty-nine old sea-dogs knew all about every thing, and where they were bound, and so on. They did not care a brass button for the thousand silver dollars they were to have from the tall gentleman, not they! They wanted merely to lay their eyes along that Long Tom amidships, and to have a cutlass flashing about their shoulders—be blowed! Pistols be—

But where was the Martha Bland? Oh, that old tub brig was bouncing along past Morant Point, with a good slant from the southeast, pretty much where she was some seventeen years before, with a few passengers aft in the deck cabin, reading their Bibles and praying for those who go down to the sea in ships, on that Sabbath-day.

One looking with her sad eyes out of the stern windows, and another doing the same, and both hunting for the same boy who had been dashed out of one of those windows; and though both of them knew the other's thoughts, yet they did not dream they were thinking of the same person at the time.

And where was the Spanish brigantine, with the exacting Capitano—who was a slaver in dull times—and his pleasant mate, who would think no more of sinking a knife to the hilt in the back of kicking that skulking, icy-eyed sailor on board —detesting as he did the entire Saxon race ever since Cain slew his brother—and throwing him on rotten jerked beef. There were no prayers, only curses, on board that brigantine, as she dropped anchor in St. Jago, now that the sun was setting.

And where was our ancient one-eyed mariner, formerly of the Centipede, now of the schooner Costa felucca, the Panchita, named after his fat banana of a spoon? Oh, the Don—simply Ignacio now—had a quiet cofabb with the deputy Administrador, all about some treasure which he knew was concealed, and where—for he knew it was in his bright eyes—for he had a torch in a cleft of a crag—and he would go shares with that official if he would give him a fair assistance.

"O, cierto!" Why not? and there was an old launch, with a torn latten sail, which Cofabb had purchased, and was getting ready; and, in this fine weather, he might sail back to Port Royal.

Oh yes! But, to keep all secret, he would merely take old Pancha, his wife, for crew. And so he had a few bundles of cheap cigars and some dried fish and water—the only property they possessed save his eye and a pack of cards, which the inhabitants rescued from the rock when they sailed the night before the blessed Sunday. He never came back, though. No blame attributable to him, for what was a poor old man with an old burning spark of suspicious fire as ever; but then old Pancha held the cards, and this time she won. Very singular it was, certes. If Ignacio had not gone back again for another bag—which was not there—the ends of a knave being the next card— Ah! we won't anticipate.

But we are all alive yet, except those murdered wretches whose white coral bones still stand up there in the cactus, and poor Binks, and those slashing blades of the poisonous, many-legged Cantipede, who never more eaten the sharks. All alive, the rest of us; and wide awake!

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE ROPE LAID UP.

WELL, the positions of all hands—be they chief, second, third mate, boatswain, or chief-boatswain of ring on that mutilated flipper, with two underpockets in his shirt, and something in them, a pair of likely old cutlasses ready—and no hanger by his side—where there had been so much hanging in the good old times—and a pistol-barrel in a conger-eel, and swam on shore at St. Jago de Cuba. Without a real of wages—for he was to fly by pelting—and for the reason that he had declined to work, the Capitano in command assisted his agile subordinate to kick him all the way.

Had, however, the mate presented that cold eel his knife for a moment before he jumped overboard and pinned to the bottom, Bill Bumbold would have found a redder sheath than the crimson sash which usually hung there. Nothing, however, for the mate, he was not of a generous disposition—save with kicks and ropes'-ends—nor else he might have regretted his philanthropy.

So soon as the icy-like man had congealed, as it were, in the sun until he was dried, and the frozen again, he slunk away to the ditch of the old fort, where he thawed till nightfall, and then crawled to the town; hunted about the pulperias, smacking and cracking his parched lips for a measure of sugarcanes, only for contaros for the purpose of getting at that fine, generous, pale, amber-colored old port sent to him by the good old fellowship of Oporto! But not having the copper cantraves—though his own coppers stood so much in need of moisture—he continued to thirst.

Presently, coming to the wide streets and to the outskirts of the town, he spied a large mule, ready equipped for the road, tied outside to the door of a house, waiting for his owner to mount him. The icy green-eyed individual, disgusted for the time with blue salt-water, and being, as we know, a capital cavalry man—in dashing charges among the Patriots, and capricking also up the Blue Mountains to Escondido—thought he would take another gallop on the dry ground, and so he got on board and rode away. So far quietly cast off the mule's painter, and flung his canvas legs over the beast, as if he belonged to him. And so he did; for he told the man at whose place he passed an hour or two that night, and who thought he knew the master to whom the mule had once belonged, that it had been presented to him by an old friend, whose name was had the mule's—escaped him.

All this time the one-eyed man, with his banana woman, Pamela, were creeping along the water part of the land—with the Peak of Tarquina in sight—toward Cape Cruz, bound round that peninsula, and so on to the Bocca Leguas Keys; while the man on the mule navigated by the Sierras del Cobre of St. Jago, steering by bridle for Manzanilla, and then to take water again for the same secret destination.

The cargo that both expected to take to there was about ten thousand pounds sterling, in millodewed coin of various realms and denominations; but it was there, and would pass current any where.

So they sailed and navigated. It was tedious work, though. And it took a week for the old launch with the torn sail to get into the Tiger's Trap—fine weather, and no sea—and there make fast to the rocks. All the same evening home the mule with his passenger planted his fore feet, like a pair of hedges over his bows, in the fishing village near Manzilla, and foundered bodily, going down with his freight slip-dash in the mud. The passenger, however, escaped, and sculled along by the shore, where he fell in with a poor fisherman who was about to shove off in his train, wholesome bark, for professional recreation on the Esperanza bank.

Glad was old Miguel Tortuga to have a strong man to scull for the privilege of joining in with a sip of aguardiente and catching a red snapper or two. So they jumped on board and spread the sail.

Had old Miguel, however, seen the sharklike eyes of his assistant in the sunlight, or guessed what a snapper was about to catch him, he would not have gone fishing that night; and it would have saved him much tribulation at present, and the next morning, when he was picked off a small rock by a fisher acquaintance of his from Manzanilla.

But we have nothing to do with old Miguel; and need only say, to console him, that his staunch boat went safely through the blue gateway of the roaring ledge of white breakers, and late Sunday night lay calmly in the inlet abreast Captain Brand's former dwelling.

"OFT AS I LOOK ON THE FACE OF HER CHILD."

APRES.

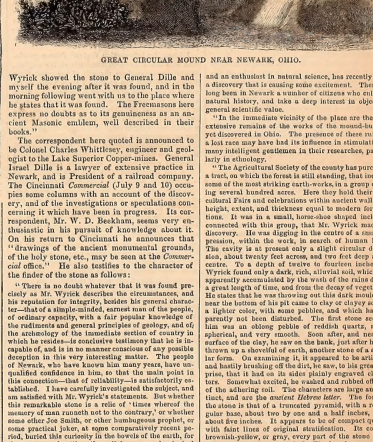
Down, down, Ellen, my little one—
Climbing so tenderly up my knee;
Why should you add to the thoughts that are haunting me
Dreams of your mother's arms clinging to me?

Cease, cease, Ellen, my little one—
Warbling so fairly close to my ear;
Why should you chorus, of all songs that are haunting me,
This, that I made for your mother to hear?

Hush, hush, Ellen, my little one—
Walking so wearily under the stars;
Why should I think of her tears, that make light to me
Love that had made life, and sorrow that mars?

Sleep, sleep, Ellen, my little one—
In she not like her, wherever she stirs?
Has she not eyes that will soon be as bright to me,
Lips that will some day be honey'd, like hers?

Yes, yes, Ellen, my little one—
Though her white bosom is stiff'd in the grave,
Something more white than her bosom is spared to me,
Something to sing to, and something to crave:



Love, love, Ellen, my little one!
Love indestructible, love undefiled,
Save through all deeps of her spirit, lies bared to me,
Oft as I look on the face of her child.

THE OHIO "HOLY STONE."

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS,—Since our interview at your publishing-house last week, at which you showed me sundry letters and drawings concerning a queer-looking stone with a Hebrew inscription, said to have been dug from the ground at or near the village of Newark, Ross County, Ohio, I have found that several others here have been favored with such communications. I do not know how many have received like drawings and descriptions; but, according to all accounts, this very shallow, flat, and impudent imposture has been very briskly circulated, with no little pecuniary gain to its contriver, and promoters; and as my attention was very early called to it, with a request for such information or opinion as I might be able to give about the matter, I will, with your permission, avail myself of the attractive columns of your popular Weekly, with its vast continental circulation, to crush and "squelch" this serpent's egg with a single tread.

Comparing the documents received by you and others from New York, I have been reminded of Mrs. Page's declaration to Mrs. Ford, in "Merry Wives of Windsor:" "Here is the very twin-brother of thy love-letter"—though the letters are from different persons. They all relate, with laborious particularity, the alleged circumstances of the discovery of the marvelous object, and all coincide in harmonious testimony of the intelligence, integrity, veracity, sagacity, and learning of all persons concerned. From their compared and combined statements I derive the following account.

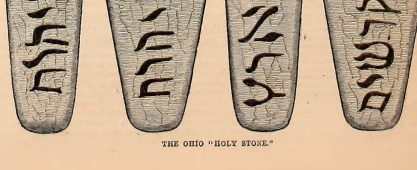
Mr. David Wyrick, a resident of Newark, Ohio, is described to us as "a self-taught man and an enthusiast in natural science." He is also stated to be "poor, and to have taken the antiquarian trade, hoping to realize something from it to support himself and his family." And it is also stated that "Mr. Wyrick can get abundant testimonials of his character for truth and veracity, and that what he says in relation to the discovery is worthy of all credit." Again, a correspondent of the Newark Ohio Farmer says: "All the citizens whom I have heard speak of Mr. Wyrick say that the idea is not to be entertained of his making an attempt to deceive the community in this matter. He is an old resident, and has been surveyor of the county. I have seen no one who discredits his statements, as appearances at the place are such as to throw no suspicion upon them. Mr. Wyrick showed the stone to General Dile and myself the evening after it was found, and in the morning following went with us to the place where he states that it was found. The Freemasons here express no doubts as to its genuineness as an ancient Masonic emblem, well described in their books."

GREAT CIRCULAR MOUND NEAR NEWARK, OHIO.

The correspondent here quoted is announced to be Colonel Charles Whittlesey, engineer and geologist to the Lake Superior Copper-mines. General Israel Dille is a lawyer of extensive practice in Newark, and is President of a railroad company. The Cincinnati Commercial (July 9 and 10) occupies some columns with an account of the discovery, and of the investigations or speculations concerning it which have been in progress. Its correspondent, Mr. W. D. Beckham, seems very enthusiastic in his pursuit of knowledge about it. On his return to Cincinnati he announces that "drawings of the ancient monumental grounds, of the holy stone, etc., may be seen at the Commercial office." He also testifies to the character of the finder of the stone as follows:

"There is no doubt whatever that it was found precisely as Mr. Wyrick describes the circumstances, and his reputation for integrity, besides his general character—that of a simple-minded, earnest man of the people, of ordinary capacity, with a fair popular knowledge of the rudiments and general principles of geology, and of the archæology of the immediate section of country in which he resides—is conclusive testimony that he is incapable of, and is in no manner conscious of any possible deception in this very interesting matter. The people of Newark, who have known him many years, have unqualified confidence in him, so that the main point in this connection—that of reliability—is satisfactorily established. I have carefully investigated the subject, and am satisfied with Mr. Wyrick's statements. But whether this remarkable stone is a relic of 'times whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary,' or whether some sober Joe Smith, or other humbugeous prophet, or some practical joker, at some comparatively recent period, buried this curiosity in the bowels of the earth, for the purpose of setting the religious or archæological world 'by the ears,' is a mystery which time only can dissipate."

The discovery is thus described by Colonel Whittlesey:



"Mr. David Wyrick, of this place, a self-taught man, and an enthusiast in natural science, has recently made a discovery that is causing some excitement. There has long been in Newark a number of citizens who cultivate natural history, and take a deep interest in objects of general scientific value.

"In the immediate vicinity of the place are the most extensive remains of the works of the mound-builders yet discovered in Ohio. The presence of these ruins of a lost race may have had its influence in stimulating so many intelligent gentlemen in their researches, particularly in ethnology.

"The Agricultural Society of the county has purchased a tract, on which the forest is still standing, that incloses some of the most striking earth-works, in a group covering several hundred acres. Here they hold their Agricultural Fairs and celebrations within ancient walls, of a height, extent, and thickness equal to modern fortifications. It was in a small, horse-shoe shaped inclosure, connected with this group, that Mr. Wyrick made his discovery. He was digging in the centre of a small depression, within the work, in search of human bones. The cavity is at present only a slight circular depression, about twenty feet across, and two feet deep at the centre. To a depth of twelve to fourteen inches Mr. Wyrick found only a dark, rich, alluvial soil, which had apparently accumulated by the wash of the rains during a great length of time, and from the decay of vegetation. He states that he was throwing out this dark mould, and near the bottom of his pit came to clay or clayey soil, of a lighter color, with some pebbles, and which had apparently not been disturbed. The first stone seen by him was an oblong pebble of reddish quartz, nearly spherical, and very smooth. Soon after, and near the surface of the clay, he saw on the bank, just after he had thrown up a shovelful of earth, another stone of a singular form. On examining it, it appeared to be artificial, and hastily brushing off the dirt, he saw, to his great surprise, that it had on its sides plainly engraved characters. Somewhat excited, he washed and rubbed off most of the adhering soil. The characters are large and distinct, and are the ancient Hebrew letter. The form of the stone is that of a truncated pyramid, with a rectangular base, about two by one and a half inches, rising about five inches. It appears to be of compact quartz, with faint lines of original stratification. Its color is brownish-yellow, or gray, every part of the stone being smoothly ground and polished. The four faces approach each other toward the top, which forms a square of about an inch across, the corners of which are rounded off. On the base is a projection, or knob, with a neck for the purpose of engendering it. The inscription occupies each of the four faces. Mr. M'Carty, of this place, who is a Hebrew scholar, has translated three of the sentences as follows: 'Holy of Holies,' 'The Word of the Law,' and 'The Word of the Lord;' the remaining one is not yet definitely understood. Mr. Cunningham's is a Free-mason, and well informed upon the history of the order, and upon antiquities in general, says the stone was one used by Masons of a certain grade in the East, soon after the building of the first temple by Solomon, and before the assertion of the second. It has in their system a well-known meaning; its principal use in ancient times being for deposit beneath the foundations of the building. Masons might ascertain. This symbol was not necessarily furnished with inscriptions; but the Mason could not use it right in all positions upon it, as this one has.

GRADED WAY, PIKE COUNTY MOUNDS.

THE OHIO "HOLY STONE."

"It would be placed in the northeastern part of the foundation; and if it stood on its point, would indicate that something more was deposited beneath. If it lay on its broader side, or small end, would only indicate the direction where other deposits would be found. These, if found, would of course be contemporaries of the building.

"No person was present with Mr. Wyrick but his son, thirteen or fourteen years of age, who saw his father pick up the stone from the earth he had just thrown out. The little earth still adhering to it in the depressions of the letters corresponds to that of the bottom of the pit, and it is evidently ancient, as well as all the marks on the stone."

The material of the relic is stated to be soapstone or "lemaccone." It is not found among the rocks or minerals of that region; but Mr. Whittlesey is familiar with it in the geology of the Lake Superior country. It also occurs in Vermont and New Hampshire. It may also be found in the shop of every cabinet-maker, carpenter, and cooper, and of every mechanic who prefers edges dressed to working in wood.

It is gratifying to learn that the purpose for which Mr. Wyrick took the "took the trade" of digging after antiquities has been so far accomplished that he is selling the copies of the stone, with the inscription, at one dollar a piece, as fast as he can produce them, and "that several gentlemen of Cincinnati have subscribed for Abraham "to edify" Mr. Wyrick that they will contribute something in the way of compensation for his trouble, if he will exhibit his knowledge in that city. Curiosity upon it is great; and it is very probable that Mr. Wyrick would realize enough there to pay him for his adventure." Meanwhile, they "are also taking measures to obtain casts"—which will no doubt be sold at a reasonable profit, to the great advancement of this new branch of domestic industry and truly ingenious invention.

I have spread all the evidence in this case before you and your readers, that you may take all the facts precisely in the form in which they were submitted to me, more than a month ago. I remark at the point where we stand now was I when these statements were read to me. I had read the inscription: I had, long before, seen one of the similar copies which you publish in connection with this. These letters are MODERN Hebrew—that is, ANCIENT Hebrew characters. They have, until lately, been copied from a printed Hebrew Bible. It happen to be the oldest printed Hebrew book, a Chaldaic Bible in the world, and the oldest printed Hebrew Lexicon, which I leave subject to your order whether you or your learned readers may wish to satisfy themselves by actual inspection that the truth is as I state it. And I will undertake to learn, by one or my ordinarily intelligent child of eight years and upward, to read any new inscription of that kind, after three hours' teaching, not merely of a sign, but in the dark, by touch upon his fingers over depressions thus made in a stone.

Now, if there can be found (and there has actually been found within five or six years past) an inscription in the ancient Hebrew or Phœnician character, seventy-five hundred years old, that could not be found in America, or in the whole world, a person who can read or interpret it satisfactorily to himself or not body else without mouths, or two hags years, of hard study. On this point I refer you to Professor Gibbs, Salisbury, and Whitney, of New Haven, and to any other master of the American Oriental Society, as likewise to any of their correspondents in Europe or Asia, who have received the last number of the lately-published epitaph of that Phœnician monarch who reigned when Alexander Great besieged and captured ancient Tyre. Of the authenticity and genuineness of that inscription no scholar doubts, though more than twenty-four hundred years rolled unheeded away since those characters were cut on that stone.

The Hebrews in their two or three generations of Babylonish captivity had lost the spoken "tongue of Canaan;" and all excepting a few scribes and interpreters (such as Ezra), lost also the knowledge of the letters in the law of God was written. When they returned, under the permission and patronage of Cyrus and other Persian kings, they spoke only Chaldee (or Eastern Aramean), and could neither write nor read any other than Chaldaic letters. Hence the peculiar characters and more unlike those now commonly called Hebrew, and universally employed both in manuscript and printed books in Europe, and in German, as Russian letters are to those employed in printing Harper's Weekly.

A learned friend some time since read me the following from a Cincinnati paper, which I beg you to copy, if you can find room for it:

"The accomplished scholar, Ethnographical Tourist, Mr. J. J. Benjamin, who has devoted his life to efforts to trace the 'Lost Tribes' of Israel, called upon me to make inquiries concerning the Holy Keptown, and through an interpreter informed me that the translation of the inscription was correct and accurate, and promised to furnish the correct renderings. Tenth Jehanah, he thought—his meaning rendered 'God's Knowledge' than—as quoted yesterday—'The Law of God.' Mr. B. is perhaps the best Hebrew scholar now in this country, being more familiar with that language, he says, than with his mother tongue. His most important communication was that the letters of the inscriptions are identical with those of the time of Ezra—contemporary with the second Temple—but the inscriptions themselves have no connection with the 'Lost Tribes'—a supposition not seriously entertained by any one. He said, moreover, that he is a Mason, and he thinks it likely the Keptown stone was connected to the order. I have written some valuable hints upon this subject for publication. Mr. B.'s home is in the Turkish Province of Moldavia, and he is in this country for the purpose of procuring researches among the Indians for evidences of the 'Lost Tribes.'"

So Mr. Benjamin, the Moldavian Jew, is "the best Hebrew scholar now in this country" in his own opinion, and in that of people who don't know Hebrew from Japanese!

According to that great rule for the interpretation and application of evidence laid down by Greenleaf in his argument in defense of Mills, we may be endeavoring to direct suspicion as to the author of the hoax, first inquire—who is the man that has been persuaded by benefited by it? But, in consideration of the strong testimonials of Mr. Wyrick's veracity and general honesty which have been presented to us by gentlemen of high position in his vicinity, we are bound to believe that in this matter he has been and is a victim, and not a "victimizer."

Look at these drawings of the Holy Keystone! The four sides are not of equal width: two are broad, and two are narrow. Do not these the proportions of every hone-stone, whether imported from Ireland, Scotland, Vermont, New Hampshire, Arkansas, or Lake Superior?

The fellow who manufactured this profitable commodity apparently took a new hone, and worked at it with a jack-knife or a file, for his own amusement until he brought it into the shape of an oldfashioned square axe-head, such as are largely imported from Rotterdam, containing Holland gin. The original proportions of the stone prevented him from mistaking it for a perfect edge-tool in his model. When his work was done, somebody probably suggested to him that it would be a good joke to carry it to somebody or other on the line of Wyrick's diggings, after putting a Hebrew inscription on it. Once "established" it would soon furnish ed the form of the letters for that purpose. Or, for that matter, every educated clergyman's library contains a Hebrew Bible (and Mr. Wyrick may suppose), and of course might have been innocently loaned by its owner for such a use. These phrases, Tree Law of God," and "The Word or THE LORD, etc., occur in more than a hundred passages in the Old Testament, in every English Bible-reader knows. How long a time would one of your readers take to find these words in a Hebrew Bible, and, with a pen on a stone, first in pencil, and then in graving?

I know, by information derived from a gentleman who has excavated among the most mighty, marvelous, mysterious mounds of the great Ohio Valley, and who has exhumed more valuable remains of the works of a long-lost people, or any other archæologist, living or dead, that no stone, whether novaculite or any thing else (even granite), can be buried in that soil for one century, or a century without becoming covered by a calcareous incrustation, or acquiring a fibruginous or other stain from the earth which encloses it. And yet this Newark Holy Stone comes up from its entombment of some thousand years' duration, as the last two or three as clean and bright and slick as a new whistle! It is impossible to deceive a practiced eye by any such transparent device as this. Every clumsy contrivance presents. It was first described and depicted to us as having its angles perfect and its surfaces quite smooth. But the latter defect as very smooth, and the letters so very distinct, after all, as was first represented. It is also represented to be some days that the inscription may soon become illegible at this rate of deterioration.

It is to be regretted that it has been ascertained that the name of their order has been introduced in connection with this arrant nonsense. I am not authorized to speak for the Masonic order, nor any fabulous or competent to appear as its vindicator. But if any man professing to be a Royal Arch Mason will tell me that the inscription on the Dutch gin-bottle (a little flattened) is a keystone, I shall tell him that if he understands Masonry, in any sense of that word, entitled to "Entered Prentice" he did not.

Some zealous seekers after the missing tribes of Israel, with a "zeal not according to knowledge," and whose reading of Scripture must have been of the most cursory and superficial kind, have taken up this matter, and talk of "the nine and a half lost tribes." The Bible tells us that there were thirteen tribes, of whom two (Levi and Joseph) "seceded from the union," under the lead of Jeroboam, leaving three (Judah, Benjamin, and Levi) adherent to the kings of the house of David. Levi, by the two sons of Jacob, one (Joseph) was the ancestor of the two distinct and independent tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. One half of the last named received its portion of territory with Reuben and Gad, on the east side of Jordan; while the other half settled on the other side of the river, between Asher, Issachar, and Ephraim. There were two half-tribes of Joseph, and two half-tribes make one whole in this part of the country, as they probably did in Canaan in the days of Moses and Joshua. WILLIAM WALKER AGAIN.

IT is the manifest destiny of William Walker to go a filibustering in Central America, and it is likewise his manifest destiny to cause to grief in the pursuit of his filibustering enterprise. His latest exploit has been to land at the head of two or three hundred adventurers near Truxillo, in Honduras, which State he probably proposes to conquer. Meanwhile both British and American vessels of war have arrived on the coast, and if the Spanish-Americans don't demolish him before they arrive on the scene of action he will again be seized and carried off a prisoner, as he was when he last landed in Nicaragua.

Mr. William Walker is a living illustration of the adage about "seizing the tide at the flood." Time was, not many years ago, when this country and the whole civilized world would have gladly hailed him as the ruler of Nicaragua. He failed to appreciate his situation, got drunk with power, luck, ball, and that fortune time has never recurred. Since Walker's capitulation men's minds have undergone a change in regard to filibusterism. It is not, by any means, the popular diversion it was when crowded meetings in New York, headed by men of character and position, passed complimentary resolutions to the "Dictator" of Central America. It is, in fact, at a heavy discount—so heavy that even a British ship should seize Walker and carry him off in irons it would be impossible to arouse any indignation here.

People are beginning to doubts whether the degeneration of the Central American countries is to be achieved by lawless invasions by armed desperadoes, whose aim is plunder, whose instrument is the rifle, and whose principles are those of highwaymen. Had Mr. Walker remained power in Nicaragua and devoted his energies to opening that country to civilization instead of seeking to conquer, as he did, mankind would have overlooked the informalities of his rise to applaud the practical benefits of his sovereignty. But, in view of the miserable issue of his Nicaraguan enterprise, he can expect no further indulgence. He has no right to expect that the British fleet will turn over more crimes, or to revive hopes which he has so bitterly disappointed. He has exhausted all that was favorable in his manifest destiny: that which is now most manifest for him is shameful defeat and perhaps a halter.

THE WEATHER.

THUS has been the hottest summer, they say, since 1854. In parts of the South the thermometer has ranged from 100° to 105° Fahrenheit for days together; and here in New York we have had a considerable more than a fair proportion of "dog days."

Scientific men say that the average temperature of every place is always the same on the same isothermal line. It may perhaps be safe, therefore, to look for an unusually cool summer next year. At all events, as the last two or three winters have been unusually mild, we ought to expect a severe visit from the Ice King in January and February next.

The temperature is important so far as the crops are concerned; and it is noteworthy that while in 1858 and 1859, which were mild years both in summer and winter, we had the largest cotton and the poorest food crops ever grown in the country since it was peopled to its present extent, in 1860 we are having the largest grain crop ever harvested, and probably a short cotton crop than last year. Yet cotton is said to be capable of standing any quantity of heat, while wheat and corn are liable to suffer severely from drought. Here is a nut for the clerk of the weather to crack.

JENKINS.

THE newspapers are full of satirical articles about Jenkins. The poor fellow, it seems, is on the track of the Prince of Wales, and describes his face, his figure, his dress, his style, his tones, his habits, his bedroom, his washbowl, his trunks, his tooth-brush, and his linen with characteristic pains and fidelity. For this editor after editor denounces him as a snob who disgraces this free and independent nation. We beg to offer another and general verdict.

We like Jenkins. He is a useful creature, and monstrously amusing. We will wager the Lower Canada agaisnt a jelly-bout that the half of the reading community like him too. We will make the same wager that his articles are read by ten people when political leaders are read by one of the seven wise Sicily by five. Judged by the standard of popular taste, Jenkins is the greatest writer of the day.

But, we are told, Jenkins's style is a very unsafe guide; Jenkins ponders to a morbid curiosity which is impertinent and snobbish. We are not so sure of this. The desire to know how persons live in a widely different sphere from ours live and move and have their being, is, after all, very natural; it is akin to the curiosity which stimulates courageous men to undertake perilous travels, and which prompts thousands to read their accounts of what they have seen. We are ashamed of being in interested in Hue's lively descriptions of private l. fe in China; nobody calls Barth, or Livingstone, or Holtzo, or Anderson, or Ledyard, or Kohl, or Bruce a snob or a Jenkins; it is only when the personage described is a lord or a prince that the writer's office is deemed degrading, and the public taste for his writings termed morbid and impertinent.

Yet Jenkins is doing great good in his way. He is preserving invaluable materials for history. It is on the Jenkins of the Herald that the future historian will rely when he wants to delineate the early character of King Edward the Seventh of England. But for Avaux—that model Jenkins—Burnet, another of the family, and others of the same kin, Macaulay never could have written his history. Much less could we understand the old French monarchy if such Jenkinses as the Duke of St. Simon, Madame de Sévigné, and others, had never lived and gossiped. Jenkins, again, is a mighty censor. Monarchs would be at the theater of his pen. When the Prince of Wales wanted to fire off Pasmague corks at the bald spot in the Duke of Newcastle's head, he civilly asked Jenkins to stand aside. How much more pleasant would the request have been had his Royal Highness intended to do any thing mean, or wrong, or degrading! Jenkins is, in truth, the censor of the day. Grant plenty of Jenkinses and monarchs will be careful of their conduct. One Jenkins, while attending a free pass at Naples, would have brought Bomba to contrition long ago.

Let us hope, then, that we shall hear less abuse of the newspaper creature; or, at all events, let those who abuse Jenkins be careful enough not to read his letters. That will be punishment enough.

WHAT ARE THE BRITISH RESIDENTS TO DO WITH THEIR PRINCE?

THIS problem is exercising the minds of the parties interested to a severe extent. At first it was proposed by some of the more ardent subjects of Queen Victoria to stop the Royal Highness on his arrival here, and keep him bottled up for the exclusive delectation of unadulterated "British Residents." This would relieve some sarasms from the press, and was abandoned. Two new plans are now suggested—one by the British Consul, who proposes to give a select ball to His Royal Highness when New York merchants having determined to give him a dinner; another by Mr. Edwards, the Consul's late attaché, who proposes that a drinking fountain shall be erected by the British residents, and the corner-stone laid by the Prince.

Both plans have encountered immediate opposition. The Consul's project is somewhat unpopular with the British residents by reason of the Prince's arrival here, no one can object to their fitting him at their own expense; nor can the most captious person take exception to a Prince of Wales drinking fountain erected in Broadway at the cost of our English fellowtownsmen.

We will venture one word of advice to the British residents. What they have to do must be done quietly, not obtrusively. The Prince comes here, not to see them, but to see American citizens. He has not asked them to be informed of their intention to monopolize him, his answer was tarter than they might have liked to hear. And if they attempt the same scheme in a new shape when he does arrive, they may be reminded, in sharper language than is pleasant, that England has room for all her sons at home. We do not hear that the Princess on his travels through Europe, paid any marked attention to the British residents of the cities he visited.

THE LOUNGER.

NO. 9 BROADWAY.

IF you have been lately by the Bowling-Green on your down-town walk one of the houses upon the western side of Broadway, looking upon that pretty patch of green, has been taken down. The demolition was sudden and swift. It seemed, to a jealous mind, as if somebody were in a great hurry to have it down and out of his mind at a season when the world is nominally out of town.

Do you remember the house? It was known in the Alderman's Books, No. 9 Broadway—a low-browed, rough, gray, plaster building, with large windows, and a general aspect of sturdy quaintness pleasant to behold. It laid in snug and lovely among the pavious palaces that sprang up around it. It was old and low, and yet it somehow contrived to stand itself to the general appearance of the neighborhood—to keep in fashion without altogether taking off its queue and knee breeches.

But they are down all now, prostrate utterly and it and they shall not be seen again. Yet how much more has been knocked down in front of houses than most people think! How often have you remembered that the building lately known as the Astor Gardens was only the outer structure upon that site since the foundation of the city? Miss Mary Booth tells the story in her charming, genuine "History of the City of New York." It seems that rather more than two centuries ago—about 1642—a certain Dirck Straetmaker was the village green. There the little Knickerbockers played tag, kindled bonfires, and danced on holidays and about the May-pole. There, perhaps, the burgher warriors of New Amsterdam were paraded, and, full of comfortable sauer-kraut and the thick fumes of tobacco, shook their stately little fists at the world. New, in 1643, sundry grants of lots of land upon Heere Straat were made to different people; and Martin Krigier was the first grantee of a lot containing about eighty-six rods, opposite the Bowling-Green. Martin Krigier, however, did not build until the year 1659. He seems to have been a notable man—a servant of the West India Company, a trader between the city and Fresh (Kingston), upon the North River, and an efficient officer in follows: 'Holy of Holies,' 'The Word of the Law,' and 'The Word of the Lord;' the remaining one is not yet definitely ascertained. Mr. Cunningham, with Mr. Deasson, and well informed upon the history of the order, and upon antiquities in general, says the stone was one used by Masons of a certain grade in the East, soon after the building of the first temple by Solomon, and before the erection of the second. It has in their system a well-known meaning; it principled use in ancient times being for deposit beneath whatever structure the Master Mason might superintend. This symbol was not necessarily furnished with a sepulchre; but the Master could not use it might put sentences upon it, as this one has.

"It would be laid in the northeastern part of the foundation; and if it stood on its point, would indicate that something more was deposited beneath. If it stood on its broad face, the point, or small end, would indicate the direction where other deposits would be found. There, it is found, such deposits have generally been so far building.

"No person was present with Mr. Wyrick but his son, thirteen or fourteen years of age, who saw his father pick up the stone, and when he had split thirteen pieces off a little earth still remaining in the depressions of the letters corresponds to that of the bottom of the pit, and it is evidently ancient, as well as all the letters on the stone."

The material of the relic is stated to be noraculite or "lime-stone." It is not found among the rocks or minerals of that region; but Mr. Whittlesey is familiar with the geology of the Lake Erie region of country. It also occurs in Vermont and New Hampshire. It may also be found in the shop of every cabinet-maker, carpenter, and mason, and of every mechanic who employs edge-tools for working in wood.

It is gratifying to learn that the purpose for which Mr. Wyrick "took the trade" of digging after antiquities has been so far accomplished that he is relieving himself of the stone, with the letters, at one dollar a piece, as fast as he can produce them, and "without a single gentleman of character who has authenticated" Mr. Beakman "to notify Mr. Wyrick that they will contribute something in the way of contributing for his trouble, if he will exhibit his keystone in that city. Curiosity to see it is great; and it is very probable that Mr. Wyrick would realize enough from the sale to repay all his adventure." In Newark, they "are also taking measures to obtain casts"—which will no doubt be sold at a reasonable profit, to the great encouragement of this new branch of domestic industry and truly ingenious invention.

I have read all the evidence in this case before you and your readers, that you may take all the facts pertaining to the relic in which they were submitted to me, more than a month ago. Precisely at the point where we stand now was I when these statements were handed to me. I had read the inscriptions "at sight," having before me the facsimile copies which you publish in connection with this. They are in the SQUARE HEBREW—that is, ANCIENT CHALDAIC characters. They have, manifestly, been copied from a printed Hebrew Bible. I happen to have the oldest printed Hebrew and Chaldaic Bible in the world, and the oldest printed Hebrew lexicon, which I have subject to your order whenever any of your learned readers may wish to satisfy themselves by actual inspection that this is not a mere joke. And I have also taken to teach you, or any ordinarily intelligent child of eight years and upward, to read any new inscription of Chaldaic, after three hours' teaching, not merely "at sight," but in the dark, by passing his fingers over depressions thus made in a stone.

Now, if you can be found (and there is no actually been found within five or six years past) an inscription in the ancient Hebrew or Phœnician characters, above five hundred years old, which will not be found in America, or in the whole world, a person who can read or interpret it satisfactorily to himself or any body else without months, or perhaps years, of hard study. On this point I refer you to Professors Gibbs, Salisbury, and Whitney, of New Haven, and to any other member of the American Oriental Society, as likewise to any of their correspondents in Europe or Asia, who have received their transcript of the lately discovered epitaph of that Phœnician monarch who reigned when Alexander the Great besieged and conquered Tyre. Of the authenticity and genuineness of that inscription no scholar doubts, though more than twenty-five years have rolled unheeded away and since those characters were cut on that stone.

The Hebrew in their two or three generations of Babylonish captivity lost the spoken "language of Canaan;" and all, excepting a few scribes and interpreters, forgot (or, less) also the knowledge of the letters in which the law of God was written. When they returned, under the permission and patronage of Cyrus and other Persian kings, to speak only Chaldee (or Eastern Aramaic), and could neither write nor read any other than Chaldaic letters. The ancient Hebrew characters were more unlike those now commonly called Hebrew, and universally employed both in manuscripts and printed books than Greek, or German, or Russian letters are to those employed in printing Harper's Weekly.

A learned friend some time since read me the following from a Cincinnati paper, which I beg you to copy in the first odd room for it:

> "The somewhat celebrated Ethnographical Tourist, Mr. J. W. Benjamin, who has devoted his life to efforts to trace the Lost Tribes of Israel, claims to have made inquiries concerning the Holy Keystone, and through an interpreter informed me that the translations of the inscriptions were not accurate, and promised to furnish the correct renderings. Tovarh Jehovah, he thought was correctly rendered 'God's Holy Association—as quoted yesterday—'The Law of God.' Mr. B. is perhaps the most famous scholar now in the country, being more familiar with that language, he says, than with his mother tongue. His most important communication was that the letters of the inscriptions are identical with those of the time of EZRA—contemporary with the second Temple—but the inscriptions themselves have no connection with the 'Lost Tribes'—as supposition not seriously entertained by any one. He said, moreover, that he is a Mason, and he thinks it likely the Keystone was originally placed in the order. He promised some valuable hints upon this subject for publication. Mr. B.'s home is in the Turkish Province of Mardavis, and he is in this country for the purpose of presenting researches among the Indians for evidences of the 'Lost Tribes.'"

Mr. Benjamin, the Moldavian Jew, is "the best Hebrew scholar now in this country" in his own opinion, and in that of people who don't know Hebrew from Japanese!

According to that great rule for the interpretation and application of evidence laid down by Cicero in his argument in defence of Milo, we should be endeavoring to direct suspicion as to the author of the hoax, first inquire—who is the man that has the greatest interest in it? That is one consideration of the strong testimonials of Mr. Wyrick's character, which have been, or will have been presented to us by gentlemen of high position in his vicinity, we are bound to believe that in this matter he has been and is a victim, and not a "victimizer."

Look at these drawings of the Holy Keystone. The four sides are all alike, and each one is set forth broad, and two are narrow. Are not these the proportions of every hone-stone, whether imported from Arkansas, or brought from Vermont, New Hampshire, Arkansas, or Lake Superior?

The letters are unquestionably fabricated with counterfeit monetary skill, and with a knowledge of the form of the letters for that purpose. Or, for that matter, every educated person knows that there contains a Hebrew Bible (even in Ohio, we may suppose), and of course might have been innocently leaned to the "Word of the Law," and the phrases, THE LAW OF THE LORD, THE WORD OF THE LORD, etc., occur in more than a hundred passages in the Old Testament, and in the Chaldaic Bible-reader knows. How long a time would one of your readers take to find these words in a Hebrew Bible, and, with a pencil, underscore, first in pencil, and then in graving?

I know, by information derived from a gentleman who has excavated hundreds of the mighty, marvelous, mysterious mounds of the great Ohio Valley, and who has personally explored the remains of the works of their builders than any other archæologist, living or dead, that no stone, whether or nevaculite or lime-stone, has been found that can be buried in that soil for so much as half a century without becoming covered by a calcareous incrustation, or coating, which cannot be removed but with the earth which indoves it. And yet this Newark Holy Stone comes up from its entombment of some thousand years, or hundreds of years, with as fine a clean and bright and slick as a new whistle! It is impossible to believe that it has been in any such transparent device as this flimsy, clumsy contrivance presents. It was first described and depicted in a way that left the impression that its angles are not so very exact, and the surface so very smooth, and the letters so very distinct, after all, as was first reported. Now, the angles are said to be some danger that the inscription may soon become illegible at this rate of deterioration.

It is to be regretted by all true Freemasons that the name of their order has been introduced in connection with this arrant humbug. Masonry is authorized to speak for that institution, nor am I ambitious or competent to appear as its vindicator. But if any one should ask me, I should say that Mason will tell me that the miniature effigy of a Dutch gin-bottle (a little flattened) is a keystone, I shall tell him that it is a Masonic keystone, in any sense of that word, certainly Sir Christopher Wren did not.

Some zealous seekers after the missing tribes of Israel, with a "zeal not according to knowledge," and whose reading of Scripture must have been of late much scarcer and weaker than it was before they took up this matter, and talk of "the nave and a half bar-rider," "the Holy Ark," etc., etc., while the other thirteen tribes, of whom ten whole tribes "seceded from the union," under the lead of Jeroboam, leaving three (Judah and Benjamin, with the Levites) under the kings of the house of David. Of the twelve sons of Jacob, one (Joseph) was the ancestor of the two distinct and independent entire tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. One half of the last named received its portion of territory with Reuben and Gad by the people's vote, while the other half settled on the other side of the river, between Asher, Issachar, and Ephraim. There were two half-tribes of Manasseh; and two halves make one whole in this part of the country, as they probably did in the days of the Judges and Jehoshaphat. Grant plenty of Jenkinses and monarchs will walk in the light of their conduct. One Jenkins, wielding a free pen at Naples, would have brought Bomba to contrition long ago.

Let us hope, then, that we shall hear less abuse of the Jenkins species hereafter; or, at all events, let those who abuse Jenkins be consistent enough not to read his letters. That will be punishment enough.

WHAT ARE THE BRITISH RESIDENTS TO DO WITH THEIR PRINCE?

THIS problem is exercising the minds of the parties interested to a severe extent. At first it was proposed by the British residents and other subjects of Queen Victoria to seize His Royal Highness on his arrival here, and keep him locked up for the exclusive gratification of unsubdued "Britishers." This scheme elicited some sarcasms from the press, and was abandoned. Then a new plan was suggested—one by the British Consul, who proposes to give a select ball to His Royal Highness, the New York merchants having determined to give him a dinner; another by Mr. Edward Knight, Consul's law adviser, who proposes that a drinking fountain shall be erected by the British residents, and the temperance men led by Gough.

Both plans commend themselves to public approval. While it would have been obviously unseemly for the British residents to appropriate the Prince on his arrival here, no one can object to their fitting him at their own expense; nor can the most captious person take exception to a Prince of Wales drinking from the purest stream in Broadway at the cost of our English fellowtownsmen.

We will venture one word of advice to the British residents. What they do should be done quietly, not obtrusively. The Prince comes here, not to see them, but to see American citizens. It is true that when he was robbed of their intention to monopolize him, his answer was tarter than they might have liked to hear. And if they attempt the same game in a new shape when he does arrive, they may be reminded, in sharper language than is pleasant, that England has room for all her sons at home. We do not hear that the Prince, on his travels through Europe, paid any marked attention to the British residents of the cities he visited.

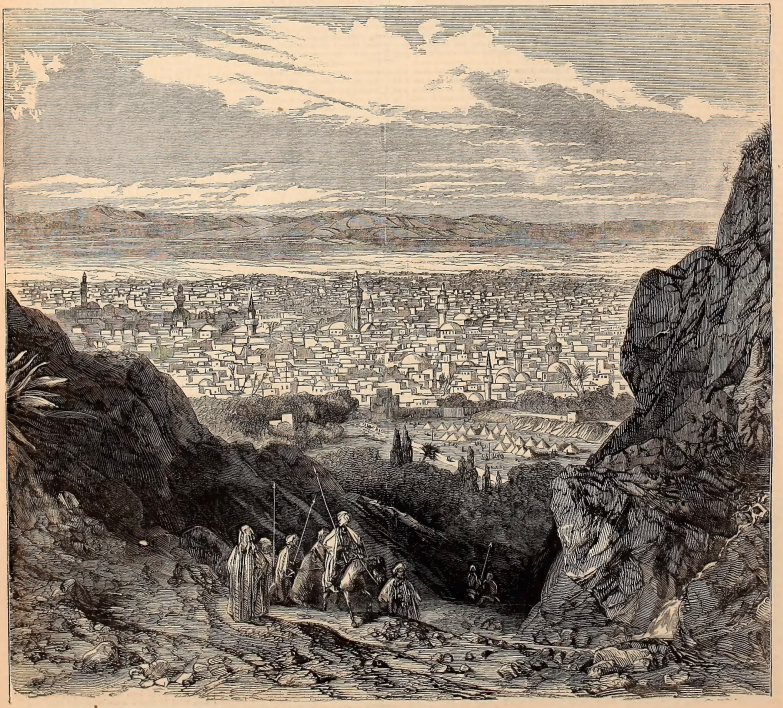
NO. 9 BROADWAY.



IF you have been lately to the Bowling-Green you have observed that one of the old houses upon the western side of Broadway, looking upon that pretty patch of grass, has been taken down. The demolition was sudden and swift. It seemed, to a jealous mind, as if somebody were in a great hurry to have it down and out of sight and mind at a season when the world is nominally out of town.

Do you remember the house? It was known as No. 9 Broadway Gardens. No. 9 Broadway is a lowbrowed, rough, gray, plaster building, with large windows, and a general aspect of comfortable and pleasant to behold. It held its own so bravely among the pavious palaces that sprang up around it. It was old and low, and yet it somehow contrived to adapt itself to the general appearance of the neighborhood—to keep in fashion without ultra-fashion, and to fit its quiet self into the pomp.

But they are taken off now, stripped utterly, and it and they shall not be seen again. Yet how many times it has been knocked down in the old house than most people think! How often have you remembered that the building from which the Chinese Gardens was only the second structure upon that site since the foundation of the city? Dear Mary Booth tells the story in her charming, gossiping "History of the City of New York." It seems that rather more than two centuries ago—about 1650-43—the Bowling-Green was the village green. There the little Knickerbockers played tag, kindled bonfires, and danced on holidays and Sundays. There, too, the doughty warriors of New Amsterdam were paraded, and, full of comfortable Dutch courage drank the health of tobacco, shook their stubby little fists at the world. Now, in 1643, sundry grants of lots of land upon Heere Street were made to different people; and Martin Krigier was the first grantee of a lot containing about eighty-six rods, opposite the Bowling-Green. Martin Krigier, however, did not build until the year 1659. He seems to have been a notable man—a servant of the West India Company, a trader with the city and Fort Orange (Albany), upon the North River, and an efficient officer in

"AS I WALKED ONWARD AGAINST THE SWOOPING WIND AND THE PHASHING RAIN," ETC.

A DAY'S RIDE:

LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER V.

As I walked onward against the swooping wind and the phashing rain I felt a sort of heroic ardor in the notion of breasting the adverse waves of life so boldly. It is not every fellow could do this: throw his wallet on his shoulder, seize his stick, and set out in storm and blackness. No, Potts, my man; for downright inflexibility of purpose, for bold and resolute action, you need yield to none! It was, indeed, an awful night; the thunder rolled and crashed with scarce an interval of cessation; forked lightning tore across the sky in every direction; while the wind swept through the deep glen, smashing branches and uplifting large trees like mere shrubs. I was soon completely drenched, and my soaked clothes hung around with the weight of lead; my spirits, however, sustained me, and I toiled along, occasionally in a sort of wild bravado, giving a cheer as the thunder rolled close above my head, and trying to sing, as though my heart were as gay and my spirits as light as in an hour of happiest abandonment.

Jean Paul has somewhere the theory that our good Genius is attached to us from our birth by a film fine as gossamer, and which few of us escape rupturing in the first years of youth, thus throwing ourselves at once without chart or pilot upon the broad ocean of life. He, however, more happily constituted, felt that the guidance of his guardian spirit, recognizes the benefits of its care, and the admonitions of its wisdom, &c is destined to great things. Such men discover new worlds beyond the seas, carry conquest over millions, found dynasties, and build up empires; they whom the world regard as demigods having simply the wisdom of being led by Fortune, and not severing the slender thread that unites them to their destiny. Was I, Potts, in this glorious category? Had the lesson of the great moralist been such a warning to me that I had preserved the filmy link unbroken? I really began to think so; a certain impulse, a whispering voice within, that said, "Go on!" On, ever onward! seemed to be the accents of that Fate, which had great things in store for me, and would eventually make me illustrious.

No illusions of your own, Potts, no phantasmagoria of your own poor heated fancy, must wile you away from the great and noble part destined for you. No weakness, no faint-heartedness, no shrinking from toil, nor even peril. Work hard to know thoroughly for what Fate intends you; read your credentials well, and then go to your post unflinchingly. Revolving this theory of mine, I walked ever on, and more did it seem to me the real embodiment of that superstition which extends to every land and every family of men. We are Lords of Fate, submitting to our Good Genius, we suffer ourselves to be led along unresistingly; we are Unlucky when, breaking our frail bonds, we encounter life unguided and unaided.

What a docile, obedient, and believing pupil did I pledge myself to be! Fate should see that she had no refractory nor rebellious spirit in me, no self-indulgent voluptuary, seeking only the sunny side of existence, but a nature ready to confront the rugged conflict of life, and to meet its hardships, if such were my allotted path.

I applied the circumstances in which I then found myself to my theory, and met no difficulty in the adaptation. Blondel was to perform a great part in my future. Blondel was a symbol selected by fate to indicate a certain direction. Blondel was a lamp by which I could find my way in the dark paths of the world. With Blondel, my Good Genius would walk beside me, or occasionally get up on the crupper, but never leave me or desert me. In the high excitement of my mind I felt no sense of bodily fatigue, but walked on, drenched to the skin, alternately shivering with cold or burning with all the intensity of fever. In this state was it that I entered the little inn of Ovocs, soon after daybreak, and stood dripping in the bar, a sad spectacle of exhaustion and excitement. My first question was, "Has Blondel been here?" and before they could reply, I went on with all the rapidity of delirium to assure them that deception of me would be fruitless; that Fate and I understood each other thoroughly, traveled together on the best of terms, never disagreed about any thing, but, by a mutual system of give and take, hit it off like brothers. I talked for an hour in this strain, and then my poor faculties, long struggling and sore pushed, gave way completely, and I fell into brain fever.

I chanced upon kind and good-hearted folk, who nursed me with care, and watched me with interest; but my illness was a severe one, and it was only in the sixth week that I could be about again, a poor, weak, emaciated creature, with failing limbs and shattered nerves. There is an indescribable sense of weariness in the mind after fever, just as if the brain had been enormously overtaxed and exerted, and that in the pursuit of all the wild and fleeting fancies of delirium it had traveled over the whole realm of space. To the depressing influence of this sensation is added the difficulty of disentangling the capricious creations of the fever from the actual facts of life; and in this maze of confusion my first days of convalescence were passed. Blondel was my great puzzle. Was he a reality, or a mere creature of imagination? Had I really ridden him as a horse, or only as an idea? Was he a quadruped with mane and tail, or an allegory invented to typify destiny? I can not say what hours of painful perplexity this inquiry cost me, and what intense research into myself. Strange enough, too, though I came out of the investigation convinced of his equine existence, I arrived at the conclusion that he was a "horse and something more." Not that I am able to explain myself more fully on that head, though, if I were writing this portion of my memoirs in German, I suspect I could convey enough of my meaning to give a bad headache to any one indulgent enough to follow me.

I set out once more upon my pilgrimage on a fine day of June, my steps directed to the village of Instiogue, where Father Dyke resided. I was too weak for much exertion, and it was only after five days of the road I reached at nightfall the little glen in which the village stood. The moon was breaking the vein of market-places with long lines of yellow light between the rows of tall chimneys, and tipping with silvery sheen the bright eddies of the beautiful river that rolled beside it. Over the granite cliffs that margined the stream laurel and arbutus and wild holly clustered in wild luxuriance, backed higher up again by tall pine-trees, whose lofty summits caught the moonlight. All was still and silent, except the rush of the rapid river, as I sat down upon a stone bench to enjoy the scene and luxuriate in its tranquil repose. I had not believed Ireland contained such a spot, for there was all the trim neatness and orderly propriety of an English village, with that luxuriance of verdure and wild beauty so eminently Irish. How was it that I had never heard of it before? Were others aware of it, or was the discover strictly my own? Or can it possibly be that all this picturesque loveliness is but the effect of a mellow moon? While I thus questioned myself I heard the sound of a quick footstep rapidly approaching, and soon afterward the pleasant tone of a rich voice humming an opera air. I arose, and saw a tall, athletic-looking figure, with rod and fishing-basket, approaching me.

"May I ask you, Sir," said I, addressing him, "if this village contains an inn?"

"There is, or rather there was, a sort of inn here," said he, turning his cigar as he spoke to the light, "but the place is so little visited that I fancy the landlord found it would not answer, and so it is closed at this moment.

"But do visitors—tourists—never pass this way?"

"Yes; and a few salmon-fishers—like myself—come occasionally in the season; but then we dispose ourselves in little lodgings here and there, some of us with the farmers, one or two of us with the priest."

"Father Dyke, broke I in?"

"Yes; you know him, perhaps?"

"I have heard of him, and met him, indeed," added I, after a pause. "Where may his house be?"

"The prettiest spot in the whole glen. If you'd like to see it in this picturesque moonlight come along with me."

I accepted the invitation at once, and we walked on together. The easy, half-careless tone of the stranger, the hose, lounging stride of his walk, and a certain something in his mellow voice seemed to indicate one of those natures which, so to say, take the world with easy temperaments that reveal themselves almost immediately. He talked away about fishing as he went, and appeared to take a deep interest in the sport, not heeding much the ignorance I betrayed on the subject, nor my ignoble confession that I had never adventured upon any thing higher than a worm and a quill.

"I'm sure," said he, laughingly, "Tom Dyke never encouraged you in such sporting tackle, glorious By-fisher as he is."

"You forget, perhaps," replied I, "that I scarcely have any acquaintance with him. We met once only, at a dinner party."

"He's a pleasant fellow," resumed he; "devilish wide awake, one must say—up to most things on this same world of ours."

"That much my own brief experience of him can confirm," said I, dryly, for the remark rather jarred upon my feelings.

"Yes," said he, as though following out his own train of thought. "Old Tom is not a bird to be snared in coarse lines. The man must be an early riser that catches him napping."

I am not quite how all this irritated me. It sounded like so much direct sarcasm upon my weakness and want of acuteness.

"There's the cottage," that's his cottage," said he, taking my arm, while he pointed upward to a little jutting promontory of rock over the river, crowned by a little thatched cottage almost embowered in roses and honeysuckles. So completely did it occupy the unique limits of the spot that the windows projected actually over the stream, and the creeping plants that twined through the little balconies hung in tangled masses above the water. "Search where you will, through the Scottish and Cumberland scenery, I don't believe you match that," said my companion, "not to say that you can hook a four-pound fish from that little balcony on any summer evening while you smoke your cigar."

"It is a lovely spot, indeed," said I, inhaling with ecstasy the delicious perfume which, in the calm night air, seemed to linger in the atmosphere.

"He tells me," continued my companion, "and I take the word for it—for I see no fleece—that there are seventy varieties of the rose on and around that cottage. I can answer for it, that you can't open a window without a great mass of flowers coming in showers over you. I told him, frankly, that if I were his tenant for longer than the fishing-season I'd clear half of them away."

"You live there, then?" asked I, timidly.

"Yes; I rent the cottage, all but two rooms, which he wished to keep for himself, but which in now worse than any room may be let, for this month and the next, if a tenant offer. Would you like them?" asked he, abruptly.

"Of all things in the world is—I think so—I should like to see them!" muttered I, half startled by the suddenness of the question.

"Nothing easier," said he, opening a little wicket as he spoke, and beginning to ascend a flight of steps roughly cut in the solid rock. "This is a path of my designing," continued he, "the reason why approach is at the other side; but this saves fully half a mile of road, though it be a little steep."

As I followed him up the ascent I proceed to myself a variety of questions, such as, where and how I was to procure accommodation for the night, and in what manner I was to obtain something to eat, of which I stood much in need? and I had gained a little flower-garden at the rear of the cottage before I could resolve any of these difficult points.

"Here we are!" said he, drawing a long breath. "You can't see much of the view at this hour; but to-morrow, when you stand on this spot, and look down that reach of the river, with Mont Alto in the back-ground, you'll tell me if you know any thing finer!"

"Is that Edward?" cried a soft voice; and at the same instant a young girl came hastily out of the cottage, and throwing her arms around my companion, exclaimed, "How you have alarmed me! What could possibly have kept you out so late?"

A broad-shouldered fish, a fellow weighing twelve pounds at the very least, and more, after nigh three hours playing, got among the rocks and smashed my tackle."

"And you lost him?"

"That did I, and some twenty yards of gut, and the top-joint of my best rod, and my temper besides. But I'm forgetting: Mary, here is a gentleman who will, I hope, not refuse to join us at supper.—My sister."

By the manner of presentation it was clear that he expected to hear my name, and so I interposed, "Mr. Potts.—Algernon Sydney Potts."

The young lady courtesied slightly, muttered something like a repetition of the invitation, and led the way into the cottage.

My astonishment was great at the "interior" now before me, for though all the arrangements bespoke habits of comfort and even luxury, there was a studious observance of cottage style in every thing, the book-shelves, the tables, the very piano-forte, being all made of white unvarnished wood; and I now perceived that the young lady herself, with a charming coquetry, had assumed something of the costume of the Oberland, and wore her bodice loose in front and covered with silver embroidery both tasteful and becoming.

"My name is Crofton," said my host, as he disengaged himself of his basket and tackle; "we are almost as much strangers here as yourself. I came here for the fishing, and mean to take myself off when it's over."

"I hope, Edward," broke in the girl, who was now, with the assistance of a servant woman, preparing the table for supper, "I hope you'll stay till we see the autumn tints on those trees."

"My sister is just as great an enthusiast about sketching as I am for salmon-fishing," said he, laughingly; "and for my own part, I like scenery and landscape very well, but think them marvelously heightened by something like sport. Are you an angler?"

"No," said I; "I know nothing of the gentle craft."

"Fond of shooting, perhaps? Some men think the two sports incompatible."

"I am an inexpert with the gun as the rod," said I, diffidently.

I perceived that the sister gave a sly look under her long eyelashes toward me, but what its meaning I could not well discover. Was it depreciation of a man who avowed himself unacquainted with the sports of the field, or was it a quiet recognition of claims more worthy of regard? At all events, I perceived that she had very soft, gentle-looking gray eyes, a very fair skin, and a profusion of beautiful brown hair. I had not thought her pretty at first. I now saw that she was extremely pretty, and her figure, though slightly given to fullness, the perfection of grace.

Hungry, almost famished as I was, with a fast of twelve hours, I felt no impatience so long as she moved about in preparation for the meal. After she disposed the little table equipage, the careful solicitude with which she arranged the fruit and the flowers—not always satisfied with her first dispositions, but changing them for something different—all interested me vastly, and when at last we were summoned to table, I actually felt sorry and disappointed.

"IN THIS STATE WAS IT THAT I ENTERED THE LITTLE INN OF OVOCA."

Was it really so delicious, was the cookery so exquisite? I own frankly that I am not a trust-worthy witness; but if my oath could be taken, I am willing to swear that I believe there never were such salmon-steaks, such a pigeon-pie, and such a damson-tart served to mortals as these. My enthusiasm, I suspect, must have betrayed itself in some outward manifestation, for I remember Crofton laughingly having remarked,

"You will turn my sister's head, Mr. Potts, by such flatteries; all of the more, since her cookery is self-taught."

"Don't believe him, Mr. Potts; I have studied all the great masters of the art, and you shall have an omelet to-morrow for breakfast Bullier himself would not despise."

I blushed at the offer of a hospitality so gently and delicately urged, and had really no words to acknowledge it, nor was my confusion unfavorably judged by my hosts. Crofton marked it quickly, and said,

"Yes, Mr. Potts, and I'll teach you to hook a trout afterward. Meanwhile, let us have a glass of Sauterne together; we drink it out of green glasses to cheat ourselves into the fancy that it's Rhenish."

"An Rhein, um Rhein, da wachsen unsere Reben," said I, quoting the students' song.

"Oh, have you been in Germany?" cried she, eagerly.

"Alas! no," said I. "I have never travelled." And then she looked disappointed, and said this. Indeed, I already wished it unsaid, but her brother broke in with,

"We are peculiar vagabonds, Mr. Potts. My sister and myself have had a restless paroxysm for the last three years of life, and what with seeking change for the summer and cold climates for winter, we are scarcely ever off the road."

"Like the gentleman, I suppose, who ate oysters for appetite, but carried his system so far as to darken room for it," said I, hoping that nobody laughed, and I was overwhelmed with confusion, which I was fain to bury in my strawberries and cream.

"Let us have a little music, Mary," said Crofton. "Do you play, or sing, Mr. Potts?"

"Neither. I do nothing," cried I, in true despair. "As Sydney Smith says, 'I know something about the Romans,' but, for any gift or grace which adorns a modern society, my time has more pleasantly, I am an utter bankrupt."

The young girl had, while I was speaking, taken her place at the piano-forte, and was half listlessly suffering her hands to fall in cords over the instrument.

"Come out upon this terrace here," cried Crofton to me, "and we'll have our cigar! What a fine summer lazy effect that cloud sky is to lounge out here in the cool night air, and enjoy one's weed while listening to Spohr or Beethoven!"

It was really delightful. The bright stars were all reflected in the calm river down below, and a thousand fireflies floated softly by us as we sat there.

Are there not in every man's experience short periods in which he seemed to have lived longer than during whole years of life? They tell us there are certain conditions of the atmosphere, inappreciable as to the qualities, which seem to ripen wines, imparting to young fresh vintages all the mellow richness of age. All the depth of flavor, all the velvety softness of time. May there not possibly be influences which similarly affect our natures? May there not be seasons in which changes as great as these are wrought within us? I firmly believe it, and so firmly that such a period that I am about to set on the balcony over the Nore, listening to Mary Crofton as she sang, but just as often look to every sound, and deep in a heaven of blended enjoyments, of which no one ingredient was in the slightest degree. Starry sky, glowing river, murmuring night winds, perfumed air, flouting music, all mingling, as do the odors of an incense, and all in incense filling the brain with a delicious intoxication.

How after hour must have passed with me in this half-conscious ecstacy, for Crofton at last said,

"There, where you see that pinkish tint through the gray, that's the sign of breaking day, and the signal for bedtime. Shall I show you your room?"

"How I wish this could last for ever!" cried I, rapturously; and then, half ashamed of my warmth, I stammered out a good-night, and retired.

HOW IT FEELS TO BE HANGED.

You will remember that I have long been a student of mesmerism, and no mean adept in the practice. You recollect the success with which I induced coma, even in the cases of the most obstinate unbelievers, and you must have been struck with several extraordinary cases of clairvoyance which I succeeded in producing. Above all, you must have remarked the mastery I obtained over the will of one or two of the more susceptible of our friends, and how I seemed, as it were, to infuse my mind into theirs; so that when I willed a spoke, precisely so I did, without any external indication by me of my wishes or feelings; but there was, if possible, a more extraordinary faculty which I occasionally possessed. I had, at certain seasons of the year, and generally in spring, maintained intact my own consciousness, and my mind went on precisely as if it had not been in mesmeric rapport with another. I became on these occasions two beings in one.

I was a member of the last Vigilance Committee in San Francisco. There was no man who incurred set sentence of death, regarding whose fate none of us felt any pity, for of his guilt there was no doubt. He had murdered an old man and his daughter for the sake of some gold-dust they had gathered. With respect to this villain, we of the Vigilance Committee showed even more than ordinary promptitude. He was condemned the very day he committed the crime, and his execution was fixed for the day after.

An immense crowd had gathered to see the execution, some of them not indisposed to attempt a rescue. But the Vigilance Committee and their adherents, determined and armed, kept a clear space round the scaffold. At last, he was led the criminal, a clergyman of uncertain persuasion and dubious character, who had turned up in the diggings, a man of fine and commanding person the last ceremony, and who alleged some degree of professional experience acquired in England, and, lastly, three of the Vigilance Committee, of whom I was one.

I had previously attempted to make some impression on the murderer's conscience, but it was fenced in by such a net-work of sophistry, and overlaid by such a cutting of assurance, of reliance that I had altogether failed. As a last attempt, I took his hand and spoke to him with that earnestness becoming the last appeal we to have on earth. Involuntarily my power of mesmerism came into play. I felt I had obtained an influence over him. Leaning forward, Columbus, the man was morbidly susceptible; and to my horror I found, before I could realize what I had done, that it was in full mesmeric sleep with him. His mind, which at first I felt I absolutely controlled, had passed into mine, and that ever-mysterious dual existence of which I spoke at the beginning of this letter was fully induced. Now it is one of the characteristics of this state of clairvoyance that neither the operator nor the subject can for some time emancipate himself from its influence. Any other plan than within the power of the mesmerizer, though not of the mesmerized. But in this, the most perfect rapport, the power of the operator is almost absolute, and is not to complete. The influence or possession wears off in time, but notwithstanding the most strenuous and even painful exertions of my will, I have never been able thoroughly to disconnect my consciousness from that of the other party in a shorter space of time than a week.

Here, then, I was unexpectedly, and as it were, wilfully, a participator in the mind of a man for a few instants to be hanged. I shuddered at the thought, and would willingly have escaped, but I was in the clutches of the mesmeric will. I could not look any premature efforts would only tighten its folds. I therefore submitted to my fate, which was simply this, that as long as the murderer lived after all, it would not be so very terrible; and I tried to get up a feeling of scientific curiosity to buoy me up to bearing it. "Here," said I, "is an opportunity no man ever had before, and which no man probably ever has opportunity to use. I want to use to unravel the mystery of death, to ascertain precisely and accurately the pain or dissolution, and to realize the sensations of the disembodied spirit. I recedes the final loss of consciousness, if indeed (and I trembled at the thought) there be any loss of consciousness. I am about to be called upon to keep my spectator self in the most rigorous state of attention, and I sat down on a bench close at hand, and, producing my memorandum or pocket-book and pencil, ready to note down accurately the murderer's sensations, experienced by him.

Then I immediately made my foreign self a feeling of social apathy. "It is my fate," thought the murderer, "and I am powerless." I put no negratify these fools by any sign of fear. I hate them all. But my account with the world will soon be closed. A few hours, and I shall be annihilated." Thus muttering to himself, I felt the murderer's hands clasp behind his back by the handcuffs. An intense thirst was that of the human race and disgust at himself shot through his mind.

He was reached the scaffold. I felt the rope adjusted round his neck. A moment of hesitation that terrified me. "I am to die! I am to die! Anything on earth," said he, as he still clutched the handkerchief. "Well, why prolong the suspense Then it goes!"

The hangman pushed the murderer off the plank which served as a scaffold; no covering was over his face.

A sensation of overwhelming waters, billow after billow rolling over my head and striking me on the chest. Seeing me look at them my brain attempts to surge up against it; the noise as of unceasing thunder; shrieks of tortured demons, and the blackness of darkness.

FIRST MINUTE.—Suddenly I am conscious; I feel that my brain is working, and that I possess the power to release my hands to loosen it. Oh, if I could but get free my hands, I might yet be saved! I strike with my feet; I swing myself back. On, heaven and earth, could my feet but reach the scaffold I might yet be saved—there might be pity in that crowd for me. But the sensation he had been experiencing was still dazed into another to which it had no relation. Darkness emerged in the idea of Eternity, and that idea conjured up the Egyptian symbol of the serpent with its tail, and this set against a vague host of phantasms. The arguments he had been using suddenly became folds of serpents, joined themselves together, and grew, each problem, into a separate serpent, all of which turned hissing upon him, and wound themselves round his body. Tighter and tighter these folds, which multiplied to infinity, until at last the pressure seemed to force out his life, and he again became unconscious.

FIRST QUARTER OF THE FOURTH MINUTE.—The fiction looked with his eyes nearly protruding from their sockets on the crowd. There was no weariness with them, no movement of pity, which surely there would have been even for him, suffering such protracted agony. His his agony, then, really lasted so long as he thinks? Alas, he is the only one to think about it, and, oh misery! time is annihilated. Time is relative, and the acute mind of the murderer at once recognized that what we feel as time is merely the succession of our ideas, and that these are quickened, time loses its meaning. If, for instance, a certain number of ideas, which when in life, said to to himself (and the murderer reasoned as if he were dead), seemed to occupy a minute of time, were accelerated so as to occupy the thought of a fraction of a second, then a minute of human time may represent an hour, a week, a year.

But this theory led to no conclusion, his mind, for a time lost coherence; suddenly he and I saw a cottage by the side of a brook, and the murderer felt himself a young man sitting on the bank of the brook, sorrowful and crying he knew not why, but from some unutterable misery. And now there came out of the honey-suckled door a beautiful girl. She saw her as he recollected her, his first beloved, in a dress of the innocence. She came bright blue eye, and golden hair, and bounding figure. She came up to him. I felt her soft arm put tenderly round his neck, and she kissed the tears from his wretched face. "Dearest George," she whispered, "why are you crying? Look up your own little wife." In my murderer's heart, regenerated back to its youth, I felt a floating sensation of happiness and joy. When out from an old tree there descended a furious mastiff; with the hound he wrenched the child from his neck, and she shrieked. I heard her cry for help on her knees, I—that is, the murderer—tried in vain to save her; but, alas! alas! he was rooted to the spot, and the fair child was torn by the hound, and I felt, as its jaws tightened upon him, that I was choking.

SECOND MINUTE.—The murderer for a second or two was insensible; on recovering, he felt fierce pains shoot through his body. His eyes seemed to flame, and his mouth to be filled with severely bitten, protruded from his mouth. Again he realized his position, and again the dismal phantasmagoria of the past intervened; again the honeysuckled cottage, but now the flowers are away, and in my stead a young man of powerful make. A brook is arrested, and corrupted icy ridges rear themselves above its banks. But there comes thither, further up the bright stripe that the hoar-frost on the grass is not disturbed, a figure in the full bloom of womanhood, the same golden hair and blue eyes that he had left ten years before now and she carols with merry voice a melancholy dirge of love and suicide. And she puts her arm round his neck, and kisses it, but another her kisses burn, and the embrace of her arm gets tighter round his neck. "Not so tight, my beloved," he would say, "let me breathe." And as the pressure continues, he tries to loosen her arms; but, soft as they are, they are like bands of iron. More rigid as iron. His breathing becomes difficult; he looks up for pity in her face. It has changed. It is that of a fiend, and the bright and glorious May whose innocence he betrayed, but the Mary whom, ten years after his desertion, he had met with her child in London, had become a hopeless, revengeful; and the iron grasp of her arm tightened, and she looked with the hatred of a demon into his eyes, and exhibited through the phantasm vanished, and he saw looking up the unpitying faces of the crowd, and the hag's arms were changed into the rope.

FIRST HALF OF THE THIRD MINUTE.—Gradually again consciousness used. He was aware of his mother's death-bed. He heard anew her last and solemn exhortations, and he looked again at the room from the foot of her bed. Ah! now he knew that been that mother's love; now he could see, with spiritual intuition, the despair which tore his father's heart as he knelt by the bed, supporting them, and promised that, if they would but forgive him, he would give up his evil ways. And he thought of high his resolves, and how impossible, but was was choking in the agony of death, and the blessed words could not find an utterance. But he threw his arms round his father's neck, and tried in vain to weep. It was too late: one violent spasmodic effort, and he was gone, and the father and son were alone. And then memory conjured up the final quarrel with his father, which had driven him to despair. He felt over again that miserable night when first he was houseless. Slowly and painfully there passed before his mind's eye the events of a misspent existence of his life, reproduced in all their detail—and then utter unconsciousness.

SECOND HALF OF THE THIRD MINUTE.—The murderer thought he heard a voice saying to him, "I Selve me immediately the origin of pain. Tell me the history of man, its ransom, and its uses. Separate to me the free from the fatal. Tell me what is human and what divine justice." He thought over these problems, which he had formerly meditated on in vain; but his reasons always fell into circles, and he came coming back to the point from which he started, and the different problems mixed themselves up together. Against his will, the murderer felt that he had been creating no one subject glanced into another to which it had no relation. Each thought was incomplete in itself, but was merged in the idea of Eternity, and that idea conjured up the Egyptian symbol of the serpent with its tail, and this set against a host of phantasms. The arguments he had been using suddenly became folds of serpents, joined themselves together, and grew, each problem, into a separate serpent, all of which turned hissing upon him, and wound themselves round his body. Tighter and tighter these folds, which multiplied to infinity, until at last the pressure seemed to force out his life, and he again became unconscious.

FIRST QUARTER OF THE FOURTH MINUTE.—The murderer awoke with a start. For a moment—to him and to me an hour—he realized his real position and struggled; and then strong madness, and there appeared before him in solemn array all his victims: his mother, with no pity in her face; his father, as he was when-last they parted; Mary, not the child or the beautiful woman, but Mary the lost and the hopeless; the boys he had left child in London in an access of passion; the ruined merchant, accompanied by his beggared family; and many others; but conspicuously the old man and his daughter; and seated on the elevated platform was a judge—the classical Rhadamanthus. And, behold, one after the other gave testimony against him, and he had no defense; and as they one by one delivered their testimony, their sins were put to his account, and he was frequently tortured to supply broken links of evidence. At last, after that which had endured for centuries—it might be for years—there remained only the old man and his daughter, and Mary the boy, and Rhadamanthus, and Mary put her arm again round his neck, while severe and unpitying Rhadamanthus looked down upon them.

The murderer was dead.

One morning I awoke. My existence was changed. I came back to time. I found myself lying on a bed, and some friends were bathing my temples. I had fainted, they said, at the sight of the executing, and it had been some hours before they had succeeded in bringing me back to consciousness. Oh! had they known what was involved in that! But I could not speak of my experiences. For a long time I could speak coherently of nothing. I believe my companions were right in sending me down to the San Francisco, and that the control, to which for some time I was subjected, was necessary. But my mind was unequal to any task. Ever, when I attempted to think of any thing, the century of agony I had undergone came back to my memory.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SLAVE-TRADE.

A CONSULTATION has been made to the British Government by Mr. Trescot, the ambassador from Carolina, on the subject of the Coolie and Slave trade, in answer to which Lord John Russell has declared that any suggestion that a system of raising should be established on the Cuban coast for the purpose of supplying Cuba or the five African and the seizure of slave vessels in Cuban ports, with a view to the imposition on them, can not give its consent, for the reason that it would be a departure from the principle which has been consistently in the offices of foreign nations. Another proposition that Great Britain and Spain Government should give its consent to the importation of Coolies as apprentices; but this is also declined by the British Government.

THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION.

The Republican State Convention assembled at Syracuse on the 29th, and organized temporarily by the choice of James C. Smith, of Ontario, to preside. The list of delegates was then called, and the matter of credentials settled satisfactorily, when the President appointed a committee on permanent organization, and a committee to report resolutions. While the committee were in session the Convention took a recess. On reassembling, the Committee reported as Chairman James M. Cook for permanent President, with the usual number of Vice-Presidents and Secretaries. The resolutions reported were then read and pointed, after which the Convention proceeded to the nomination of candidates for State officers, with the following result:

For Governor.....EDWIN D. MORGAN, of NEW YORK.
Lieutenant-Governor.....ROBB CAMPBELL, of MONROE.
Secretary of State.....S. H. JAMES, of CHEMUNG.
State Prison Inspector.....JAMES K. DAVIS, of JEFFERSON.

After the selection of the State officers had been effected, a set of resolutions and the State Committee was appointed.

A PROTEST FROM SOUTH CAROLINA AGAINST SECESSION.

A letter from Colonel B. F. Perry, of South Carolina, has been published in the Charleston Courier. It is a strong protest against the present agitation of secession in which many prominent Southern politicians are at present devoting time to indulge. Colonel Perry is a member of the South Carolina Legislature last year, and is a gentleman of ability and independence of character.

NEWS FROM THE JAPANESE.

The Niagara reached the Cape de Verde Islands on the 17th of August, having made the passage in seventeen days. The Japanese expressed themselves as much pleased with their visit to America. The Commissioners had ceased to be removed from the cabin assigned to them, and were treated with every respect. They had provided expressly for them here at great cost, preferring to live on board in the cool state of the ship. They expect to while away the time in eating seven or eight times a day, drinking tea, and smoking cigars. Some of the presents—which latter operation afforded them evident satisfaction. Tommy and Jack are a brief and unpleasing ex ever, and still addicted himself to the habit of writing love-letters to his sweethearts.

ANOTHER PRIZE-FIGHT.

A prize-fight took place on Tuesday in the neighborhood of Baltimore between two gentlemen named Lilly and Kerrigan. They fought twenty-five rounds, when Kerrigan having received a cut eye, was declared the victor. Neither party received much punishment.

A DARING CONSPIRACY FOILED.

The Richmond Virginian Dispatch says: "One of the most daring conspiracies by negroes to murder a family that we have ever heard of was detected in the Hanlon County, about fifteen miles from Danville, on Saturday last. On Saturday, the particulars of which we are indebted to Conductor Cheatham, of the Richmond and Danville road.

"Mr. Samuel Hairston, a wealthy farmer in Halifax, has a plantation on one of the plantations of which is under disciplination, and a man of great firmness. On the day mentioned, Mr. Hairston's overseer was sitting in the parlor, six stout negro fellows employed upon the farm called at the door, and after informing him that a quarrel of negroes in the woods near by was preparing for an unusual disturbance, they asked for the privilege of settling the affair themselves. Not suspecting that they had any plans of operations. Not suspecting that they had any plans of operation, but being unwilling to deprive the negroes of the rebels, if he should witness it, he granted the permission. The overseer then went to the Mr. Hairston, and then started off with the assassins, they not knowing that the overseer prepared for any emergency.

"The negroes led the way until getting out of hearing some distance, when they suddenly stopped near a new-ly-dug pit, when the spokesman exclaimed, 'There, you—see pointing to the hole, and to himself, 'I have just fifteen minutes of a——, in your grave!' Saw him in hand in hell.' Quick as made up from the Grim Cook Calib rushed, and he thought the overseer dead at his feet, and shot the fifth negro dead at his feet, and the sixth ran back to one in the address; seeing at the same time the overseer with his pistol in his hands, and the overseer having no other weapon, he concluded that the six negroes had determined to murder the overseer because of some [illegible] served punishment one or more of them had received, and laid the above plan to get him off in the woods to effect their ends. His presence of mind in taking his pistol, and his coolness in the hour of danger, when no white person was nigh to aid him, doubtless saved him from a horrid death."

A SNUG FAMILY.

We find the following in the New York Daily News:

"D. S. Dickinson of Binghamton, Broome County, is represented in the New York Constitutional Convention by Dickinson, his son-in-law, who draws from the General Government, in salary and other sources, some $3,000 per annum; a brother of Daniel S. is Deputy Naval Officer, a position worth between three and four thousand dollars a year; Andrew Dickinson's brother has a good berth in the place of Surveyor, with two or three thousand per year. Andrew Dickinson's brother-in-law is a United States Marshal, with a berth worth four or five thousand dollars a year, and on the first of August a person by the name of Dickinson, a distant acquaintance of Daniel S., was provided with a profitable position in the New York Custom-House. Samuel G. Courtney, another son-in-law of Mr. D., it is rumored is to be provided for shortly, as a suitable position for his over-reaching deficiencies running for the office of District Attorney of Allegany County, who pays the Dickinson family is well provided for!"

PERSONAL.

Mr. D. U. Mastin, the gentleman who left Boston some two weeks ago in a little two-story house, and arrived safely in this city on Thursday about 45 o'clock, having accomplished his extraordinary feat in about eighty hours of actual rowing, averaging over five miles per hour. He sustained almost nothing on berries and other fruit, drinking no water; the bad day's pull, from a place ten miles east of Saint John, was accomplished without any sleep, and, a portion of one water-melon only serving for his refreshment. He took lodgings with Mr. Darling at No. 594 Sheriff Street.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "POPE'S OWN" AT HOME.

THE "Pope's Own" are in the greatest distress. A large party of the "Brigade" landed at Hull on the 21st inst., and their condition excited the greatest commiseration. They were shoeless and stockingless, and their garments hung about them in rags and tatters. Some maintain a dogged silence, and others freely expose the great deceit practiced upon them by the agents of Hir Holiness. Many recruits believe still that a few weeks will make up that "second Brigade." The next Irishmen who enlist in the service will find ownership of property chief of Garibaldi. Perhaps the "Pope's Own" who have been already disbanded will be compelled to go another under the banners of the Liberator ere many weeks have elapsed.

FRANCE.

DEPARTURE OF THE SYRIAN SOLDIERS.

A telegram from Marseilles, September 1, says [yesterday]: "General Beaufort has left for Syria with 1500 men. In an order of the day he reminds the soldiers that they are going to avenge offended humanity in a country where Christ left His blood as a testimony of Crusaders, General Bonaparte, and the first Republic. He concludes by saying: 'The wishes of the Emperor and Europe accompany the expedition.' Three vessels have left Toulon with the troops for Syria."

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH TO THE TROOPS.

The Emperor, after receiving the troops destined for Syria, addressed them as follows:

"SOLDIERS! You leave for Syria. France halts with you as regards the past, and with a view to secure the rights of justice and humanity to triumph. You do not go to make conquest, a foreign nation, but to assist the Sultan in bringing back to obedience his subjects who are blinded by the fanaticism of their leaders. Show in that district you have great reminiscences. Fulfill your duty! Let no inhumane outrage be to the discredit of those who now gloriously carried into that country the banner of civilization. I do not desire to add anymore, but your courage and prestige are a supply to the confidence I place in whomever the French flag is seen to pass, the nations know that a great cause precedes it, and that great glory follows it."

The Emperor has given 500,000 francs in aid of the fugitives from Syria.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI ABOUT TO DESCEND UPON CALABRIA.

There are no public advices of the whereabouts of Garibaldi. Our previous intelligence informed us that some of his troops had invested or besieged Reggio. Since then no accounts have come either confirming or denying that statement. We learn, however, that several letters have been received stating that Garibaldi had safely landed on the main land, and was on his march for Naples. His letter to Victor Emanuel, and the fact that he had not received any extensive preparations for operations on the main land, indicates the truth of the statement in those private advices. Reggio, of course, will suppress all news of this sort, and it is only through private correspondence that such information can be obtained.

NAPLES IN A STATE OF SIEGE.

Naples has been declared in a state of siege. It is reported that the Liberal party have taken steps to induce the Government in the event of Garibaldi landing at Naples, that the political functions of the tyrant Bomba would be disregarded. Austria has also demanded from Piedmont an explanation of the letter of Garibaldi to Victor Emanuel. There are also rumors of an Austrian ultimatum, and the treaty of Villafranca requiring the integrity and Emperor's birth-day. Garibaldi is said to have visited Spezzia in person, for which the Piedmontese Government is angry.

LETTER FROM VICTOR EMANUEL TO GARIBALDI.

The following letter has been sent by Victor Emanuel to Garibaldi:

"DEAR GENERAL,—You know that when you started for Sicily you did not have my approbation, and that, considering the gravity of existing circumstances, I decide upon preserving a reserved bearing, being sure of the sincerity of your sentiments for me.

"In order to put an end to a war between Italians and Italians, I counsel you to renounce the idea of passing with your legions into the Neapolitan territory. I am convinced that the King of Naples consents to evacuate the whole of Sicilian island, and to leave the island free to deliberate upon and to settle their destinies.

"I would consent to accept a full liberty of action relative to Sicily in the event of the King of Naples being unable to accept these conditions. Generally, however, and you will also see that it is useful to Italy, whose power of action may be lost unless you resolutely decide by showing to Europe that even as she knows how to conquer so does she know how to make a good use of her victory."

GARIBALDI'S REPLY.

Garibaldi does not seem to feel the pressure of this letter as very heavy, for he has very coolly replied to the King as follows:

"SIRE,—Your Majesty knows the high esteem and the devotion which I feel toward your Majesty; but such is the present state of things in Italy that, at the present moment, I can not obey your Majesty's injunctions, much as I should like it. I am called for and urged on by the people of Naples. I have tried in vain to calm their ardor, and I have, therefore, promised him that not to delay the favorable moment would be decisive for the future of our new born country, and longer the sacrifice of Italy, and not fulfill my duty as an Italian. May I, therefore, general, beseech him not to delay to cross over, as I shall have done with the task imposed upon me by the wishes of the people who groan under the tyranny of the Neapolitan Bourbon. I shall lay down my sword at your Majesty's feet, and will cry: 'Majesty for the remainder of my lifetime.

"Your Majesty's devoted GARIBALDI."

The letter is dated Marsala, the 27th of July.

INVASION OF THE PAPAL STATES.

A letter from Rome states that on the 1st inst. a body of 1500 Neapolitan volunteers landed at San Stefano on the Papal territory. They intended to march on Corneto. General Goyon immediately sent an officer to the commander of the Zouaves at Civita Vecchia, and a detachment of Zouaves was sent to the frontier for the protection of the threatened town. The French garrison of Civita Vecchia was increased by 500 men. The Pope is commanded temporarily by General Noue.

THE "POPE'S OWN" IN TROUBLE AGAIN.

A correspondent of the London Times, of the 4th, says: "St. Patrick's battalion has again been troublesome at Spezzia, and it seems that the only chance is that the battalion will be broken up, and the soldiers dispersed throughout the Sardinian regiments. Unfortunately, it should hardly think this can ever be the case without a disturbance, as the men declare that they have been specified in their printed engagements that they are no danger to be sent out of Italy, and that the foreign officers or officers are introduced into the corps, or if it ever ceases to be essentially Irish regiment. Now, a few Spaiolo took place a few days ago, and appears to have been occasioned by the Irish themselves. The most demanding officer, Major O'Reilly, wished to quiet the affair if he could, and would no doubt have succeeded in doing so, but Colonel Pimodan, a French officer, who commands the regiment, interfered, and Spaiolo, insisted on sending a force of gens d'armes to establish order. A desperate struggle ensued, in which many hard blows were exchanged. The most serious injury inflicted upon the Irish was from the sword of Colonel Pimodan, who cut down an authentic Paddy entirely. General de Lamoriciere had undertaken to arbitrate between Major O'Reilly's report on the affair, the official relation of which is to come from Colonel Pimodan."

A TOUCHING TALE.

The Times correspondent writes: "When Garibaldi arrived at Palermo, he found there a Sardinian field ambulance, to visit the wounded of Medici's two divisions, who numbered, perhaps, 1,000 men. He stopped with surprise before the bed of a beardless boy, whom he recognized as one of the Genoese Carabineers, stopped him as to how he got there, wounded, after having been left in the hands of the enemy. The wounded man the first time, made his confession. He had scampered away from the field of battle like a frightened hare, and followed on till he caught up with the army of Medici, who, finding him in the uniform of the regiment, gave him a musket and ammunition, and ordered him to fall in. He was then wounded in the arm. He made his confession, and then related the following touching tale. Garibaldi walked away with a shrug of the shoulders. But the boy, who had received absolution, and extreme unction only to well, but could not find at the moment, a word with which to console him. Then the General was gone he rolled on his bed of straw, shedding tears of agony and repentance.

The General had not seen the young volunteer before that time. The incident occurred between the battle of Melazzo are known. At the most critical moment, when the Neapolitan artillery had made a desperate fight in his own defence, he saw suddenly reappear at the head of the troops, the same boy, who had left his bones at the embankment. 'What! that gamin again!' exclaimed Garibaldi. 'Why, you are a regular cat!' And he made an effort to show his bleeding breast, and seeing that the wound was not dangerous, said to the boy: 'General, it is the good side!' he fell dead at Garibaldi's feet.

SYRIA.

THE LATEST FROM DAMASCUS.

The latest dates from Damascus are still of quiet there, but murders were still committed in the surrounding country. The Christian population were living in mortal terror. Fresh atrocities each, and were detained in the forts.

The Imperial firman to the people of Syria, accompanied by the Imperial Commissioner, Fuad Pacha for Foreign Affairs at Constantinople, mention of which has been made in our foreign intelligence has been published. It is stated that the multitude who listened to its reading at the Serpentine, it received with cries of confusion, in perfect silence.

It is stated now, in contradiction to previous reports, that the English intend to land fifteen hundred men at Beyrout, and that they will be accompanied either with the French, or merely to protect British subjects, the text appears does not say.

PROMPT ACTION OF FUAD PACHA.

The prompt action of Fuad Pacha appears to be regarding confidence in the Government at Syria. The Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs transits to the Turkish Embassy at Paris the following letter to Metaxas from Fuad Pacha, dated Damascus, August 4:

"Yesterday I arrested and sent to the rock pacha the massacres. To-day the number of arrests exceeded 300. Day after day more arrests will be made, persons of rank who are gravely compromised will be undergoing. The Council of Commissioners, the Court of Extraordinary, which I have already appointed, will be occupied with nothing else. Justice will act with energy, formation, and articles of value that had been hidden will be restored. The Turkish Government will not allow the Christians to be driven from their colonies. The evildoers are struck with terror. The Christian population has grounds for confidence. The terror arrests, which have been effected without striking a blow, and which all troops have given a fresh proof of zeal and patriotism."

THE REIGN OF TERROR.

A letter from Beyrout, August 6, says: "Yesterday on the 19th inst. Since then we have had news from Damascus, which is in a state of siege. The reign of terror continues. A Christian has only to show his head in order to be struck off. On the 5th inst., the last days' massacre shook a thousand Christian families have already fled to the sea. The Christian population flocked to the harbor, and the whole of the women had been violated by the Moslems. The Christians are in the city of Pacha. The whole Christian quarter is burned down, and the Christians have taken refuge in mosques and other houses. The Christian merchants had lost their property. Fuad Pacha has arrived, and has ordered that those who a week ago could count their fortunes by tens of thousands starving are now begging."

In Beyrout Fuad Pacha has done nothing as yet beyond putting a few more soldiers on guard, and ordering more arrest. It appears that he has the fullest powers, even of life and limb. He has not yet left Beyrout, and is, so to speak in striking those that are guilty, he will make a great example. He has brought 3,000 men with him by, not or the men, but for the great atrocities he will punish the guilty ones.

The Druses have not yet been punished, one of their co-religionists is touched; and sixteen more commissioners is directed on several pashas and other high officials in Syria, and this in the province where they have officials. The last anger of the Christian Powers will not be satisfied."

NO AMERICANS IN DAMASCUS.

A letter from Beyrout says that Mr. Hayes were no American citizens in Damascus at the time of the massacre. Mr. Hayes, the American Consul at the Holy Land, of Yebroud, some ten hours' distance from the city, and occupied a house jointly with a Moslem Sheik. This fact in itself will secure his protection. Singular as it may seem a Moslem will lose his own life sooner than allow a guest in his house to be murdered. Thousands of Christians have been saved by the Moslems. Damascus is the currently supposed that several Moslem chiefs live in defending the Christians who had taken refuge in their houses. Fuzzy Moslem houses were burned during the insurrection, whether by accident or in revenge for private wrongs is not known.

HORRIBLE SCENES OF THE WOMEN.

"Horrible stories are afloat about the thousands of Christian women who have been violated by Moslem criminals at the thought of such a fate. I knew many of them; they were fair and beautiful, and many of them gentle and to some extent estimated. Hundreds of these were dishonored, and then murdered in their own private houses; but we are told that thousands were carried off by the Moslems, and that these latter are now difficult to be destroyed at their leisure. Horror of horrors! Many of these women have been turned Moslems to save their lives. Several hundred of such renegades have returned to the Christian fold, and many more are not yet heard from. A letter from the Greek refugees in Beyrout says: 'The Moslems have violated even the Druses, coolly relates the fact of their change of religion.'"

MEXICO

PROSPECT OF WAR BETWEEN SPAIN AND MEXICO.

The Spanish Naval Commander has peremptorily demanded from the Mexican Government the restitution of a bark which belonged to Maria's filibustering expedition, which has been seized and taken to Vera Cruz. Twenty-four hours were granted to consider the Spanish demand, which, if not complied with, hostilities are to be threatened. Though the Government of Juarez refused to give way on the back of the demand, the threatened bombardment was not attempted. The most official measures were taken to put the fortress in a state of defense. It is intimated that this is the basis of an attempt at future intervention in favor of Spain between the Government of Juarez and the Miramon faction.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

WALKER IN HONDURAS.

A telegram from Honduras announces the arrival at that port of a vessel from Roatan, which was off Truxillo on the 20th ult. with 100 men and 200 stand of arms. On the assault twelve Spaniards were killed and eighteen wounded. Walker's loss was trifling. A large force is concurse of people and soldiers assisted him to the residence of the Government. In the evening a revolution was illuminated, in the rain. On Sunday the Prince and his party visited the Chandlers Falls, and were detained by the Governor's residence for the night. On Monday they visited the Falls of the Montmorency, at which all the dignitaries, ecclesiastical, civil, and military assembled to meet the Speakers of the two Houses of Parliament were knighted. In the afternoon the Prince and his party visited the Indian village of Lorette. On Tuesday the Prince and suite left Quebec for Three Rivers, where a battalion of Volunteers was greeted by cheers from the people. He arrived at Three Rivers at midnight.

The Prince of Wales reached Montreal on Friday in the afternoon. Here a public ball was to-night given to introduce the postponement of the grand ceremonial of the landing and opening of the Victoria Bridge. The magnificent preparations of which had assembled from the surrounding country. The general wishes and elaborate preparations of welcome greeted the arrival of the royal party. The progress of the Prince to the termination and five-works were on the most magnificent scale—the arches of the Victoria Bridge and the pavilion of the Prince's reception inducing an immense outlay.

HOW THE PRINCE LOOKS.

The correspondent of the Toronto Globe of the Prince as he landed at Quebec:

"If the Prince of Wales be come to shew fat feet four inches high, his eye is beautifully blue, mild, fanny, clear, and pale. His nose is straight and pretty enough, though but clean-cut and prominent. His mouth is full and pouting, indicative of a sensual disposition, and his countenance indicates a happy dispositional, good-natured disposition. He is very brown in the face for a boy about, and can't easily be fooled. His hair is soft and brown, and curls naturally. He has a small neck and no neck, and on the forehead, which his head is well-shaped, are indications of firmness, perseverance, quickness of perception, and love of music. The very, very large bonds on the back of his head, and the very large prominence of those of his Royal mother, to whom Dame Nature has been very generous in the way of size. His form is neat and very well-proportioned, and his bearing is dignified and graceful."

He was dressed in the full uniform of a Colonel in the Royal Artillery, consisting of a scarlet coat, with red and blue bands, black pants, patent leather boots, and spurs, and his cocked hat with white feathers.

HE IS CARRIED ON A MAN'S BACK.

The same writer says:

"The Prince's dress was fishing at the Saguenay River, he and Mr. Price became separated from the small party of the. The Prince was carried over the first stream by his own book from a small projection, which gradually became submerged, and the Prince had to ask his big bonne cane, until Price, who heard the cries, found him, and carried him over the next two-deep, when the Prince Pussy back upon his shoulders to the shore."

HE GOES TO CHURCH—HE DON'T LIKE IN TO THE SERMON.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The weather on Sunday was delightful, and the streets were crowded. The centre of attraction was the English Cathedral, where the Prince attended divine services. The church was crammed with people, who were admitted only by ticket. The Prince occupied a pew in front.

The Prince drove to church with the Governor-General, in an open carriage and pair of black, with a white veil. He also wore a black hat, which did not become him. He looked pale, and his face was not at all handsome. The only attraction that the sermon of the Rev. Mr. Hoseman was evidently listened to. At the conclusion of the service he returned to the carriage and drove rapidly off."

HE SHOOTS NEWCASTLE WITH CORKS.

The Times correspondent writes on Monday: "This morning the Prince was to go to Chaudiere Falls, but the rain fell in torrents, and the Duke of Newcastle thought it best for him not to go. The Prince looked from the window, and wondered it would not clear up, decided to go; so, dressing in an India-rubber suit, he left the Citadel in a carriage and four accompanied by the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Lyons, St. Jermain, Governor General's Secretary, and Admiral Milne, and with a few others.

"After reaching Cape Rouge they went in row-boats to St. Nicholas, where they took horses and rode rapidly through fields and over fences, till Governor Head could not to hold up, and the Admiral grew red in the face from the exertion. They wandered around the Falls, the Prince laughing at the Admiral's artistic attempts to picture them. Lunch was served to the party in a tent, but during a drenching shower, and the whole party was animated by the absolutely startling eating of the Prince, passed the hour in such a jolly way as made the local gentlemen rear with laughter and admiration. The Prince opened several bottles of Sillery Champagne, and then in a moment of fun, he poured it upon Newcastle's pate, much to the amusement of all but the Duke, who looked as if he would have gone off to the skin, but full of good cheer and pleased."

HE GOES TO A BALL, AND DANCES TWENTY-TWO DANCES.

The Herald writer says: "The Prince opened the ball with Miss Dundas, and Mrs. Justice Curran stood up with the Governor-General. The Prince's second partner was Miss Price, and the Prince's second partner for a polka. She was Miss Price, and the Prince's third partner was Miss Price. The Prince was in great good humor, and talked with ever body in the room. He is a good waltzer, and danced with a middy, who was one of my of the suite when they reach New York. The little middy gradually covered the largest room, and the Prince and the contrast seems to give peculiar delight to the Prince. The Prince danced twenty-two sets of eight or four dances. He missed one being at supper, and the next because he had started for the steamer."

LIKEWISE KNOCKS HIS PARTNER DOWN.

The Times writer says: "The Prince had a fall in the ball-room last night, but the fall was not generally noticed with any serious result. While dancing with Miss Anderson, he was struck in the face and nose by the head coming her to fall upon him. He struck the funny bone of his arm, and received high his nose came into sensible contact with the floor; but to-day he has been perfectly well, and a slight bruise on the joint, is the only momentary mark of the Prince did not leave as soon as was invited, but remained till the last dance, dancing with a fresh partner in each dance."

The Herald correspondent further states that, having left for the supper-room, he came back, hearing a sweet voice tune playing, and while dancing with a lady slipped and fell heavily on the floor, dragging his partner, Mademoiselle Rhodes, down with him, and bruising him. Neither of them were injured, and the Prince immediately rose, and raised his partner. The fall has not for in the room knew of the occurrence. He spoke not to Mr. Mastin, and left the room immediately.

HE INTRODUCES A MIDDY TO A BELLE.

At the ball last evening a young midshipman had a regular adventure with the Prince. The Prince created much merriment. The Prince joked him about dancing with the ladies, and the latter said he would stand by asking. "Why can't you introduce a fellow to one of those young ladies?" asked the Prince. The middy, nothing good-naturedly introduced middy to a lady with whom he was dancing. The Duke of Newcastle remarked, "our little man is having a fine time."

HE GOES TO A CUP.

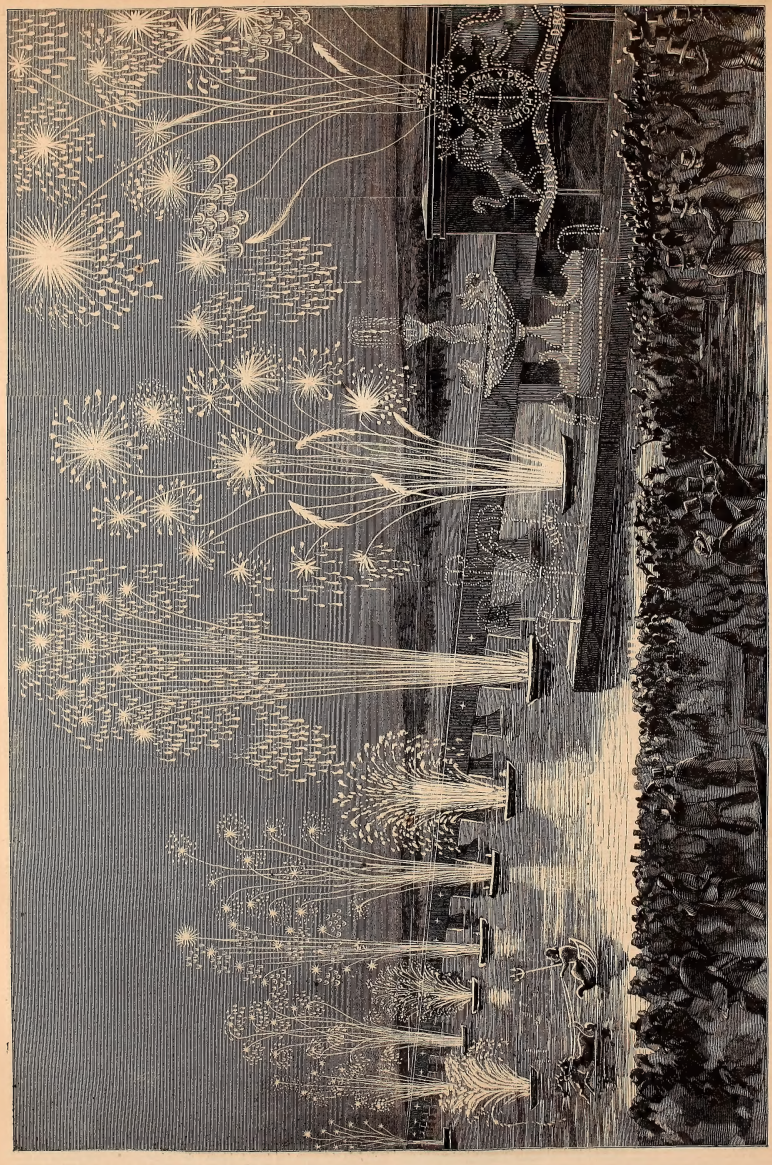
The Herald correspondent says: "To-day the Prince has his hair cut, and the barber, quite an enterprising man, has secured the clippings, and intends selling the locks shorn from the head of this scion of royalty at so much per lock. The scissors were duly manipulated to order, and will doubtless be able to dispose of the whole quantity."

HE GETS INTO A NUNNERY.

"One of the most interesting and remarkable incidents which has thus far attended the Prince's career, was his visit to the Ursuline Convent. It was the first visit paid by a visitor for the first time since the calling of the Duke of Kent, and the first that had ever been paid by a male to the Convent, with the additional exception in favor of Lord Elgin, who visited the Convent in his official capacity as Governor-General. The Prince was received with kindly greeting and respect, to which the Prince replied, bowing low. The Mother Superior kissed the hand of Quebec and their good wishes for him personally, referring to the interest he had taken in the cause of education, and expressing a hope for their future welfare. The Prince then went through the whole building, at each of which the young ladies gracefully courtesied, and the teachers and nuns bowed. Long live the Prince."

WHERE HE SLEEPS.

The Times writer describes "the royal bedchamber in which the Prince reposes. The bed is a French bedstead on a bed stuffed with down, and two pillows of the same. The bed is a long-sweeping material. The bedstead thereof is a high and well-designed canopy of red damask, surmounted by a plume of white feathers. Curtains are similar to those in the parlor, but the drapery is of white muslin, and the carpet is similar to the other room."



THE LADIES PULL OFF HIS BUTTONS.

The Times correspondent says: "A party of ladies visited the Prince's room this afternoon, examined the cabin occupied by the Prince, and stole everything they could get hold of, even to the buttons of his clothes. Amongst them, as mourners of his Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, were also the Countess of Elgin, a very fair sex, who mourned his chapeau, played with his whiskers, and fooled with his pocket-handkerchief. One damsel was caught trying on his overcoat, from which she was dragged by force, and sent packing to the other room."

DEVON AND DURHAM COWS.

WE publish on the preceding page a picture of Devon and Durham cows, drawn by T. C. Carpendale. Our readers have an excellent opportunity of observing the peculiarities of form which distinguish the two celebrated breeds of cattle represented in the engraving.

The Devons, so justly famous for the richness of their milk as well as the beauty and elegance of the animals themselves, are distinguished from all other breeds by the small head and finely tapering muzzle, the delicate limb, neat bone, and straight back, but particularly by the unchanging "Devonshire red" of the coat, which never varies from the uniform dark-chestnut, unmingled by the slightest mark of white or other color.

To the Devons we are indebted for the celebrated "Devonshire cream" and the rich "junkets" for which that county is so noted. The remarkably fine specimen we have represented is the property of B. M. Wallock, Esq., of Westchester County, New York.

Of the Durhams our illustration presents an excellent type. They are the well known as milkers, and as valuable farm-stock in general, to need a lengthy description. They are distinguished by the large ox-built frame, straight back, and powerful limbs, the nose pointed and finely chiseled.

The general color of the coat of the one represented is white, with spots of a roan color about the neck, head, and sides, and a few patches of the same color on the legs. She is the property of C. C. Brovoort, Esq., of Bedford, Long Island, whose beautiful grounds she adorns. She is a cross of the Durham and Ayrshire breed, which is manifest in the upward direction of the horns.

In the summer of eighteen hundred and fifty I arrived in England, charged with a delicate political mission from abroad. Certain influential persons were semi-officially connected with me, whose exertions I was authorized to direct—Monsieur and Madame Rubelle being among the number. Some weeks of spare time were at my disposal before I entered on my functions by establishing myself in the suburbs of London. Curiosity may stop here, to ask for some explanation of those functions on my part. I refer curiosity sympathize with the question. I also regret that diplomatic reserve forbids me to comply with it.

I arranged to pass the preliminary period of repose, to which I have just referred, in the superb mansion of my late lamented friend, Sir Percival Glyde. He arrived from the Continent with his wife; I arrived from the Continent with mine. England is the land of domestic happiness—how appropriately we entered it under these domestic circumstances!

The bond of friendship which united Percival and myself was strengthened, on this occasion, by a touching similarity in the circumstances of our union on his side and on mine. We both wanted money. Immense necessity! Universal want! Is there a civilized human being who does not feel for us? How insensible must that man be! Or how rich!

I enter into no sordid particulars in discussing this part of the subject. My mind revolts from them. With a Roman austerity I show my empty purse and Percival shows his shrinking public gaze. Let us allow the deplorable fact to subsist itself, once for all, in that manner, and pass on.

We were received at the mansion by the magnificent creature who is inscribed in my heart as "Marian"—who is known in the colder atmosphere of Society as "Miss Halcombe."

Just fancy! with what insensate folly unsparingly I learned to adore that woman. At sixty per annum she adores me, got nothing over fifty shillings and the pennies. Such is the World! such Man; such Love. What are we (I ask) but puppets in a show-box? Oh, strengthen, Destiny, pull our strings gently! Dance us mercifully off our miserable little stage!

The preceding lines, richly perverted, express an entire system of philosophy. It is Mine. I resume.

The domestic position at the commencement of our residence at Blackwater Park has been drawn with amazing accuracy, with profound mental insight, by the hand of Marian herself. (Pass me the intoxicating familiarity of mentioning this sublime creature by her Christian name!) Accurate knowledge of the contents of her journal—to which I obtained access by clandestine means, unspeakably precious to me in the remembrance—warns my eager pen from topics which this essentially exhaustive woman has already made her own.

The interests—interests, breathless and immense!—with which I am here concerned, begin with the domestic calamity of Marian's illness.

The situation, at this period, was emphatically a serious one. Large sums of money, due at a certain time, were wanted by Percival (I say nothing of the sum-obscene equally necessary to myself); and the one source to look to for supplying them was the fortune of his wife, of which not one farthing was at his disposal until her death. Bad, so far; but—in the language of the all-pervading Shakspeare—worse remained behind. My lamented friend had private troubles of his own, into which the delicacy of my disinterested attachment to him forbade me from inquiring. Percival's affairs, I have nothing but that a woman, named Anne Catherick, was hidden in the neighborhood, and that she was in communication with Lady Glyde: and that the disclosure of a secret, which would be the certain ruin of Percival, might be the result. He had told me himself that he was a lost man, unless his wife was silenced, unless Anne Catherick was found. If he was a lost man, what would become of our pecuniary interests? Courageous as I am by nature, I absolutely trembled at the idea!

The whole force of my intelligence was now directed to the finding of Anne Catherick. Our money affairs, impatient of delay, admitted of delay; but the necessity of discovering the woman admitted of none. Time was precious. My description, as presenting an extraordinary personal resemblance to Lady Glyde. The statement of all the circumstances known privately to assist me in identifying the person of whom we were in search—when coupled with the additional information that Anne Catherick had escaped from a mad-house, started the first immense conception in my mind which subsequently led to such amazing results. That conception involved nothing less than the complete transformation of two separate identities. Lady Glyde and Anne Catherick were to change names, places, and destinies, the one with the other—for prodigious purposes contemplated by the change being the gain of thirty thousand pounds, and the eternal preservation of Percival's secret.

My instincts (which seldom err) suggested to me, on reviewing the circumstances, that our invisible Anne was probably drawing nearer to the boat-house at the Blackwater Lake. There I posted myself, previously mentioning to Mr. Michelson (the landlord) that my height he found when wanted, immersed in study, in that solitary place. It is my habit always to make use necessary mysteries, and never to set people suspecting me for want of a little reasonable candor on my part. Mrs. Rubelle I included in my from first to last. This lady-like person (widow of a Protestant Priest) overflown with faith Vaughel by sad experience, I had placed in my confidence in a woman of her mature years, I opened the ample reservoirs of my nature, and absorbed it till.

I was rewarded for posting myself sentinel at the lake, by the appearance—not of Anne Catherick herself, but of the person in search of her. This individual also overflowed with sim-ple faith, which I absorbed in the same in the case already mentioned. I leave her to describe the circumstances (if she has not done so already) under which she conducted the stranger to the object of her maternal care. When I first saw Anne Catherick she was asleep. I was electrified by the likeness between the unhappy woman and Lady Glyde. The details of the grand scheme, which had suggested themselves in outline only when I left London, occurred to me, in all their masterly combination, at the sight of the sleeping face. At the same time my brain was always accessible to tender influences, dissolved in tears at the spectacle of suffering before me. I instantly took steps to relieve that suffering. In other words, I provided the necessary stimulant for strengthening Anne Catherick to perform the journey to London.

At this point I enter a necessary protest, and correct a lamentable error.

The best years of my life have been passed in the ardent study of medical and chemical science. Chemistry, especially, has always had irresistible attractions for me, from the enormous, the sublime facility which it affords to the use of it confers. Chemists, I assert it emphatically, might sway, if they pleased, the destinies of humanity. Let me explain this before I go further.

Mind, they say, rules the world. But what rules the mind? It is rash to say the body (before me closely here) lies at the mercy of the most omnipotent of all mortal potentates—the Chemist. Let me, Fosco, the chemist, ask when Shakspeare has conceived Hamlet, and sits down to describe the conception—what do the grains of powder dropped into his daily food, I will reduce his mind, by the action of his body, till his pen puts out the most abject drivel that has ever degraded paper. Under similar circumstances, revive me the illustrious Newton. I guarantee him, when he puts down his fair fall, his shall err it, instead of discovering the principle of gravitation. Nero's dinner shall transform Seneca into a driveller instead of before his has done digesting it; and the morning draught of Alexander the Great shall make Alexander rush for his life, at the first sight of the enemy, the same afternoon. On my sacred word of honor, it is lucky for society that modern chemists are, by incomprehensible good fortune, the most harmless of mankind. The mass are good fellows, and I salute you my brothers. The few philosophers besotted with admiration for the sound of their own lecturing voices; visionaries who waste their lives on fantastic impossibilities; or quacks whose ambition soars no higher than our corns. Thus Society escapes; and the illimitable power of Chemistry remains the slave of the most superficial and the most insignificant ends.

Why this outburst? Why this withering colloquium?

Because my conduct has been misrepresented, because my motives have been misunderstood. It has been assumed that I used my vast chemical resources against Anne Catherick; and that I would have used them, if I could, against that magnificent Marian herself. Odious insinuations both! All my interests were concerned (as will be seen presently) in the preservation of Anne Catherick's life. All my anxieties were concentrated on Marian's rescue from the hands of the monster to whose lot she attended her, and who found my advice confirmed, from first to last, by the opinion of a physician. On two occasions only—both equally harmless to the individual on whom I practiced—did I summon to myself the assistance of my profound knowledge. On the first of the two, after following Marian to the Inn at Blackwater (studying, behind a row of wagons which hid me from her, the poetry of motion, as embodied in her walk), I availed myself of the services of my invaluable friend, to cope and to conquer the other of two letters which my adored enemy had intrusted to a discarded maid. In this case, the letters had been the property of the dress. Madame Fosco could only open them, read them, pretend to reseal them, and put back. I put them back again, by scientific assistance—which assistance I rendered in a half-ounce bottle. The second occasion, when the same means were employed, was the occasion (to which I shall soon refer) of Lady Glyde's arrival in London. Secrets, at any other time, was I indebted to my Art, as distinguished from myself. To all other emergencies and complications my resources—moral, physical, coupling, high-chemical, with circumstances, was invariably equal. I affirm this all-pervading intelligence of their capacity. At the expense of the Chemist, I vindicate the Man.

Respect for the outburst of generous indignation It has inexpressibly relieved me. En route! Let us proceed.

Having suggested to Mrs. Clement (or Clements, I am not sure which) that the best method of keeping Anne and Percival apart was to remove her to London; having found that my proposal was eagerly received; and having appointed a day to meet the travelers at the station, and to see them leave it, I was at liberty to return to the house and to overlook the difficulties which still remained to be met.

My first proceeding was to invite Marian into the garden, where I found her in close confidence with Mrs. Clements that she should communicate her London address, in Anne's interests, by Sunday next. This duty I undertook to perform myself, in my absence, might shake the simple confidence of Mrs. Clements, and she might not write at all. I, therefore, as I had capable of traveling to London by the train late that night, and of privately seeing her on arrival. I asked myself this question. The congruous part of me immediately answered, Madame Fosco.

After directing that my valet should go to London, I arranged that the journey should serve a double purpose. A nurse for the suffering Marian, capable of keeping the patient and to myself, was a necessity of my position. One of the most eminently confidential and capable women in existence—my wife. Fortune, as I have observed, I refer to that respectable matron, Madame Rubelle—to whom I addressed a letter, at her residence in London, by the hands of my valet.

On the appointed day Mrs. Clements and Anne Catherick met me at the railway. They reliably saw them off. I politely saw Madame Fosco off by the same train. The last thing at night, my valet returned to Blackwater, having followed her instructions with the most unimpeachable accuracy. She was accompanied by Madame Rubelle, who brought me the London address of Mrs. Clements. After-events proved this last precaution to have been not necessary. Mrs. Clements punctually informed Lady Glyde of her place of abode. With a way me future communication was established.

The same day I had a brief interview with the doctor, at which I protested, in the sacred interests of humanity, against the treatment of Marian's case. He was insolent, as all ignorant people are. I showed no resentment. I detected a rising talent in him till it was necessary to quarrel to some purpose.

My next proceeding was to leave Blackwater myself. I left for London residence to take, in anticipation of coming events. I had also a little business, of my domestic sort, to transact. I had wisely allowed to reach its destination; feeling, at the time, that it could do no harm, and might do some good, if I represented myself before Mr. Fairlie, to support Marian's own proposal, with certain modifications which, happily for the success of my plans, were rendered really inevitable by her illness. It was necessary that Lady Glyde should leave Blackwater alone, by her uncle's invitation, and that she should rest a night on the journey at her aunt's residence (Mrs. Vesey's house, in St. John's Wood), by her uncle's express advice. To achieve these results, and to secure a note of invitation which could be shown to Lady Glyde, were the objects of my visit to Mr. Fairlie. When I have mentioned that this gentleman was equally feeble in mind and body, and that I let loose the whole force of my character on him, I have said enough. I came, saw, and conquered Fairlie.

On my return to Blackwater Park (with the letter of invitation) I found that the doctor's imbecile treatment of Marian's case had led to the most alarming results. The fever had turned to Typhus. Lady Glyde, on the day of my return, tried to force herself into the room to nurse her sister. She was kept out by attacks of sympathy; she had committed the unpardonable outrage on my sensibilities of calling me a spy; she was a stumbling-block in the way and in Percival's—but, for all that, my magnanimity forbade me to put her in danger of infection with my own hands. At the second visit, I offered no hindrance to her putting herself in danger. She had succeeded in doing so, the intricate hour which I was slowly and patiently operating on might perhaps have been cut by circumstances. As it was, the doctor interfered, and she was kept out of the room.

I had myself previously recommended sending for advice to London. This course had been now taken. The physician, on his arrival, confirmed my view of the case. The crisis was serious. But we had hope of the turning point on the fifth day from the appearance of the Typhus. It was only once absent from Blackwater at this time—when I drove to the office by the morning train, to make the final arrangements in my power. When I had to see Marian sure myself, by private inquiry, that Mrs. Clements had not moved; and to settle one or two little preliminaries with the husband of Madame Rubelle. I returned at night. Five days afterward the physician pronounced on interesting Marian to be out of danger, and to be in need of nothing but careful nursing. This was the time I had waited for. Now that my great attendance was no longer indispensable, I played the first move in the game by asserting myself against Percival. He was under so many witnesses in my way whom it was necessary to remove. A lively altercation between us (in which Percival, grossly instructed by me, refused to interfere) served the purpose in view. I descended on the miserable man in an irresistible avalanche of indignation, and swept him from the house.

The servants were the next encumbrances to get rid of. I had received instructions (of whose moral courage required perpetual stimulants), and Mrs. Michelson was amazed, one day, by hearing from her master that the whole household was to be broken up. We cleared the house of all the servants but two, on the plea of saving for domestic purposes, and whose lumpish stupidity we could trust to make no embarrassing discoveries. When these last dismissals remained but to relieve ourselves of Mrs. Michelson—a result which was easily achieved by sending this unlucky dupe to the lodging-house for ministers at the sea-side.

The circumstances were now exactly what I wished them to be. Lady Glyde was confined to her room by nervous illness; and the lumpish household (I forgot to mention) had shut up there, at night, in attendance on her mistress. Marian, though fast recovering, still kept her bed, with Mrs. Rubelle for nurse. No other living creatures but my wife, myself, and Percival were in the house. With all the chances thus in our favor, I confronted the present emergency, and played the second move in the game.

The object of the second move was to induce Lady Glyde to leave Blackwater Park accompanied by her sister. Unless we could persuade her that Marian had gone on to London before her, there was no chance of removing her, of her own free-will, from the house. To produce this necessary conviction in her mind, I arranged that our interesting invalid in one of the uninhabited bedrooms at Blackwater. At the dead of night Marian Rubelle was dressed in Marian's own (Percival not being cool enough to be trusted), accomplished the concealment. The necessary preparations were made, the carriage was brought round to the door, by my directions the bed between made, in the morning, on a mattress in the frame-work of wood. We had only to lift the frame-work gently at the head and foot, and to transport our patient where we pleased, without disturbing herself or her bed. No chemical assistance was needed, or used, in this case. Our interesting Marian lay in bed for the purpose of convalescence. We placed the candles and opened the doors betrothed. I, in right of my great experience, walked at the head of the frame-work; my wife and Madame Rubelle took the foot. I leave it to the world's intellectual powers to decide (after this full description) Ass for the Arts! alas for this most pictorial of subjects! the modern Rembrandt is nowhere to be found.

The next morning my wife and I started for London, leaving Marian secluded in the uninhabited middle of the house, under care of Madame Rubelle, who kindly consented to imprison herself with her patient for two or three days. Before taking our departure I gave Percival Mr. Fairlie's letter of invitation to his niece (addressed to her at home on the journey to Cumberland, at her aunt's house), with directions to show it to Lady Glyde on hearing from me, and also obtained from him the address of the Asylum in which Anne Catherick had been confined, and a letter to the proprietor, announcing to that gentleman the return of his runaway patient to medical care.

I had arranged, at my last visit to the metropolis, to have our modest domestic establishment ready to receive us when we arrived in London by the early train. In consequence of this wise precaution we were enabled, that same day, to play the third move in the game—the getting possession of Anne Catherick.

Dates are of importance here. I combine in myself the opposite characteristics of a Man of Sentiment and a Man of Business. I have all the dates at my fingers' ends.

On the 27th of July, 1850, I sent my wife, in a cab, to clear Mrs. Clements out of the way, in the first place. A supposed message from Lady Glyde in London was sufficient to obtain this result. Mrs. Clements was taken away in the cab, and was left in the cab, while my wife (on pretence of purchasing something at a shop) gave her the slip, and returned to receive her expected visitor at our house in St. John's Wood. It is hardly necessary to add that the visitor had been described to the servants as "Lady Glyde."

In the mean while I had followed in another cab, with a note for Anne Catherick, merely mentioning that Lady Glyde intended to keep Mrs. Clements to spend the day with her, and that she was to join them, under care of the good gentleman now in question, who had already saved her from discovery in Hampshire by Sir Percival. The "good gentleman" sent in the note by a man in livery, and paused for results at a door or two further on. At the moment when Anne appeared at the house door and closed it, this gentleman and the cab door open ready for her, absorbed her into the vehicle, and drove off.

(Pass me here one exclamation in parenthesis. How interesting this is!)

On the road to Forest Road my companion showed no fear. I can be paternal—no man more so—when I please; and I was intensely paternal on this occasion. What could I say to her confidence! I had compounded the medicine which had done her good; I had warned her of her danger from Sir Percival. Perhaps I trusted too implicitly to these titles; perhaps I underrated the keenness of the lower instincts in persons of weak intellect—it is certain that I neglected to prepare her sufficiently for a disappointment on entering my house. When I took her into the drawing-room—when she saw no one present but Madame Fosco, who was a stranger to her—she exhibited the most violent agitation: if she had scented danger in the air, as a dog scents the presence of some creature unseen, her alarm could not have displayed itself more suddenly and more causelessly. I interposed in vain. The fear from which she was suffering (it might be soothed) but the serious heart disease under which she labored was beyond the reach of all moral palliatives. In the unspeakable horror, she was seized with convulsions—a shock to the system, in her condition, which might have laid her dead at any moment at our feet.

The nearest doctor was sent for, and was told that Lady Glyde required his immediate services. To my infinite relief, he was a capable man. I represented my visitor to him as a person of weak intellect, and subject to disturbance, and I arranged that no nurse but my wife should watch in the sick-room. The unhappy woman was too ill, however, to cause any anxiety about what she might say. The one dread which now oppressed me was the dread that the false Lady Glyde might die before the true Lady Glyde arrived in London. I had written a note in the morning to Madame Rubelle, telling her to join me at her husband's house on the evening of the 29th; with another note to Percival, warning him to show his wife her uncle's letter of invitation, to assert that Marian had gone on before her, and to dispatch her to town by the mid-day train on the 29th. On reflection, I had felt the necessity, in Anne Catherick's state of health, of precipitating events, and of leaving Lady Glyde at my disposal earlier than I had originally contemplated. What fresh directions, in the further uncertainty of my position, could I now issue? I could do nothing but trust to chance and the doctor. My emotions expressed themselves in pathetic apostrophes—to which I was just self-possessed enough to couple, in the hearing of other people, with the name of "Lady Glyde." In all other respects, Fosco, on that memorable day, was Fosco shrouded in total eclipse.

She passed a bad night—she awoke worn out—but, later in the day, she revived amazingly. My classic events accord with her. I could receive no answers from Percival and Madame Rubelle till the morning of the next day, the 29th. In anticipation of their following my directions, which, accident apart, I knew they would do, I went to secure a fly to fetch Lady Glyde from my railway; directing it to be at my house on the 29th, at two o'clock. After seeing the order entered in the book, I went on to arrange matters with Monsieur Rubelle. I also procured the services of two gentlemen, who could help him with the necessary extinction of lunacy. One of them I knew personally; the other was known to Monsieur Rubelle. Both were men whose vigorous minds soared superior to narrow scruples—both were laboring under temporary embarrassments—both believed in me.

It was past five o'clock in the afternoon before I returned from the performance of these duties. When I got back Anne Catherick was dead. Dead on the 28th; and Lady Glyde was not to arrive in London till the 29th!

I was stunned. Meditate on that. Fosco stunned!

It was too late to retrace our steps. Before my return the doctor had officiously undertaken to save me all trouble by registering the death, on the date when it happened, with my own hand. My grand scheme, unassailable hitherto, had at last—now—no stay whatever on my part could alter the fatal event of the 28th. I turned mentally to the fatuous. Percival's interests and mine being still at stake, nothing was left but to play the game through to the end. I recalled my impenetrable calm—and played it.

On the morning of the 29th Percival's letter reached me, announcing his wife's arrival by the mid-day train. Madame Rubelle also wrote to say she would follow in the evening. I started in the fly, bowled to the false Lady Glyde dead in the house, to receive the true Lady Glyde, on her arrival by the railway, at three o'clock. Hidden under the seat of the carriage, I carried with me all the clothes Anne Catherick had worn on coming into my house—they were destined to assist the resurrection of the woman who was dead, in the person of the woman who was living. What a situation! I appeal to the rising romantic writers of England. I offer it, as totally new, to the worn-out dramatists of France.

Lady Glyde was at the station. There was great crowding and confusion, and more delay than I liked (in case any of her friends had happened to be at the station) in reclaiming her luggage. Her first questions, as we drove off, implored me to tell her where her sister, I invented news of the most pacifying kind; assuring her that she was about to see her sister at my house. My house! I appeal to society, I was in the neighborhood of Leicester Square, I was in the companionship of Monsieur Rubelle, who received us in the hall.

I took my visitor up stairs into a back room: the two mutual gentlemen I have spoken of were in waiting on the floor beneath, to see the patient, and to give me their certificates. After quieting Lady Glyde on the necessary questions about her sister, I introduced my friends, separately, to her presence. They performed the formal rites of the occasion briefly, intelligently, conscientiously. I entered the room again as soon as they had left it; and at once precipitated events by a reference, of the alarming kind, to "Miss Halcombe's" state of health.

Result followed as I had anticipated. Lady Glyde became frightened, and turned faint. For the second time, and the last, I called Science to my assistance. A dessert glass of water, and a medicated bottle of smelling-salts, relieved her of all further embarrassment and alarm. Additional applications, in the course of the evening, procured her the inestimable blessing of a good night's rest. Madame Rubelle arrived in time to preside at Lady Glyde's toilet. Her own clothes were taken away from her at night, and Madame Rubelle's were put on in the morning, with the strictest regard to propriety, by the matronly hands of the good Rubelle. Throughout the day I was occupied on our joint and initially-suspended consciousness, until the dexterous assistance of my medical friends enabled me to procure the necessary order under which than I had ventured to hope. That evening (the evening of the 30th) Madame Rubelle and I took over revived "Anne Catherick" to the Asylum. She was received with great surprise, but without suspicion—thanks to the order and certificates, to Percival's letter, to Rubelle's likeness, to the clothes, and to the patient's own confused mental condition at the time. I returned at once to assist Madame Fosco in the preparations for the burial of the false "Lady Glyde," having the clothes of the true "Lady Glyde" in my possession. They were afterward sent to Cumberland by the conveyance which was used for the funeral. I attended the latter with becoming dignity, attired in the deepest mourning.

My narrative of these remarkable events, written under equally remarkable circumstances, closes here. Some minor points on which I reserved, in communicating with Limmeridge House, are already known—so is the magnificent success of my enterprise—so the solid pecuniary results which followed it. I have to assert, with the whole force of my conviction, that the one weak point in my combinations would never have been found out if the one weak place in my heart had not been discovered first. Nothing but my fatal admiration for Marian restrained me from stepping in to my own rescue when she effected her sister's escape. On the risk that existed in the complete destruction of Lady Glyde's identity. If either Marian or Mr. Hartright anticipated the assertion hereby, they would publicly expose themselves to the imputation of sustaining a rank deception; they would be ensnared into admitting a conspiracy: and they would, therefore, be powerless to place my interests or Percival's secret in jeopardy. I committed one error in visiting Anne; to such a blindfold calculation of chances as this. I committed another when Percival had paid the penalty of his own obstinacy and baseness, by granting Lady Glyde a second reprieve from the lunatic house, and allowing her to contract a new bond of existence with me. In brief, Fosco, at this serious crisis, was untrue to himself. Deplorable as the confession must be, I found the cause in my Heart—behold, in the image of Marian Halcombe, the first and last weakness of Fosco's life!

At the ripe age of sixty, I make this unparalleled confession. Youths! I invoke your sympathy. Maidens! I claim your tears.

A word more—and the attention of the reader (concentrated breathlessly on myself) shall be released.

My own mental insight informs me that three inevitable questions will be asked here by persons of inquiring minds. They shall be stated; they shall be answered.

First question. What is the secret of Madame Fosco's unhesitating devotion of herself to the fulfillment of my hidden designs, and her disinheritance of my deepest plans? I might answer this by simply referring to my own character; and by asking in my turn—Where, in the history of the world, has a man of my order ever been found without a woman in the back-ground, self-immolated on the altar of his life? But I remember that I am writing in England; I remember that I was married in England—and I ask, if a woman's marriage-obligations, in this country, provide for her private opinion of her husband's principles? No! They charge her irrevocably to love, honor, and obey him. That is exactly what my wife has done. I stand here on a supreme moral elevation; and I defy mankind to show a better performance of conjugal duties. Silence, Calumny! Your sympathy, Wives of England, for Madame Fosco!

Second question. If Anne Catherick had not died when she did, what should I have done? I should, in that case, have awaited a worn-out Nature in finding permanent repose. I should have opened the doors of the Prison of Life, and have extended to the captive (incarnally afflicted in mind and body both) a happy release.

Third question. On a calm revision of all the circumstances—Is my conduct worthy of Count Fosco? Most emphatically, No! Have I not carefully avoided exposing myself to the odium of committing unnecessary crime? With my unrivaled resources in chemistry, I might have taken Lady Glyde's life. At immense personal sacrifice I followed the dictates of my own ingenuity—even in humanity, my own invention—and took her identity instead. Judge me by what I might have done. How comparatively innocent! how indirectly virtuous! appear in what I really did!

I summarized, on beginning it, that this narrative would be a remarkable account. It has entirely answered my expectations. Receive the assurance, that nothing was kept in reserve. I leave forever. They are worthy of the occasion, and worthy of

FOSCO.

OLD KING HAKE.

BORN of the Sea on a rocky coast
Was old King Hake,
Where sooner late or earlier frost
Brave virtue make!
He was a hero in the old
Blood-letting days
An iron hero of Norse mould,
With iron ways.

His feet were rough-shod for the day
Of treading down.
When sword met flesh the blood would start
With old King Hake;
Not sneak in dark coves of the heart,
Where evils lie snake.
And secret murder's bids he must
When sharp within his sheath asleep
Lay his good sword,
He held it royal work to keep
His kirtle deep.

A man of valor, bloody and wild,
In Viking need
And yet of fruitful feeling mild
As honey-mead.

Once in his youth, from farm to farm,
Collecting scat,
He gathered gifts and welcomes warm;
And one night sat,
With hearts all happy for his throne—
Wishing no higher—
Where peasant faces merrily shone
At cosy fire.

Their Braga-bowl was handed round
By one fair girl:
The Sea-King looked and thought, "I've found
My hidden pearl."
Her wavy hair was golden fair,
Her eyes were blue;
Her cyes clear blue as heaven, and there
Lay his new world.
He drank out of the mighty horn,
Strong, stinging stuff;
Then wiped his mouth unshorn
With hand as rough.
And kissed her; drew her to his side,
And swung mate.
Saying, "If you will make her a Bride,
I'll make her a Queen."
And round that strong arm, for fun,
For, in those days,
A waist could feel: 'twas lithe and warm,
And full of grace.
"How many brave deeds have you done?"
She asked low and wooer,
Counting the arm's gold rings: they won
One victory more.
The blood of joy leaped rich and red
Out of his face;
And to his smiling strength he wed
Her fearless grace.
'Twas thus King Hake struck royal root
In homely ground;
And hankered after goodlier fruit
His branches crowned.

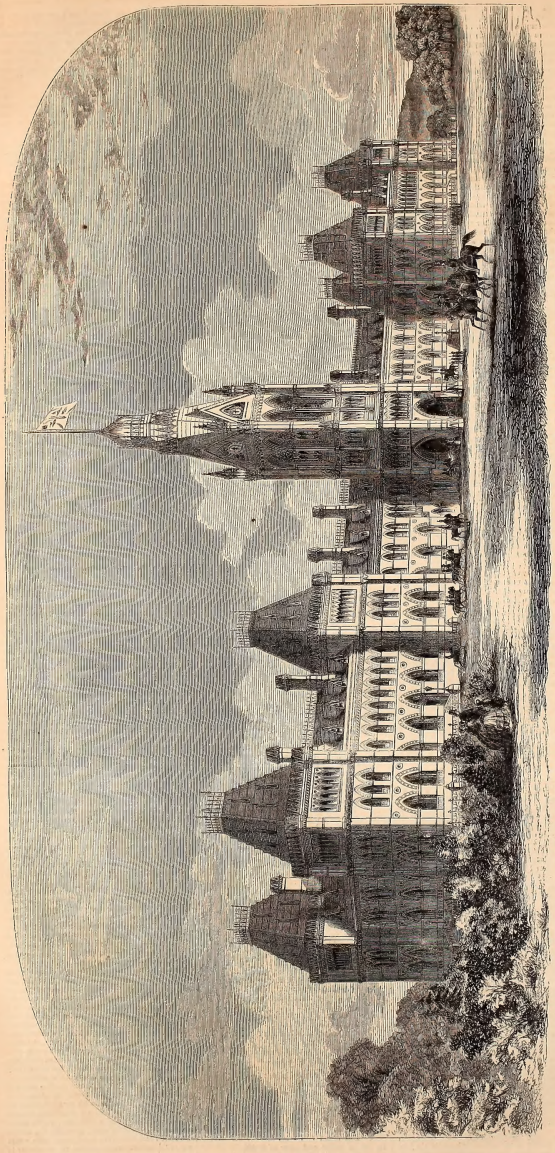
But Hake could never bind at home
His spirit free;
It grew familiar with the foam
Of many a sea;
A rare good bluff whose way was rent
In many a war,
And wore no gem for ornament
But battle-scar.
In day of battle and hour of strife,
Cried Old King Hake:

"Kings live for honor, not long life."
Then would he break
Right through their circle of shields, to reach
Some chief of a race
That never yielded ground, but each
Died in his place.
There the old Norseman stood up tall
Above the rest;
Mainmast of mast, head of all,
They saw his crest
Toss, where the war-eyes reared, and rode
O'er mounds of dead,
And where the battle-dust was trod
Red as his tread.

For Odin, in the glad wide blue
Of heaven, would laugh
With smiles, and the ruddy dew
Of slaughter quaff.

Hake did not seek to softly die,
With child and wife;
He bore his hard death as high
As in his life.
Glittering in eye, and grim in lip,
His hale form rose
Ready for sailing his War-Ship,
That he, King Hake,
The many-sounded, gray, and old,
His day being done,
He, the Norse warrior, brave and bold,
Might die like one.
And chanting some old battle-song,
Thrilling and weird,
His soul vibrating, shook his long
Majestic beard.
He gilded his blue-eye, still red,
In his right hand;
With shield on arm, and helm on head,
Stood ready!) Lo!
And girded him with his good sword;
And so attired,
With like his arms all aboard,
The ship he fired,
And lay down with his heroes dead,
On deck to die;
Still singing, drooped his gray old head,
With face to sky.
There, as a sinking sunset dies
Down in the west,
The fire went out; the rude heart lies
At rest—at rest,
And sleeping in its ocean bed,
That burial-place
Most royal for the kingly dead
Of the old sea-race!
So the Norse noble of renown,
With his stern pride,
That flamed out of death pulled down,
And so he died.

SNAIL-EATING.



IF he was a bold man who first ate an oyster, we hold it to be equally incontrovertible that he was a bolder or more hungry man who ate the first snail. Nevertheless, the snail has been regarded as an article of food from the earliest ages. In Pliny's time snails had become a favorite dish with the Roman gourmands, and every corner of the empire was ransacked for the finest and fattest specimens. The practice of fattening snails for the table lasted for many centuries; and there were to be found many establishments for this purpose, known as escargotieres, in France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Austria, during the last century.

Like the fish, the snail never found many admirers in England as a comestible; but in France, especially in the warmer and more southern departments, it is a favorite article of food, and an important item of commerce. They are not only used for home consumption, but even sent abroad to America, the Antilles, and Senegal. Some idea of the estimation in which they are held may be formed from the price current, which varies according to size and quality; from a penny to twopence per hundred at Toulouse, but those which are sent to Paris, from Burgundy, Champagne, and Franche Comté, realize as much as sixpence per hundred. The latter, however, are of a very large and succulent description, known as Helix Pomatia, the vine-snail or Burgundy oyster. The entire animal is nearly three inches long, of a yellowish or pearl ash gray, and its skin covered with rough tubercles. Its shell is proportionately large, thick, and strong, of a lovely clear yellowish color, with irregular bands and markings.

At Marseille, the H. Pisana, or snail of Pisa, is in most request, being often to be met with at sums of five or six thousand francs every year. This is a pretty and delicately-shaped snail, with a yellow ish shell, marked with brown bands, and the interior of pearly rose. This would be a good snail to begin upon if we were commencing a career, as it has a much less formidable appearance than the large Pomatia, or Burgundy oyster.

If any of our country-readers recommend a dish of snails, it is generally with a diffident air, and an appeal to their medical rather than their gastronomical virtues; for instance, leaf-powder, which is made of these mollusks dried in an oven, shell and all, and then bruised in a mortar, is still recommended as a dose to be taken as an emulsion; and slater or sing gowder, which is similarly prepared, is recommended as warm drink, and consequently more suitable for consumptive patients.

Here, however, is a genuine receipt for snailbroth: "Wash them extremely well, and throw them into very hot water; take them out of the shell, and pass them through several waters, scrubbing them well with the hand; slice them, pound the shells, and put all into a sauce-pan, with as much water as will cover them; boil, skim, and let them simmer for several hours; add a little salt, sugar, and a very small quantity of mace, to correct the mawkish taste; and three nerve leaves—or as some would say, as Abernethy recommended the cucumber to be served, throw them out of the window.

PROPOSED NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS AT OTTAWA, CANADA, OF WHICH THE PRINCE OF WALES LAYS THE CORNER-STONE.

VOICELESS VERSE.

BY C. H. WEBB.

The world is rife with nobler thought
Than trembles on the tongue;
The world is full of melody
Unwritten and unsung.
The music of a march is sweet,
But action is sublime,
And you may live a nobler verse
Than can be told in rhyme!

Sweep from my sight these voiceless books—
They vex my weary brain;
And I will sit at Nature's feet—
Her open page the plain—
And read a pleasant pastoral
In every blade that grows;
A lyric in the lily-leaf,
An epic in the rose.

Let lyres and lutes, with tinkling breath,
To love-sick girls belong;
The rhythm of a well-spent life
Is sweeter far than song.
I'm weary of the waste of words—
Our world were not so dead
If half our bards would cease to write
And live their poems instead!

THE CITY OF OTTAWA.

FROM Montreal the Prince of Wales goes to Ottawa City, which is to be the future capital of the Province of Canada—unless the British Provinces should be united, in which case Quebec would probably be the capital. At Ottawa he is to lay the corner-stone of the new Parliament Houses; we accordingly present our readers with a fine picture of them, from the architect's design. They will be, perhaps, the finest State Houses in North America. In No. 156 of this Journal we published a full description of them.

Ottawa itself is a pretty little town of perhaps four or five thousand inhabitants, admirably situated on the River Ottawa, and at the mouth of the Rideau Canal. Its first name was Bytown, in memory of Colonel By, the engineer who built the Rideau Canal. In 1855 the inhabitants had it changed, and reverted to the more poetic aboriginal appellation. Tradition states that the first settler of Ottawa was a Yankee named Wright, who built himself a log-cabin there sixty years ago. The place grew slowly. The adjacent country does not precisely teem with milk and honey, though a great deal of timber is taken out of the woods round about, and floated down the Ottawa to a market. Within the past ten years, and especially since the Queen designated Ottawa as the proper site of the Provincial Government, the town has thriven rapidly.

Captain Brand,

OF THE

SCHOONER "CENTIPEDE,"

A PIRATE OF EMINENCE IN THE WEST INDIES;

His Loves and Exploits,

TOGETHER WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR MANNER BY WHICH HE DEPARTED THIS LIFE.

CHAPTER XLIX.—(Continued.)

To go back again for a week, the Monongahela—double-banked leviathan as she was—came plunging out to sea from Kingston; every man and boy, from Jack Smith on her forecastle to Bill Pump in the spirit-room, and from Richard Hardy to Tiny Mouse, knowing from the first plunge the frigate made what they all sailed for.

With her proud head toward the east she went dashing on past the White Horse Rocks, and woe to the small angry waves which did not get out of her way, for she smashed them contemptuously in foamy masses from her majestic bows, sending them back in sparkling spray and bubbles to hiss their anger away to leeward in her wake. On she went, far off to sea where the trade-wind was strongest, disdaining gentle zephyrs near the land, with her great square yards swinging round at every watch while bending to windward; the tacks close down, yards as fine as they would lie, and the heavy sheets flat aft.

Every evening the surgeon, the purser, the chaplain, the major, and the old sailing master were in the cabin, going over the chase of a certain Pirate in a schooner Centipede, away down on the Darien Coast, with Cape Garrote there under their lee, and the vultures and the sharks grinding the bones and tearing the flesh of the half a man with the tusk gleaming out of his wiry mustache; and the Padre, with his eyes staring wide open, and the crucifix, borne away by the carnivorous birds of prey.

All of those dreadful particulars, together with matters that had gone before—of a lost boy, a heart-broken mother, and a murdered mate, Mr. Binks, on board the brig Martha Blunt—the party at Escondido, the snuff-box, and Paul Darcentel. All about him, too, from the tragedy on the plantation, his despair, and reckless life afterward, when he served in slavers, where he did something to allay the sufferings of the poor wretches; and afterward how he was trapanned to the Doce Leguas, went a cruise with Mr. Bill Gibbs, whose leg he hacked off with a hand-saw, not knowing at the time about the locket; the little child he had saved; how that child had saved him from his torture on the trestle with his muscello teeth; how he had wandered the wide world over searching and searching for the mother of that boy.

And there the boy was—the manly, brave young fellow now—whom officers and sailors had always loved, flying away with the dark Doctor—no longer Darcantel, but Harry Piron —with his fond father and mother in the distance; and the sweet girl he adored with her blonde head resting in her mother's lap.

Ay, every soul in the ship knew all about it, and talked of it, and drank to the happiness of the young couple; all save Dick Hardy, who moved energetically about the frigate's decks, with his eyes every where, now and aloft, prompt, sharp, and quick, quite like Cleveland there beside him, when they were together in the old Seneca during the hurricane, and chased to her destruction the Centipede.

"Sail ho!" sung out the man on the fore-topsail yard.

"Where away?"

"Right ahead, Sir. A brig on the starboard tack!"

Ay, the old Martha Blunt bouncing along under all sail, especially at the short-coming seas, and striking them doggedly, as she beat up for the Windward Passage between Hayti and Cuba.

But there was an old sea-bruiser of a different build, who was then in the West Indies, and was after that sturdy old brig with teak ribs for a hearty set-to; and when she came up alongside, in the friendly sparring-match which ensued while both squared their main yards and lay for an hour side by side, there was considerable conversation; so much talk, in fact—boats going to and fro, mingled with roars, and shrieks, and clasping of hands on board the brig—never a sound on board the ship—that the blue pennant fluttered in such a way it was hard to tell whether it was Jacob, or Piron, or the sweet wife, or Mademoiselle, or her lovely mother, who threw their arms around that pennant's truck.

Then yard-arm and yard-arm, the frigate with her cavanas canopy of upper sails furled, and the brig in her best bib and tucker, they both filled away and moved side by side.

For a day or two they went on, talking and laughing to one another in those friendly shakes of the hand over blue water, until one day, the brig being to windward, she came upon an old, water-logged launch, with a broken mast and a torn sail hanging over her side.

It fell calm, and Jacob Blunt ordered young Binks to get into the yawl and tow the boat alongside, and to be smart about it; for the breeze might make so soon as the fog rose, and the Commodore was not the man to be kept waiting in a big frigate. Mr. Binks was smart about it, and presently he returned—though there was no hurry, for the calm lasted a long time—with his water-logged prize.

There was no human being in this prize; but when she came alongside, and a yard tackle was hooked on to her the main cut of her, Jacob Blunt and the people on board gave a pleasant yell of astonishment.

It was not the soiled pack of Spanish cards, or the few bundles of saturated paper cigars floating about, which caused this excitement. No, it was several canvas bags lying there in the stern-sheets, strapped with strands of a woman's red petticoat to the empty water-cask beneath the thwarts; and not one of those canvas bags, or what was in them, injured in the least by salt-water. Very carefully were those bags—and they were weighty—lifted on board the brig, over the rail where the pirates swarmed some long years ago, on to the quarter-deck; and then there was another joyous shout from Jacob Blunt, as when he had hailed the trade-wind in that long-past time.

"By all that's wonderful, here is my old bag of guineas, and some few Spanish milled dollars! Look at the mark, my darlings!"

Another weighty bag was set aside for Mrs. Timothy Binks, and the rest were devoted, with some large doubloon reservations for crew, to Martha Blunt and Jacob Blunt in their declining years.

Then, the weather being still calm and foggy, Jacob and his passengers went on board the double-banked frigate for Church service, where they all prayed with much hope and thanksgiving for what had passed and what was to come; and then they went into the Commodore's cabin, where they remained over so long a time.

Let us go back this same week again—a very long seven days it has been for every body, particularly so for the sixty-odd man, who was extremely anxious, as he kicked and lashed his mule, and kept looking round the south side of Jamaica, from Portland Point to Pedro Bluff and San Negril, throwing a ray of cold frost there day and night, expecting that tall Dorcet to come striding along in that deep water, heading due north.

And at last the dark figure hove in sight, in the schooner Rosalie—the sweet little craft skimming exultingly over the seas, kissing them occasionally with both her dainty, glistening cheeks, reeling joyously over on her side, with her tidy dimity laced and spread in one flat sheet of white; while the slender arms bent like whalebone to the freshening breeze, and she left the dancing bubbles sparkling and flashing for many in her wake, as she leaped away from their liquid embrace.

Two hundred miles to go, and the breeze fell from fresh to light, until at last, shrouded in a thick fog, one Sunday morning, when there was no air at all, only a flat calm, and a smooth as a glass mirror with the quicksilver clouded.

Then out sweeps, my lads! Ten of a side, and two of those bronzed old lads at each sweep! All except the two after ones, where Ben Brown and the tall Doctor handled one apiece.

Then, with sails down and bare arms, the light little Rosalie continued gliding rapidly over the mirrored surface—little ashamed of herself, perhaps, at being seen in such a scanty rig—while her commander guided her graceful course, and Harry Greenfield peered about forward to see that no harm should arrest her dainty footsteps.

Presently was heard the toll of a bell. The sweeps paused—the hide gromets resting on the tholl-pins, and the water raining from their broad blades.

"That must be a man-of-war off here on the quarter," exclaimed the young officer at the tiller, "ringing for church."

The old seamen at the sweeps unconsciously took off their hats, wiped the sweat from their brows, and listened.

"It can hardly be the Monongohela," said Ben, "though I'm pr'aps she took more of a breeze to wind'ard, off the island."

Still the schooner glided on noiselessly over the sea, until, a minute later, Harry Greenfield sung out,

"Port, Sir! or we'll be plumped on a vessel here ahead."

The helm was put down, and the Rosalie steered off to starboard within a hiccuit-tos of a large brig.

"By my grandmother's wig," said Ben, "that's the old Martha Blunt!"

"Henri," said Paul Darcenatel, in French, in his deep voice, "the last request I shall ever make is to keep on. There is not a moment to lose!"

"Give way, men!" shouted the officer, in decided tone, as the words came with a stifled gasp from his heaving breast, while the sigh that followed was drowned in the splash of the sweeps in the water as they again chafed in their grooves, and the foam flashed away from the blades in turn.

But there was another splash. A white object sprang with a bound over the brig's quarter, dipping below the surface of the calm sea, and when it came up two great flippers, with a large black head between them, struck out like the paws of an alligator, breasting the water with a speed that soon brought him within a few fathoms of the schooner's low counter. Then seizing hold of the stack of the main-sheet, which was thrown to him, he came up, hand over hand, as if he could tear the stern frame out of the schooner.

A vigorous grasp caught him by one paw, and, with the other laid on the taffrail, he leaped on deck as if his feet had pressed a spring board instead of the yielding water.

Again, as in the olden time, he held his little Henri aloft in his giant arms; but this time it was Banon who was dripping from a souse, and not his little master.

"Give way, my souls! Another thousand dollars if we get up to the Key before dark!" said the deep voice of the tall Doctor.

"Good Lord!" roared a voice from on board the brig, now shut up again all alone in the fog —"if that old nigger has not gone and jumped overboard my name's not Binks!"

All right, Mr. Binks; Banou is safe! Send a boat on board the Monongohela, and report that the schooner Rosalie has passed ahead," went back in a clear note.

It was some considerable time before Binks could believe that he had not been hailed by David Jones himself, for he had seen nothing—being at the time in the lower cabin reading his Bible, and writing his name, "Binnacle Binks, Master of brig Martha Blunt," on the fly-leaf; and he was only disturbed in this praiseworthy occupation by a heavy body plunging overboard, and by one of his drowsy crew, who had, with his comrades, been sleeping near, reporting that circumstance with his eyes half shut.

Then young Binks took a considerable more time to get a boat lowered, and send her, with the cabin-boy, to the large frigate close on his beam, whose bell had just struck seven.

The boat, too, with four sleepy hands to pull her, took considerable time to find the ship, and then the whistles were piping to dinner, and all the good people from the brig, with the flagofficers, had retired to the Commodore's cabin for luncheon.

When Jacob Blunt heard the news, regardless of sherry and cold tongue, he himself got in his boat, leaving his passengers in an excited frame of mind, but rather comfortable on the whole, and returned to the teak bosom of his Martha.

There he took young Binks firmly by the shoulder, and walked him aft to the rail where his father—long since dead and murdered—had been used to sit and sing sailor ditties.

Then he impressively told him that: "This 'ere sort of thing wouldn't do! Even if he was a readin' the Bible—which was all very good on occasion, such as clear weather out on the broad Atlantic; but in fog times, when schooners was creepin' about in amongst the Antilles, and particularly off Jamaky or the south side of Cuby, mates and men should be wide awake and lookin' every where. And harkee, Binnacle! When you commands this 'ere old brig, or maybe a bran-new Martha Blunt, and me and my old woman lying below quarter in narrow cabins, you must bear in mind these my words! Well, my boy! Don't rub that 'ere sleeve over your eyes no more, and it will be all right."

Young Binks promised "that from that 'ere minnit he would never set on no rails, or sip no grog, or even read his mother's old Bible when he wos on watch, but always be as keerful as if there wos no lady passengers or children on board, or bags of dollars in the lower cabin stateroom—that he would! And his blessed old second father might take his duty be, young Binks, would never be caught fool again!"

Meanwhile the girlish schooner tripped away far out of sight, and when the fog lifted and the breeze came to blow it to leeward she was once more tidily dressed in snowy white, and splashing the water from her black eyes, as the last rays of the setting sun showed her the Tiger's Trap in the distance.

"Henri, my boy, put your arms around me again, as you did when I lay in torture on the trestle on that island. Have no fears for me; we shall meet again. There! now listen to me. Here is a packet which I wish you to carry to Porto Rico with this letter. The old Judge is alive, I think, to whom this letter is addressed, and it may perhaps soothe his declining years. I wish to take your little gig, with Banou and Ben Brown—no more force—and if, as I believe, that villain has returned to his former haunt, I will fulfill my oath to its very letter. Meanwhile, so soon as we have shoved off, while the breeze still holds, run down to the frigate—she is not three leagues off—and you will be in your yearning parents' arms, and those of the girl you love, before they sleep. There! I know you will think of me. Farewell!"

CHAPTER L.

ON A BED OF THORNS.

"Ho, ho!" said Captain Brand, as he stretched out his straight legs, in their canvas casings, on the sand of the little cove, "safe and sound, and not a soul to share this nice supper of that good old man Miguel!

"Ho, ho!" continued he; "here at last! No Babette to cook for me, no Centipede, nothing but that staunch little boat presented me by that generous fisherman, who, I fear, is drowned by this time. Well, let us enjoy ourselves! Excellent red snapper this! Sausage, rather too much garlic perhaps; but the brown bread and the aguardiente unexceptionable. Bless away, my little fire, your sticks cost me much labor to dig out of my once comfortable house; but you are better than gunpowder any day.

"Just to think of the years that have passed! That great bank of sand there over the sheds, nearly as high as the crag, where my brave fellows once carried the young cocoa-nut palms springing up on the crag itself—not a vestige of my old habitation left, or the bright blades or pleasant guests to dine with me!" Here there was something of the old cold murderous scowl on the Captain's face as he twisted the point of his nose.

"Ah, yes! there may be my wary-eyed Sanchez left, though the last I heard of him was in the Capilla dungeon of the Moro. And that's—grating his teeth and glaring with his icy eyes at the fire as if those two blocks of ice could put it out—" cursed Doctor who pursues me!

"Well, well, neither of those old friends are here yet, and before another sun sets I shall bequeath the old den to them both! Ho, ho! with those solid bags of chinking metal I shall leave as much sand and rocks as they choose to walk over. What a sly devil I was to stow that treasure away for a rainy day! Every cold is living being! Poisoned the fellow, too, who made the lock! Capital joke, 'pon my soul!"

This was the very last of the very few jokes that Captain Brand ever enjoyed.

"And now I think of it, I wonder if my thirsty old mate's bones are yet lying there in the vault. What was his name? such a bad memory I have! oh, Gibbs—Bill Gibbs—with one leg! Ho, ho!"

Here Captain Brand drained another copious ejaculate out of a cracked earthen pot and slapped his fine leg with rapture.

"And those dear girls who married me! Lucia, too?"

The dirty wretch started as the wing of a seabird swooped down over the pure inlet; and he thought he saw a white forefinger beckoning him on to his doom.

"Pshaw!" said he, smoothing down his filthy tattered shirt with the finger of his mutilated left hand. "How nervous I am! But what a bonnie Pedillo made of that marriage! And my good Ricardo, too! What a feast the sharks must have had on his oily, well-fed carcass? Misericordia! Ho, ho! I believe I'll bid my friends good-night."

Captain Brand stretched himself out at full length on the shelly strand, his boat secured by a clove hitch round his right leg and riding calmly on the little inlet; his bald head, with the few dry gray hairs on his temples, resting on Miguel's scanit hat, and the thin scum of frosty eyelids drawn over his frozen eyes—cracking their covering at times—until at last the Pirate, aided by fiery aguardiente, slept.

"NOW CAPTAIN BRAND KNEW WHAT WAS COMING."

A few late cormorants and sea-birds sailed over him in his fitful slumber, and uttered a cold cry as if their long time had come, and that he, too would shortly, as they sought their silent retreats on the wall of rocks opposite.

And Captain Brand dreamed too!—of the old laird, his father, in prison; his mother weeping over forged notes: the sleeping, unsuspecting people he had treacherously murdered: the pilgrims he had committed; the men he had slain in open conflict; those he had executed with his own private sword; the poor women of Panama in worse torments, when, indeed, even knife or pistol, poor or prayer, would have been a mercy: the agony and sufferings of those who survived them; with all the concomitant horrors which make the blood run cold to think of, and which made the Pirate's almost freeze in his veins—living years in minutes—did Captain Brand, as he lay there on the chill sand in his troubled nightmare of a sleep.

"Ah, Dios! Dios!" chattered the Señora Banana Pickle, at the other end of the inlet, while rolling over on the ledge of the rocks at the Tigre's Trap.

"What has become of my Ig—Ig—nacio—the one-eyed old villain who has persecuted me for forty years? Why did I cut the cord of the adrift bobber I got in myself? And here I am alone and desolate on this cursed island and my Ig—Ig—nacio gone with his spoil—or will he come back to me! Ah, Dios! Dios! what has become of the little man? He will kill me, certe, when he comes back and finds the boat gone with all the money, which nearly broke his thin back to bring here; but, Dios! Dios! I am dying of thirst, and not a shred of dried fish or perked beef has gone into my old mouth—"

Yes there has, Doña Pancha, for just then a piece of bacalao, salted rope—sailor, perhaps, for mastication—was placed across your crying mouth that you might bite upon, if you would only stop your old tongue.

For while you were screaming on the rocks, and yelling for your Ig—Ig—nacio, who was back for the last bag of gold that wasn't there, a light gig glided in like a black-fish, and a bigger black-fish dropped up and opened its great mouth, Pancha, with that bit of hide rope. But if you will keep quiet, Pancha, and not excercise Beauty on the Evil One, then the Pirate will give you a cup of liquid not known in the devil's dominions, and treat you also to some white bacon to nibble upon.

Ah! you will, eh? and tell all about that child of smoke, which you have seen? Then has been made by that cool-eyed Ig—Ig—nacio, away up there by the inlet? Now keep quiet again, old Doña Banana; and while your screaming mouth is gagged, don't cut this small gig away, or else she may navigate herself out to sea, as did your Ig's launch, and you be left desolate again.

The tropical night was still; the lizards wheedled, the bananas roared on the ocean beach, the ripples washed musically on the shelly shores, the alligators flapped about on the surface of the lagoon, the insects buzzed around the mangrove thickets; and as the gray dawn of morning appeared, and the rain began to fall, steamed a hot mist arose, through which the sea-birds flapped their wings and sailed away in search of their morning's meal. The alligator and the deep-sea fish, however, lay still and motionless low down by the base of the reefs, and watched with their cold, round eyes. The rain Brand, too, arose, and opening his greenbluish eyes, smoothing his moulting feathers, and splashing the fins in the wet water, took an observation.

This was the rainy day for which Captain Brand had laid by all that money to spend it in!

It was a Monday morning—Black Monday for Captain Brand—when, after divesting his leg of the clove hitch, he secured old Miguel's boat to a large stone, and then, according to his own ancient practice, he clambered with difficulty up to the verandale crag. Captain Brand had no rag either, and there was a good deal of rain falling, but yet he thought he saw a large ship, a brig, and a small schooner in the offing.

So Captain Brand scrambled down again in good deal disconcerted, knowing it would be hours and hours before those vessels would be in the island, even were they so inclined; but nevertheless he bestirred himself. Rectifying his inner man with the last half-pint of aguardiente for breakfast, which quite refreshed him, he went to work.

First, he took Miguel's copper coffee-pot, into which he emptied that disciple of the net's shark-oil jug, which Miguel himself used for a torch to attract the fish. Then, with a strip of old canvas—part of one leg to Captain Brand's drawers—to such straits was his wardrobe reduced—like a bale on the end of a stick, and a matchbox, he was all ready for Black Monday's work.

Captain Brand, however, made one important omission: he snugly stowed away his beautiful pistols in a locker of the boat to keep them dry, never having been wet but twice before in all his marine excursions—the first time at Cape Garrote, and the next when he jumped overboard from the brigantine at St. Jago. He set great store by these valuable implements, for they had done him good service in time of need. Miguel came into possession of them afterwards, and sold them almost for their weight in gold.

But, for the first time, Captain Brand forgot his personal friends and boson companions. It was a great oversight; and he was extremely sorry when it was too late to go back for them. However, with the copper oil-pot dangling from his little finger, where the sapphire once shone, and the torch-stick in the other hand, he marched boldly over the sandy ridges toward the crag.

But, Captain Brand, there had been three pairs of open eyes watching you through every mouthful of snapper you snapped, and every drop of fiery white rum you swallowed. Ay! and while you toasted your shins by the crisp bead, with the red glow of the embers of the fire lighting up your cold-blooded, wrinkled face—while, twisting your nose, you muttered He ! ho's! at murderous satisfaction—there was not a bird that swooped over you, or a lizard on the rocks with jet beads of eyes that watched you so sharply as did those attentive beholders from the crag.

And when you made your observations from the young cocoa-nut clumps, those watchers remained in concentrics of cold, grave, and there clambered through a hole in the roof of the decaying little chapel, while the other moved to the little concavity of cold, gray stone, and there scooped a place in the sand and cactus behind the one cut with the letter I.

Captain Brand meanwhile came on, picking his way through the dense cactus, which lacerated his legs, and sadly tore the remains of his loose canvas. The rain was coming in torrents, the thunder growled and crashed as the tropical storm burst over the island; and just as a vivid sheet of forked lightning seemed to divide the crag, and the awful peal that followed shook it to its base, Captain Brand stood under the window, in the cleft of the rock, and sat down to prepare for a more extended research.

His map knew him for twenty minutes; but when he again emerged the rain had ceased, the clouds were breaking away, and the gentle sea-breeze blowing while Captain Brand looked a thousand years older. He seemed to have borrowed all the million of wrinkles from his companion, in addition to his own, and his countenance, the thin lids of his frozen green—now quite solid—always had a parrot-like look about the nose, and left nothing but a stony look of horror.

What caused our brave Captain to reel and stagger as he came out of the cleft, and sink into the matted cactus, without his tattered hat, like a wolf flying from the hounds? Had he trodden on a snake, a scen ipa, a centipede, or what white finger waved him away? Yes, all three. But the interview with his one-eyed companion had shocked him more.

On he came, driving the hot, wet sand before him, toward the Padre Ricardo's chapel. There he paused for Agnes, but she was not there. A pasmodic effort that he could unclose his sheet-white lips, where his dead men had met upon them, and held his mouth together as if he had the lock-jaw, while he snorted through his nostrils.

"Ho!" he gasped, "the spying old traitor has sacked the cavern, and the gold must have been in that launch! I will go back to the wreck on the reef. Ho! the traitor has found the torture I promised him; but I would like to have killed him a little slower."

Here Captain Brand, having regained some few faculties and energy, moved on beyond the church, till he came to the coral head-stone, where he stood still.

It was his last step on deck or sand!

Shading his still horror-stricken eyes by both hands, he glared to seaward.

"Ho! ho! the rascal—my, my Yankee Commodore, with that old brig under convoy, and that pretty schooner! Reminds me of my old Scirocco. Ay! they have got my treasure, and I must begin the world anew. I am not old; hero is my strong right arm yet; and who can stop me?"

Captain Brand made these remarks in a loud tone, as if he wanted the whole world to hear him; and as if he was about to defy it, and come to a strong resolution to retrieve his misfortunes.

As he waved his strong right arm aloft, while, in imagination, blood rained from the blade of his cutlass over cheeks and eyes, he felt a sudden cold behind the back, of an unsuspecting skipper or mate, suddenly he paused, and the arm fell powerless at his side, and he looked down with loose like a pirate from a gibbet on a windy night.

He caught sight of the old broken cocos-nut trunk to which he had hitched the green silk bag, with its now worthless contents of gold and jewels, and he squirmed to prevent himself falling to the earth.

"Ho!" he choked out, his jaws rattling like dry bones, "I see it all now. The column was snapped just where the rope was hitched, and the treble mast went over in the terrible hurricane. Ho, ho! That's the way my man escaped, to dog me all over the world. Ho! I have no time to lose; I may be here at any moment."

This was the last connected speech of Captain Brand ever made in this world, or in the one to come, perhaps; for as the last word Paul Dacrunet rose in all his fiery-petted wrath before him. With folded arms he bent his dark, stern eyes upon the Pirate, wherein the revenge of twenty years was gleaming with a concentrated power.

"You palsied villain! the oath I took to you, and for which I have been accursed, expired yesterday! I took another myself, when we stood here last together; and I am come to fulfil that oath, and—strike!"

His terrible voice and words came back in an echo from the crag, and they seemed with their reverberations to pierce and shrivel the man before him into sleet. And the Pirate would have fallen had not the huge, black, iron-vice fingers grappled him about the body, pinioning his arms to his sides as if they had been bolted through and through; while at the same moment another pair of tough, sea-weed fingers wound a lashing round his straight legs, and they laid him gently down on the sandy esplanade.

"The trestle, Banou. And you, Ben, bring the bale over, while the faded old cord, and that black altar-cloth!"

The Pirate lay on his back, his eyes wide open, for he could not shut them since the lids had gone in frost—but the solid balls, light-green now in the light, rolled from side to side. He recognized the old apparatus too, though it was in different hands than those of Pedillo and his confederate; and he saw also that, though the black-green rope were rotten, yet his wonderful nautical masters taught him that it yet might have a taut strain; and that those coils of hide thongs were secured by any amount of tagging, and he saw as well that they had been recently plaited anew.

But what was to be done with that rotten, moth-eaten old cloth, which the men used to lay round on Saturday nights, in the decks, and on which the good Padre played his cards likewise in the chapel? It was not to keep the cold air away from him, or shield his half-naked body from the poisonous insects. Then what could it be for?

"Lift him up, men, and when you lash him down, leave only that little finger free!"

Ben Brown squatted himself on a stone beside the bier, and Banou, with sinews unbridled and laid on the sand, and sleeves rolled up, began his work as if he were the undertaking-mat to make for the dead-eyes of the frigate's lower rigging. And though in a hurry, still intended to make a neat job of it, with the help of a long, sharp-pointed marline-spike, too, which he wore habitually, like a talisman, round his neck, and which stood him in good stead in the intricate parts of his task.

Taking in at a glance the exact amount of work staid he required, he middled the cord, and passing each strand fair and square, his old Banou's arms worked backward and forward, under and over—sometimes pecking a little knot by accident in the Pirate's own thin hide as he passed the cord by, but the end of his marlinespike but always apologizing in his bluff, rough way, though without squirting tobacco-juice into his victim's face, as he had done in Pedillo's case.

"Beg parding, ye infarnal Pirate! but that stick will do ye no harm. It'll heal much sooner than the wounds one of ye's made in many a broider, little finger free, and there, Capting Brand, just let old Ben reward ye, good for evil, for auld-acquaintance sake!" And the old boatmate gave him with the pistol on the head, by placing this soft pillow of green silk rope under the back of the head. A little this side, so as he can look at your finger, while I pass this second piece of stuff over your ear. Don't ye look at me, ye infarnal scoundrel, or I'll let that ere copper spike slip into one of yer junk bottle brains!"

"Now," continued Ben, "I'll take a spell till the Doctor and the old nigger comes back."

Ay, the day had come, and the next over the dead-eyes of the shrouds!

During this neat and seaman-like operation Paul Dacrunet remained busy on the crag, and the flying wolf till he came to the cleft in the rock. There he picked up and lighted the torch that stalked on. Then he came to the bier once before the low cavern, and pushed his way in with the blazing torch before him. Then Paul Dacrunet had nerves, they would have shaken at what he saw; but having none to shake, he calmly fixed the torch in the sand.

There lay the head of the ancient Ignacio, caught, as he tried to creep out of the treasure chamber, by the edge of the stone door. He must have been sudden, for the stump of a paper cigar was still seated in his wrinkled lips, while the snake-like curls twined about his ears and his wavy eye still looked out with its usual suspicious intensity, and seemed to throw out a touch of fire on the features of the dead. Clinging from a coil in a slimy bed of sand before the head was a monstrous centipede, while the rusty locks stuck curved into the bread flat head, all like an ebony cane, straight, motionless, and elegant to the curved top—fascinated by that single living orb of the dead man.

The human intruder left this well-matched pair to their own venomous devices, and winding his way on to room came to the open door to the vaults. A powerful push banished in the door of the dungeon, and while the rusty bolts were still ringing on the stone pavement, Paul Dacrunet entered the treasure chamber.

He saw nothing at first save a few fragments of broken crockery and a rusty metal pot, not even a rat. But flaring the torch down upon the mouldy floor something sparkled in the light. This he snatched, and it was the long-lost locket and chain which had last rested around the baby's neck.

When the Doctor strode back to the esplanade of the chapel he found Benjamin Brown and Banou taking a friendly sip out of the jug.

"Well, Sir," said Ben, as he got on his pins and stropped on his cutlass, "there he is, Sir! and as neat a piece of cross-lashing as ever I did. He looks as if he crowed there, jist like a hawk'd till turtle-nibblin' in the ship's coppers, only he cant paddle about."

"I did it mournful, too, Sir, and tried to conserve with him in case he had any pessents to make to his friends."

"Why, Sir, and would you believe it? I offered to pour a drop of grog—seein' as it were down his tight mouth, but he never had the pertinces to thank me or ax me a question, but only looked wicked at me. Consarn him! if he had only winked, I wouldn't mind it!" said Ben, with much indignation; "but, however, I don't blieve he's any think to leave or any friends left!"

But Captain Brand, though speechless without being tongue-tied, and unable to wink, still thought. And what did that Doctor propose to do with him, as he was too far off to strike to death by insects, sand flies, musquitoes, and what not?

"Lift the trestle for the last time men, and stand it here over this thick bed of cactus, so as the little finger may touch the letter on this ere tombstone."

Now Captain Brand's doubts were relieved, and he knew what was coming. Ah, ha!

"There! that is right! Now collect stones and rocks, and wall this trestle up solid to the edge of the frame so that a hurricane can't loosen it."

Big Banou went to work now, and presently his job was done; coral rocks and large headstones of pirates, well packed down with sand, made the sides of the living tomb. Then the black pall was let down over the body, and they left the Pirate to his inevitable doom.

Soon the three executioners reached the Tigre's Trap.

"Banou! take this locket and chain—ah! you know it well—to your young master. Brown, the two thousand dollars will be paid to your and Greenlief's hands for distribution among the schooner's crew, one of you must go for it. Tell the Commodore that I shall take an old woman we have found here away with me in a chicken fisherman's boat to Kingston, and within the year I shall be at home! There! shove off my lads!"

As the gig skimmed through the Tiger's Trap Paul Dacranet, with the widow of Ignacio, sailed out by the Alligator's Mouth, and as they crossed that roaring ledge the sun rose in its unclouded glory in the West, and the young moon, with its golden crescent, looked tenderly down upon the island.

And the night passed, and the next and the next, with scorching days and burning heat; between them; while the mangrove, the palm, the cocoa-nut, and the cactus—ah! that luxuriant plant above all—bedecked up in and around bayonets two inches of a night in thorny needles as thick as pins in a paper; growing clean through the hide of ox or man like bees' wax, but hedged leaves met resistance, when turning flat side up they put forth a score for one of the cactus bayonets to make room from their own shoulder to heel one long, hopeless agony. The green sun flamed down, absorbed by the black pall of death! The moon glimmering in pale white rays of splendor through the moth-eaten cloths upon the face of the white tombstone! All the day and all the night!

Was it a dream, Captain Brand? No! A frightful reality, which left its white skin horn at every slow pulse of the heart they are aiming at? And don't you hear those dread croakings of gulls and scavengers, Brand? Ay, ay! who have left their prey on the reef to join the vultures in their feast on the shore? You may always catch the greatest enemies in the rasping jaws of the sharks, as they crowd into the inlet, and rest their cold noses on the shelly cove where you slept!

Flesh and blood, and pinions and beaks can endure in a time no longer! A cloud of carnivorous birds swoop down at last, snap the black pall in their talons and bills, and fly fighting and screaming away with it. Another cloud, richer than the rest, light upon the body, and while the needle points pierce the palpitating heart, and the keen flesh-tearers are still, clenched in fang and mortile, the eyes are picked out and the flesh in mere pieces—all, all! Nothing but the white bones is left but a hideous white skeleton with the long bony finger pointing to the letter I.

The lizards wheeled on the rocks, the alligators lashed the lagoon amidst the steaming mist of the mangrove roots; the sharks and birds returned to the reefs, the cocoa-nuts waved their tufted tops, the palms crackled in the shower and gale; and the pure inlet murmured musically on the shelly shore for ever and ever, years, over and around the deserted key, until the whitened bones mingled into dust and were borne away by the four winds of heaven.

CONCLUSION

THE hemp has been tarred and spread, the strands twisted and the rope laid up. The knots have been learned in between good sailors and bad—between pirates and men-of-warsmen—and here Harry Gringo hauls down his pennant until his readers may once again to the seas in a fine craft with a brave

The French Student's Monthly.
A magazine devoted to the use of Students of the French Language, and offering each month and at a small cost a continuous supply of new, interesting reading matter and practical exercises.
To teachers who know what an impulse is ever given to a class by the introduction of a new text-book, and who are aware of the difficulty of keeping up for months the interest of the Students in the same old-established text-books, we need scarcely point out the advantages of the monthly visit which a new compendium of study alone will prove the only possible substitute for the lessons of an experienced teacher. In fact, it will be a teacher, visiting them monthly, marking out regular lessons for each week, giving attention all them, and living explanations and hints not to be found in books, and carefully correcting their exercises.
CONTENTS OF THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER.
1. Histoire abregée de la litterature française written expressly for the French Monthly, by Prof. P. Bernard, Instructor of the French Language and Literature to the Princes of Holmonsiden, of the Royal Family of Prussia. 2. Le Cousin Pons, Scènes de la vie Parisienne, par Emile Souvestre. 3. Poésie. 4. Hints on French Pronunciation (with exercise). 5. London Assurance, by Colpelation into French (with notes). 6. The Beginner's Department. 7. Answers to Correspondents. 8. Key to Exercises (sent only to teachers and persons studying alone, on special application to the publisher).

The New American Watch.

IN ORDER TO MEET THE REQUIREMENTS OF gentlemen who prefer a thinner watch than those usually made by us, we have lately issued a new style of watch on the three-quarter plate model, especially designed for this purpose.

In establishing this new series, it has also been our design to produce a watch in every way superior to the best and highest-priced products of the most reputable of English and Swiss watch manufacturers; and no labor or expense has been spared to this end.

In all respects of fine and durable material, of external and internal finish, of accurate compensation and adjustment, of mathematically just proportions, and of practical results, our new three-quarter plate watch challenges comparison with any in the world.

ABD-EL-KADER AND THE DRUSES.

We publish herewith a portrait of the famous Algerian chieftain, Abd-el-Kader, who has made his name a household word by his noble protection of the Christians of Damascus. We also publish a graphic picture of a group of Druses.

Abd-el-Kader, who ten and fifteen years ago was well known as the gallant defender of Algeria against the French, was born in that region in the year 1807. His father was a chief—Hodji-Ould-Mahiddin: he traced his genealogy as far back as Mohammed himself. When the French first began a war of conquest in Algeria, in 1832, Abd-el-Kader took up arms against them; he was the last to lay them down, and it was only by the aid of the Emperor of Morocco that the French conquered him at last. Throughout the war he displayed the highest military and manly qualities. He was brave, indefatigable, skillful in the battle-field; wise in council; humane to his prisoners; chivalric to his enemy. A hundred times or oftener it was announced in the Paris papers that he was overcome, and finished; but the news was no sooner afloat than later intelligence announced his reappearance on some unprotected flank of the French army. It was in fighting him that all the great French Generals of our time—Bugeaud and Cavaignac, who are dead, Lamoricière, Changarnier, Pelissier, Canrobert, and others, learned the trade of war.

Many pleasant anecdotes are remembered of these never-ending Algerian campaigns. Once Abd-el-Kader wrote to King Louis Philippe, proposing an exchange of prisoners. The King made no reply. Abd-el-Kader wrote again, in these words:

"I offered to exchange my prisoners for thine. Thou hast not answered my letter. I return thy prisoners notwithstanding. I have done my duty: 'tis now for thee to do thine."

When, at last, in 1846, the gallant chief was overborne, hemmed in, and stripped of most of the force which had rendered him so terrible, he wrote to Lamoricière:

ABD-EL-KADER.

"I have struggled long enough. I might still escape to the desert, but I see that God does not approve my enterprise. If thou hast the will and the power to send me into the East, as thou didst once propose, I will surrender. Conduct me thither."

General Lamoricière agreed to these terms, and the chieftain gave himself up to the French. The Duke d'Aumale, Louis Philippe's son, who was Governor of Algeria, ratified the bargain, and Abd-el-Kader, like another Jugurtha, was conducted to France, en route for the East. Unhappily for the honor of the French nation, Louis Philippe had too little honesty to stand by the bargain. Instead of sending Abd-el-Kader to the East he kept him a prisoner at Toulon, and set guards to watch his movements. It was reserved for the present Emperor to set the noble chief free after five years' confinement. On the 2d December, 1852, the day the empire was proclaimed, the Emperor sent to Abd-el-Kader and told him that, in compliance with the broken promise of the Duke d'Aumale, a French ship of war was ready to convey him to the East. The chief went first to Brousse; thence he soon after removed to Damascus, where he has ever since resided.

His recent conduct has been above all praise; he well deserves the cross of the Legion of Honor which the Emperor has just sent him. We published, in our last number but one, the letter in which he described the massacre of Damascus.

Of the Druses we have written a good deal of late. We may add here a brief memorandum derived from the records of a careful traveler:

The Druses occupy the southern section of the Chain of Lebanon, their great strong-holds being round Jezzin and Muktarah, and in the valley of Baruk. They also abound in the villages of the eastern and western declivities of Hermon. Their numbers have been estimated at about 78,000. They are more a political than a religious body. At all events, their religion is of an accommodating nature, and they are ready in the widest sense to "become all things to all men" that their own ends might be served. Their tenets are veiled in much obscurity, and many of their rites and ceremonies are unintelligible. So far as their profession of faith is known, it consists of the following propositions: 1. The unity of God and his manifestation of himself to man in the persons of several individuals, the last of whom was Hakin. 2. Five superior spiritual ministers always existing. These have also appeared in the persons of men at various periods. The chief of them is Hamza and Christ. 3. The immortality of the soul. The souls of men never pass into animals. 4. The belief in a period when their religion shall be triumphant. 5. The seven months of Lhamb are abolished, and the following substituted: Veracity (to each other), mutual protection and aid, renunciation of all other religious profession, the unity of God, contentment with his works, submission to his will, separation from those in error, and from demons.

Their places of worship are usually in remote but conspicuous spots—most of them on the summits of hills. Any other privacy is the rule.

They are not so numerous as the Maronites, but they are far more warlike. When at peace they are industrious and hospitable, but in war they are noted for their daring ferocity.

HOW TO RECEIVE THE PRINCE.

IT is now settled that the Prince of Wales is to be in New York before the middle of October, and it is also settled that instead of a dinner he is to receive a public ball at the Academy of Music on the 12th of that month. The ball is to be given by the committee appointed at the citizens' meeting held a fortnight since; it consists of fifty or sixty of the richest, oldest, and most respectable men in the city, and there is no doubt they will do the thing handsomely. It has been remarked that there is not a mechanic, or a farmer, or an operative on the list of names. There was, of course, no intention to slight any class by selecting the committee exclusively from that section of our people which is sometimes termed "the aristocracy." The idea was to choose men who could not only give weight to the reception by their influence, but could afford to pay for an entertainment of the most expensive character; and as the number both of committee men and guests was necessarily limited, those were selected who could fulfill these conditions.

At the same time the ball will not be the only public testimonial of respect to the Prince. The firemen are to give a torch-light parade in the Mayor's expense; the military will be reviewed; the British residents will probably give a private reception, if the Prince will accept it. There is no reason why the "thew and sinew" of the people should not adopt some plan to testify their good-will toward the future sovereign of our most intimate ally. A grand popular demonstration in the Central Park or Jones's Woods, with a hundred thousand intelligent and well-behaved people assembled in his honor, would be a sight which could not fail to please the Prince, and would be an event not without political significance. Such a celebration would not be costly, and would have the great advantage of securing a holiday in the pleasantest season of the year to our overworked operatives. In future years the picture of a hundred thousand honest New York faces, lit up with a kindly welcome to this young stranger, could hardly be forgotten; and might, some day or other have its effect on the policy of England toward the United States.

BULLS AND BEARS.

PEOPLE who live far from Wall Street attach a mysterious and somet imes an awful signification to the terms "bulls" and "bears," which figure in the reports of the doings in that naughty place—the Stock Exchange. It is only the knowing ones who understand that both are gentlemen, often gentlemen of the bulls buyers of stocks in the hope that they will rise, and the bears sellers for future delivery, hoping that they will fall. Both of course "talk the market" to suit their operations. A bull sees every thing prosperous around him, and serene in the future; to a bear the future is pregnant with chaos and trouble, and ruin.

There are bulls and bears on Wall Street, who would perhaps be surprised to hear themselves thus designated. The world is, in fact, full of bulls and bears; we are all of us either one or the other. The hopeful man who puts his money into new enterprises—builds houses and ships, and railroads—founds lyceums, and establishes debating societies, is a bull; he who sees in the future railroads ruined, ships wrecked, houses untenanted, lyceums deserted, and dull debates at "the Athenæum," and who therefore will have nothing to do with them, is a bear. The one is a type of enterprise; the other of caution. Both are useful men in their way. Jones, who takes a sanguine view of every thing—who headed the subscription for the new church—who paid the schooling of that orphan, in the belief that "the little chap had something in him"—who took stock in the new bank—who would try the new steam-plow—who owns a share in the Atlantic Telegraph, and believes in the flying-machine Mr. Jones, of course, is a bull beyond conversion; yet what could we do without him? Smith, again, who doubts his living to see the Atlantic really moves—foresaw the failure of the Erie Railroad, and, by his advice, induced old Mrs. Timpkins to sell out and save her little property—doubted the success of the proposed canal, and defeated the scheme which every body now sees would have been folly—denounced the Bloomer costume as a intolerable invention —stood manfully by the Constitution when his fellow-citizens were crazy for new reforms—didn't believe in Walker, and now points over his ticklish position—never encouraged inventors, whom he regards as lunatics and impostors—expects the country yourself to end in a general smash. Louis Napoleon to be assassinated, the English to be driven out of India, Garibaldi to be defeated and hanged, and all the New York banks to fail next Monday morning —Smith is a very sad bear; but is he not useful in his day and generation? It is hard to say whether we could spare Smith more than Jones. Without the one we should make no progress at all; but without the other we should "go to smash" once a year.

There are other bulls and bears whose domain is moral. Old Grump is a moral bear. He is a saloon, sour-faced man with a scowl. He don't believe in virtue. He sees no purity, or disinterestedness, or charity, or truth. He sneers at the idea of virtuous women, who, he says, have merely been cursed by opportunity. "My motto is," says he, "that you must consider all men as rogues till you have tested them; and when you have found a man to be an honest man make up your mind that you are a fool, and that he has deceived you." He calls all donations of money for charitable purposes disguised advertisements. He thinks the great merchant, S.—— opened soup-kitchens for the poor in the famine times, Grump went about denouncing him as a man of ostentation. His opinion of our statesmen is that they are all rogues, and he never votes for fear, as he says, he helping one of them to a place under the public. He never trusts any man's word, regarding all as liars except a few fools who don't know enough to lie. Grump is a moral bear, and we don't envy his condition of mind.

Old Cheerface is a moral bull. He is a fat, cheerful, jovial soul. He believes what every body says, and is accordingly much victimized by sharpers; perhaps, however, he is no unhappier on discovering the fraud practiced on him than Grump was in detecting it beforhand. He believes that we have a great deal more now as they had in the olden time; yes, Sir, and as good men in every calling. He subscribes to no end of charities, and goes away with a laugh when his friends tell him he is throwing away his money. He never passes a beggar without giving him a penny. He is an impostor, but what if he isn't, Sir? He trusts his people and the tradesmen with whom he deals; it is really so easy to be deceived by those who know him never try. They feel that he believes them to be honest, and whether they are or no, they endeavor to justify the belief. He never doubted Archbishop Hughes, or Miss Nightingale's self-denial, or Webster's patriotism, or Carmichan's surgical skill, or O'Connor's knowledge of law, or Bayard Taylor's veracity. He don't think the world is coming to an end, and he don't say that things were all better managed when he was young. He buys all love him, and call him "an old trump."

Reader, gentle reader, are you bull or bear?

REGISTRATION OF MARRIAGES.

IT is understood that the priests of the Roman Catholic Church follow the example of the Archbishop, and refuse to communicate to the City Inspector of Marriages the list of baptisms and, we presume, also the baptisms and burials at which they officiate. They, like the prelate, justify their refusal by oher the law by stating that, in their case, a compliance with it in injunctions would involve a violation of a sacred trust reposed in them, and would disclose to the world secrets which they have received in confidence on the parties concerned. In other words, they say that they have frequently to marry people who are living in a state of concubinage and wife, and whom the world supposed to have been married long since; likewise to baptize children who are illegitimate.

The defense is a poor compliment to the morals of the Roman Catholic laity. We should not have supposed that concubinage was so common among the Roman Catholics that decency forbade the publication of a record of their marriages and deaths. This, however, is a matter which the Catholics must settle with their own people. The probability is, that the Archbishop objects to register the marriages he performs, not from a fear of offending decency or feeding scandal, but because the Roman Catholic Church does not recognize as valid marriages celebrated by Protestant clergymen. When a Catholic girl marries a Protestant in a Protestant Church, she is held by the Romish Church to be living in concubinage until she has been remarried by a Catholic priest. A publication of marriages, such as the law requires, would reveal this fact to him. But the Archbishop foresees, and wisely seeks to escape so unpleasant a discovery.

However all this may be, it is quite enough to observe that a marriage register is absolutely necessary to civilization. It is a part, and one of the most valuable parts, of that census which all civilized nations take at periodical intervals. It is the best known key to social progress and material prosperity; for, as every one knows, the wealth, intelligence and health invariably increases with general prosperity, and decline in hard times. Above all, it is the only true safeguard against endless litigation regarding inheritances; the only certain protection for legitimate heirs; the only reliable means of establishing legitimate descent and family relationships. And Archbishop Hughes's pen, shields, registers of marriages, or allow them to be kept by irresponsible priests, and our census will be defective in a most essential particular; we shall be unable to apply the best of all tests to the progress of our national prosperity; and no man will be able to prove incontestably his legitimacy or his legal right to his father's inheritance.

We do not think the public are prepared to go as far as this to oblige his Grace. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the effect of his ill-timed opposition to a perfectly sensible law—a law, likewise, which has for years been thoroughly carried out, not only in Protestant England but in Catholic France—will simply be to secure the repeal of a very useful next session of the Legislature, substituting imprisonment for the fine which is now the penalty of non-compliance with the legal requirement. The people of the State of New York will submit to a good deal for peace' sake; but they are not quite prepared to let priests of any denomination defy the laws which they choose to obey, and the laws which they choose to break.

Perhaps by the time the Legislature meets the wealthy Catholics of New York will have paid up some more money toward the New Cathedral the Archbishop is building. In this event we entertain a hope that his Grace will be found less uncompromising in his resistance to the law, and less zealous for martyrdom. The appeal for money followed so very close on the appeal for persecution that one can not help thinking they were not wholly disconnected in the archiepiscopal mind.

THE LOUNGER.

II. R. H.

THE Prince is to come to New York, but he will not dine with us; he will only dance. Well, we have had princes before. The Prince de Joinville came in la belle Poule, and he danced with us, and made us happy. The Emperor Napoleon and princes Joseville, as he was familiarly called by Gunnybags and his cronies, was only the younger son of a citizen-king of the French. But this is the time that shall be. This is the dauphin of Great Britain.

In one of his recent letters, which, to parody Willis's title, might properly be called "letters from under the Table," the excellent Mr. Jenkins mentions that the Prince, whom he so loudly applauded but a short time before for resting his partners frequently, "may send them home" and the purposes of the dance, he turns his back and leaves them to find their parents or guardians as best they can. This action is not described in the descriptive style. To say that a gentleman and ladies for the purposes of the dance is neither to hoof nor so elegant a mode of expression as to say that a gentleman dances with them. If Mr. Jenkins will permit a kindly word of advice, he would do well to be a little more circumspect in what he describes the great toll at the Academy.

He is probably aware that the etiquette of court circles is somewhat different from that of the severe republican simplicity with which he is more familiar. When Queen Victoria, a royal prince, having surveyed the company, sends a page to signify to the lady whose appearance pleases him that the gentleman will dance with her. The royal wish dissolves all other engagements. It would be a sad breach of propriety should the lady hesitate or refuse. If, like monsieur, Mr. Jenkins is passing a few days in London, and the Queen, hearing of it, hastens to summon him to dine at Buckingham Palace, he should understand, as his friends the Marquis of Westminster and Earl Derby would probably inform him, that a royal invitation is a command; and that although he may have engaged to take a chop at "Joe's" with his friends Mr. John Thomas, he must excuse himself to Mr. Thomas, and dine with the Queen. Royalty is an exception to all rules. Nothing would seem more impolite and snobbish to a natural sense of propriety and good feeling than that a man should break his engagement to dine with a poor and obscure family to assume a rich and famous one had afterward invited him for the same day. But "good" is not the test of manners. The whole system of courts and etiquette is founded upon an artificial, and not a natural, superiority. There was probably never a more ignorant and unprincipled and selfish man in what is called "good society" than George the Fourth. Yet George the Fourth was known as the first gentleman in Europe.

Dear Mr. Jenkins, don't misunderstand. To speak in your own favorite style, "a prince as is a prince" will be also a gentleman; and every thing comprises to make us all believe the Prince of Wales to be in that category. We all reserve our kind regards for him, and for him at the Ball. Doubtless the Montreal affair was very well. But when the Gunnybagges take matters in hand, you are never sure, Mr. Jenkins, that it is a very different thing.

OF THE MILDER TYPES OF POVERTY.

HALF a million of dollars is at least a comfortable competency. With the income of that sum judiciously expended, the sharper trials of poverty may be avoided. Indeed the great majority of men would gladly compromise their chances of ten millions hereafter for half a million paid down. If they had invented any useful machinery—if they could secure the right to use it, and to sell it all over the world in any way, and to the utmost end, "I will give you half a million of dollars and cry quits," the proposition of men would have joyfully answered, "Quits."

But Mr. Howe of the sewing machines has no idea of cry quits. He pocketed a very useful invention. It greatly enhanced the value of the machines; it created new forms of labor, furnished more employment, etc., etc. The time drew near for the expiration of the privilege. "I want it renewed," says Mr. Howe of the sewing machines. "Hallo! haven't I paid you half a million dollars for your invention?" cries the world. "Yes; but that is not enough. It is not proportioned to the value of my improvements," says Mr. Howe of the sewing machines.

His reply is natural enough, and raises the whole question—when is an inventor adequately paid by society for his invention? If it be really a service to the inventor, by saving him many days of life, either directly or indirectly, then, of course, you can not make an exact statement, because there is no relation between life and money. We must look for an answer elsewhere.

Inventions are the talent of all men: men that compose it. To foster and develop that talent it rewards it with fame or honor, with money, or with both. But the reward is not given to the mind upon the individual, and therefore society properly holds that when the fruits of talent have been reasonably rewarded the tax which society has to yield. This is the philosophy of the limitation of patent and copyright laws. They assume, at bottom, the heyrisity of the individual inventor, and assume that he is willing that society at large shall enjoy the benefit of his talent after it has liberally paid him for every article he buys. So long as the maker of a machine must add to its cost the expense of every improvement, so long, of course, it is dearer to the purchaser. And therefore the government lessens the cost of manufacture, the tax of the patent is diminished. That tax is properly paid by society because his invention is considered useful: but how useful society itself must decide.

"I have you hundred dollars work," says the child to his mother. It is an amusing standard, because affection can not be so valued. "I love your invention five hundred thousand dollars worth," says society to Mr. Howe of the sewing machines. But on a valuation of millions, what will Mr. Howe of the sewing machines? Please to be content with riches. Please to remove this tax from the working class. If we had made only a million of dollars, or ten thousand, or fifty, or a hundred, you might declare that your profit was not proportioned to the time of the manufacturers. But you have two thousand dollars! Oh, Mr. Howe of the sewing machines!

PRIVATE VS. PUBLIC LIFE.

THE recent retirement to private life of one of the most prominent public men of the country, the Hon. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, has created attention to the subject of the pecuniary value of public offices in this country.

The rate of living with us is constantly increasing, but the salary of public men remains fixed, and only slowly changes. It has frequently to be understood, that, for an eminent lawyer to accept a seat upon the bench, or for any adequately remunerated man to go to Congress, or to the State Legislature, implies a very serious reduction of his income. In other words, the State is a poor paymaster. Let it, by liberality, become a rich and pound-foolish?

The theory is, that public office must not be so pecuniarily profitable as to make it sought by venal men for the sake of its salary. The fact is, that if it be not pecuniarily profitable it will be avoided by competent incumbents, and will be held by men who will indirectly and dishonestly make a profit out of it.

For instance, in this State even a Lounger can not be deaf to the indignant protest against the increase of the Legislature's expenses. All the parties profess to want clean men in the next Assembly. All the papers call upon the people to attend the primary meetings. Let us believe them for a moment. Let us concede that we are all virtuously interested in the nominations to the Legislature. Now then—

"Mr. Chairman, I nominate Mr. Demosthenes Green as a representative from the fifty-eighth district."

The motion is seconded. Mr. D. Green is nominated by acclamation. What does he say? His says, "Gentlemen, my business gives me from four to ten thousand dollars a year. I respectfully decline." If I play truant I lose it. You ask me to spend more than a third of the year in Albany, for which you agree to pay me three hundred dollars. No, I thank you."

The Convention naturally asks him if he is not willing to do so much for his country? If patriotism does not inspire him to sacrifice, etc., etc.? Mr. Demosthenes Green answers No. And what is the result? That, with few exceptions, men are sent whom any great speculator feels no fear in approaching with a bribe.

Besides, why should a State expect to be served upon more favorable terms than individuals? As an employer, you know that you must pay the best wages for the best service. If you want a good book-keeper, or foreman, or artist of any kind, you must give a liberal salary. Why should you not expect that accomplished men would keep your books from motives of pure brotherly love, as well as that they should serve on the Legislature, from patriotism? And to bring it to a point, if it be the interest of a banking company to put the highest salaries to its officers, is it not quite as much the interest of a State to do the same thing?

It is very clear that, as a rule, we shall never see the ablest and most practical men in public office, except in times of great public emergency, until the establishment some solution to the importance of the service. Nor ought we to expect to find them there in great crises, because, however willing and anxious they may be to serve, it will take a long time to master the corruption at Washington, and inevitably creep in where efforts are despised, and are sought only by venal men for venal ends.

NOTE TO THE FOREGOING.

THERE will probably always be plenty of people willing to take office. It is not a question of quantity but of quality. When Mr. Buchanan was elected President, a gentleman who had worked for him went to Washington with his pockets full of letters for General Cass, the Secretary of State. He called at the Department and presented his letter to the Secretary. "They are entirely satisfactory, Sir," said the gentleman, reluctantly. "I see that you are an applicant for the consulship at Genoa."

"Yes, Sir," replied the applicant; "I thought I should probably have no difficulty in securing so unimportant a post."

"Perhaps, Sir," said the Secretary, "you would like to see the list of applicants for the Genoa consulship?"

The gentleman opened his eyes.

"List of applicants! I supposed that nobody else would have thought it worth while to—"

"Here, Sir," interrupted the Secretary, "here is the list. The names are numbered. You observe there are already twenty-five hundred. I shall have the pleasure in entering your name in order."

The gentleman with the satisfactory letters was confounded.

"No, no, thank you, Sir," he replied, decisively. "I beg you will withdraw my name. I will take my letters if you please, Sir, and wish you good-morning. Good-morning, Sir."

"THE WOMAN IN WHITE."

THIS remarkable novel, which has been published serially in the Weekly since last November, is now completed and published with copious illustrations. The name fabulous portrayal of character which was shown in Mr. McLenan's designs for the "Dead Secret," and "Lady," is displayed in those for "The Woman in White," and reveal a very rare talent for pictorial characterization. The author indeed could not more amply define his personages than the artist. The tale is told to the eye as well as to the mind, and Mr. McLenan may be honestly congratulated upon his creations. Count Fosco and Mr. Fairlie will live in the public mind as he has drawn them.

The story itself is one of absorbing interest and masterly skill. The profound interest of the reader is awakened at the opening, and is kept alive and more intently to the close. Perhaps the greatest triumph of the work is that, excepting at the consummation, there is not a love in the book—that is to say, no love-making. The hero is Count Fosco, and he is as distinct a creation as Mr. McLenan makes him. But Count Fosco is a man of action.

Mr. Wilkie Collins's previous stories, good as they were, had not prepared the public for so remarkable a work as "The Woman in White." In plot, in characterization, in treatment, it is altogether admirable.

RURAL.

WAS it not Mr. Downing who said that there were twenty thousand country places in England finer than the finest country-places in this country? At least some competent authority said something like that. Since the death of Mr. Downing, however, there have been such improvements in the direction which so profoundly interested him that all his statements and practical conclusions as to these affairs and the interest and changes in country life must be regarded as purely historical. Nothing shows this so strikingly than the fact that the old editing Downing's "Landscape Garden" last year, Mr. Sargent added the substance of a little volume, which was meant to bring the work up to the level of the public interest and information in rural science and life.

The suburbs of all our chief cities are now filled with beautiful places, upon which wealth and skill do their utmost, and there are certain regions which have been long famous for rural elegance. Brookline, near Boston; the banks of the North River, and of the Delaware (the South River); the neighborhood of Philadelphia—these are covered with places so costly and fine that, if England have twenty times more, England must indeed be wonderfully inspired of late years.

But there is a fault and disadvantage of our places—at least, in the Northern part of the country—in which peculiar attention is paid to the aesthetics of rural cultivation; and that old thing is that they are new. They are made in comparatively late years. Money and skill can do much, but they can not hurry trees. They may plant, protect, and foster them in every way; but time only brings splendid oaks, elms, chestnuts, hickories. That only gives a certain mellowness and character to a country place, as it gives tone to a picture or mellowness to wine. It is not the perfectly lined and rolled avenue, nor the rare exotics, nor the new shrubs, nor the mossy lawn, about which constitute the highest charm. In fact, part of the difficulty in the impression of our places is this absolute accuracy and nervous care. It makes them a little stiff. There is a touch of the parvenu in it all—a kind of Californian opulence, as of yesterday. The gold, as it were, is too new—too shiny. The gentleman's hat, and gloves, and clothes are too recently from the accomplished and quiet hands of the valet and shop-boy. It is not always so. That kind of easy carelessness is wanting which comes from hereditary habit of possession. A little dog-eared book, a little worn coat, if you could get them—and it is certainly very hard to get them—are to be got, except at a cost of a hundred years of growth—would be the very thing to make your place perfectly elegant. It is a matter of feeling. Lord Byron's mother used to call her dear Beau Nash was not a gentleman, but the slouching Prince Charlie was.

It is very much the fashion to walk in one of the finest places of this kind. There the eye runs very ancient and lofty, and grouped with natural grace. There were no cheesing, hideous, and hideous in abundance, and other trees in due order. There was an old-fashioned garden, with quaint box-edging with aloes, stiff and straight parterres of flowers—for in such a place that quaint regularity is de rigueur. Old-fashioned flowers, which could not have been surprised to meet the ladies of Louis Fourteenth's Versailles, the level lawn, cut with paths, dotted with old trees, and there, stretched away under the expansive arms of chestnuts and oaks. New turns brought new reaches into view, edged with rhododendrons, beds of rich shrubs, and leading on to the stained marble basins of fountains. We stopped and gathered ripe fruit from espaliers, and enjoyed the effect with a de rigueur. Of course, all this

MR. WILLIAM WALCUTT.

We publish herewith a portrait of Mr. William Walcutt, the sculptor of the Perry Monument, of which we publish an engraving on another page. Mr. Walcutt's modesty is such that we are only able to say of him that he was born at Columbus, Ohio, and that he studied in Europe. His work, however, which is one of the finest monuments in the country, speaks so eloquently for him that nothing further is needed.

MARKHAM'S REVENGE.

"Consequences are unpitying."—GEORGE ELIOT.

CHAPTER I.

"CLARA's sister in India!" muttered Markham. "What's Colonel Vincent's wife!" exclaimed his companion. "Isn't she handsome? Every body's mad about her. But what's the matter, Markham? You positively shiver in this fiery furnace. Ague, my boy?"

"No, it's constitutional."

"Would you like to be introduced?"

"After this dance. You find a partner; I'll sit down."

The scene was quite novel to Markham. An English ball with oriental accessories; active dancing beneath the fly of the punkas to the music of a regimental band of natives; native servants flitting about; two or three native gentlemen in rich costumes, with an affectation of European manners on the surface, and oriental depreciation of women in their sensual souls, casing in wonderment at the activity of the dancers. But the scene which was called up in Markham's mind by the sight of Mrs. Vincent was far away in England six years back. A summer moon shining through dark poplars, which shadowed a garden-wall; heavy jessamine and sickly in the sultry evening; then the lightest footsteps, but quite audible to his anxious ears—promises, and vows, and passionate utterance, sorrow in the present, but hope in the future, and then the interview sternly broke in upon with angry words.

"Now, Markham, come and be introduced."

"Thank you, some other time."

"But I've asked her, and she says she will be very happy to make your acquaintance."

Markham was forced to acquiesce.

There was a circle of admirers around the queen of the hall.

"Who's that native?" exclaimed Markham to his companion. "I'd fell a man to the ground who stared at a woman like that."

"Bless you, that's the Rajah of ——; he's the best fellow in the world—gives such jolly hunting parties; quite a marvel in the way of civilization; reads all sorts of poetry; knows Tom Moore by heart."

"But his cursed stare?"

"Pooh! it's the way these chaps have. Nobody's speaking to her now. Come along."

"Mr. Markham—Mrs. Vincent."

He stood before her perfectly self-possessed, but she was evidently taken by surprise; his name must have escaped her when the introduction was requested.

"This is unexpected—an old friend!" she exclaimed. Then in a whisper, "an old friend, Mr. Markham, notwithstanding the past—Colonel, an old friend from England!" and she introduced Markham to her husband.

"Mr. Markham!" said the Colonel. "I have much honor—the engineer of the —— line?"

"The same, Sir."

The Colonel dabbled in speculation; the Colonel was delighted to make Markham's acquaintance; his poor house was at Markham's service while he remained at the station. The Colonel drew Markham out of the circle to have some special conversation on railway topics; the circle closed again to listen to Mrs. Vincent's brilliant sallies and repartee, but she had become silent and pensive.

When she had heard of Markham last Markham had gone to Canada. Why in the countless chances of life should he and she meet at this time in India? Why should the error of her life have been thus brought vividly before her? Was this a mockery to repentance? Yet why repentance at this particular season?—repentance timing itself with the newest salve from England, and the whirl of the dancers. How the heaviness and depression of the mind darkens passing events! The vague rumors of that dreadful affair at Meerut—was that merely an isolated occurrence arising out of special circumstances? The Colonel said so—the Colonel and all the officers were fully confident in the devotion and loyalty of the regiment; she had believed them implicitly; but now her mind was filled with terrible doubt. What if these natives should prove utterly false? Why she and all around her were treading on smouldering fire. She must speak to the Colonel; where was he? She raised her eyes; the circle which had been round her gradually dispersed, all, save one, that Rajah of ——. She was perfectly accustomed to that repulsive mystery of expression which marks the oriental type; but when his eyes chanced to meet hers, there was something so terribly repulsive in the gaze that she trembled and turned pale—in another moment deep crimson mantled her countenance; she left her seat and hurried to the Colonel, who was still standing talking to Markham. Placing her arm in his, she whispered:

"Let us go home now."

"It's early yet, my love."

The Colonel was deep in the share market, and anxious for further conversation with Markham.

"But I don't feel quite well, pray come. Good-night, Mr. Markham, we shall meet again soon."

"Certainly," said the Colonel, "Mr. Markham has promised to dine with us to-morrow."

Markham bowed. . . . . .

"To-morrow!"

As it will be at the end of the world, so it was at many of those stations in India. The sun rose on the ordered strength of human system, and, behold! all that men trusted in and clung to shrunk in a moment from their grasp.

They did meet again very soon, Mrs. Vincent and Markham—a speedy transition from the amenities of society to grim strife for life and death—dragged from her own home; but he had rescued her, driven her—clinging desperately to him—through a hundred dangers.

Whither now? Bewildered by unknown roads, beneath a burning sun and fiery gusts of parching wind, the hard-held rein growing looser and looser in the hand. Still she kept urging him to hurry on—on, from a fear worse than death that possessed her soul. But the brave horse, wounded and worn out, fell at last.

This flight from the land of Death, so terribly real, yet growing more and more into the semblance of a frightful dream—the clogged effort to escape, and the sense of an irresistible doom creeping slowly onward.

There was a native hut near the road. It appeared tenantless. He half carried her—half dragged her to it. The place was quite bare, save some rough planking at one end, which formed a rude couch. It afforded shelter from the sun, not from the heat, still it gave them breathing-time.

Oh that fearful heat! Though she had lived three years in India, she never before felt its full force untempered by the appliances of man.

Neither spoke for a while. Profound silence reigned around them—silence more awful than the din and clamor from which they had fled. Inaction, more terrible than the sharp struggle that had saved them from death. Inaction, which allowed the mind to realize silence—as it were Heaven-husbed for a last confession and prayer.

The chances were terribly against escape. Markham saw that clearly, and yet even to surprise, he had never in his life known his mind more perfectly composed and capable of exact thought. He was constitutionally brave, and his mental powers were never fully developed until he stood face to face with difficulty. For different her condition. Her husband had just fallen in his brave attempt to appeal to the men, but in the terror of the present there was no room for that sorrow in her mind. Life or death? Life, was to fall alive into the rebels' hands; Death, was to die unforgiven by those she had wronged most.

"Markham, have you any ammunition left?"

"We must give up all hopes of resistance against numbers," he replied, quietly.

"But the ammunition?"

"Only one barrel loaded! If more than three attacks us I have determined to throw the pistol away. Perhaps I should act differently were I alone; but it would only exasperate them against you."

"One barrel loaded!" she murmured—then was silent. A terrible resolution was forming in her mind.

She looked steadfastly at him. "Is there any hope of escape, Markham?"

"Very little hope, if we are pursued."

"How calm you are, Markham—I'm—"

"Do you think my life has been so very happy, Pauline, that I should be quite unnerved by the approach of death?"

"Does that old affection for my sister linger yet? I fancied you were so ambitious."

"It formed the very base of my ambition. I have worked for riches, because there is a sense of power in me which urges me on, but I have worked careless of reward and honor."

"Can you forgive her, Markham?"

"I have forgiven her since I entered this hut."

"Oh! Markham, at this last hour, can you forgive me also?" She flung herself at his feet. "I induced her to marry that man."

"You had every right, as her sister, fairly to advise. The blame was hers in yielding."

"Markham, the blame was mine—I deceived her—laid me, but I must speak now. I was horribly tempted. Our family was very poor for the station we held. That rich man loved her, and if she married him it opened a path of affluence to us all. And you were poor and unknown then. My father was fearfully involved—but God forbid I should try to hide my guilt. I was cursed with the thirst for affluence and worldly position."

"But those letters I wrote her—they were placed in a secret spot known to us alone."

"Markham—I tracked her there—oh mercy!" An exulting yell outside showed that the pursuers had discovered the buggy and dead horse.

She fell back terror-stricken, but he drew her forward, holding her in the grasp of a vice.

"Quick with your confession!"

"I took the letters away one by one—we urged her to consent to the address of Mr. Manson—"

"Well?"

"But she refused steadfastly. At last she did find a letter there—"

"My letter?"

"No—a letter from you which said the engagement must cease."

He let her fall from his grasp. The calm of his soul was gone. "My God! to die now, and for Clara never to know the truth."

Terror at the approaching danger overcame all her other feelings. Fascinated, she crawled up to the window of the hovel, and gazed out. She saw, even at the distance, the expression on that countenance which had caused her such horror the night before. In a minute or two more their refuge would be discovered.

"I dare not ask your forgiveness, Markham, but grant me one prayer. Life to me is more frightful than death. When they come"—she pointed significantly to the revolver. "I never fired a pistol in my life; my own hand might fail me at the last."

He was silent.

"As you hope for salvation hereafter."

"I shall take vengeance with my own hand?"

"No, Markham; the act would be the token of your forgiveness. Swear!" she cried, in an agony of supplication, "and then I can pray in peace."

"I swear!" said Markham.

It was a terrible effort, but he conquered in the end; and he spoke the full truth and purpose of his heart when he uttered, in a low, firm tone, "Pauline, I forgive you."

She raised her head for a moment, and pressed his hand to her lips. "Then God will forgive me. I am absolved from my guilt. I can die in peace." She bent her head again in prayer.

Markham had become quite calm again. He carefully examined the loaded barrel; with a firm hand he raised the hammer and gently lowered it, so as to press the cap more securely on the nipple.

And they waited the end in peace.

WILLIAM WALCUTT THE SCULPTOR.—(PHOTOGRAPHED BY RUDER, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.)

"NOW, MARKHAM, COME AND BE INTRODUCED."

"YOU HAVE FORGIVEN ME, MARKHAM!"

CHAPTER II.

"You have forgiven me, Markham?"

The coast of England was in sight. From the time they left that hovel, rescued by a body of irregular cavalry, through their slow and dangerous journey down to Calcutta—through all the dull monotony of the long sea voyage—he had never referred to her confession. It was this silence which oppressed her; it would have been so much more endurable to have talked upon the subject. She often tried to lead the conversation up to the point; but he invariably turned it off, and until the present moment she had not found courage to approach it directly.

Yet she knew full well what he felt.

In long watchings beside his bed, through that dangerous fever which he had at Calcutta, she had often heard him, in the intensity of the delirium, cry her sister's name, till the very sound of it like a sharp sword. One evening, as she stood before him, he had started up in his bed, and gazing wildly in her face, and clasping her hands with his burning grasp, he had uttered in incoherent words his joy that Clara had come back to him at last.

This was the violent upheaving of nature pouring forth the deep feelings of the heart like molten lava; but when returning strength succeeded the delirium, beneath which those feelings were hidden away.

She would sit for hours and watch him in his fitful sleep. She knew he must always hate her; yet she liked to feel that he rested in her care, even as a helpless child. The vital energy was wasted from his face; the strong arm she had clung to in that terrible fight was very weak and powerless, and the hands were nervelss which had freed her from the ruffian's grasp—and yet he looked so noble in his weakness.

What was this feeling at her heart?

Was it conscience prompting her to make full preparation for the past?

She felt that was not the true reply; and then she would start in terror from his bedside. The thought was so fearful. What if Love should be his own avenger?

The physician her needy pursets had taught her in her youth—that love was a fiction, marriage a result of worldly calculation—was growing into an utter falsehood. It had all seemed very true when she made the excellent match which had been so cleverly devised for her, and she had lived quite contentedly in the enjoyment of her wealth and worldly position.

Yet what have remained to her the sorrowful recollection of that brave husband, who died a noble death, which might deliver her from this fatal fascination, if she strove to love his memory as she had never dreamed of loving him when living.

Then she forgot his soldier's habit of sternness; forgot that his cold sympathy had never existed between them, and dwelt only on his kind indulgence, which had been bestowed upon her as upon a child, unguilty as to the utmost. Yet, after all, they twain were only parties to a contract—beauty for wealth. She had acted her part faithfully as a wife, but he had never been asked to accept a heart given. There was no deliverance for her in all this. Whatever duties were left unfulfilled, and love—first love, with all its intensity—first love to be met with shuddering and endured with sorrow. In her sister's name which he uttered with his unconscious lips as she smoothed his pillow with trembling hands, and drew aside the ruffled hair from his burning brow.

But she had saved his life! there was comfort in that. The doctors all said that her careful nursing had availed more than their skill; and though, they marveled at the way she had, as it were, instinctively felt the slightest changes in his condition. At last they said the sea voyage, at all hazard, was the only hope of saving him. It lightened her heart for the moment to be told she could control that money could procure in the fitting up of his cabin. He was carried on board on a couch, too weak to know of the arrangements that had been made.

There was a change for the better from the first day of his being at sea; yet his progress toward recovery was very slow. In the depth of her heart she was glad at this; for the more service she could render, the more the load on her soul was eased; it likewise prolonged her privilege to be near him, for felt, when he was fully recovered, that the past must be an everlasting bar between them. She felt convinced of this, yet she hoped against that conviction—sadly hoped.

He had not entirely recovered his strength: his cheeks were still thin and pale. She knew it was only the gradual action of the setting sun which flushed his face, as he sat near the bulwark, gazing on the last sunset of the voyage. She might justly claim her right of care a little longer: he had no friends near Liverpool. He must remain at her sister's house till his health was perfectly restored. She was too blind to see that she had no right to take him to her sister's house. It was the only means she could think of retaining him near her.

"The captain tells me we shall be at Liverpool early to-morrow," said she, addressing him timidly. These were the words, thought of so long before, escaped her at the moment; she could only add, abruptly,

"You have forgiven me, Markham?"

At her last words he turned from the sunset, and looked steadily in her face.

"I have forgiven you," he said, compassionately. "I fear your greatest effort will be to forgive yourself."

"I shall never be able to do that."

"I am bound in deep gratitude to you, Pauline, for your devoted care—"

"Not bound to me; you have saved my life!"

"Ay; that was but a chance—quick, thoughtless work. I should have acted in the same way had any one else been in your place."

"But your pardon, forgiveness—"

He did not appear to heed her words. "You must let me say, Pauline, that I am bound to you in gratitude, and I would do all I could to help you in this sorrow; but I know we can only forgive ourselves when God, in his mercy, allows us the opportunity of repairing the past."

"Markham, I am very rich; set me to any task of doing good."

"I shall only demand one act from you. You will sell your sister."

She was utterly cast down. She had feared he would demand this of her. She could bear for him to know her pity for Clara—to know all—why, the knowledge in his mind that another utterly despised her would inevitably lower her still further in his estimation.

"I ask an act of justice, Pauline."

She was silent.

"An act of justice! Let her know that I was true. It will be my only consolation."

In broken sentences she prayed him to spare her.

"I am resolved, Pauline—if you are silent I shall speak myself."

She knew the strength of his word.

Then a sense of utter desolation came upon her —she, who had been so careless of all affection, who had cared for world's prosperity—evil, that was attained, but she was miserable—there were only two beings on earth she loved—his love, could never be hers—and her sister's love would be lost in her forever.

"Oh, Markham! grant me a respite—let me be happy a little time with her before she hates me—a few days—a week?"

He left her for a week," replied Markham; and he turned his face from her toward the long beams of golden cloud which rested on the horizon, through which the sun was sinking into the sea.

"Only a week, Mr. Markham! Must you leave us so soon?"

"You are very good, Mrs. Manson, but the truth is, I ought to have gone directly up to town on my landing."

"Not to begin business yet! I'm certain your health is far from being established."

"The directors are very pressing to see me; indeed, I received an urgent letter this morning. I shall be at an evil report, my dear friend here if I have no right to delay a very obvious duty."

"You will come to us again?"

"Thank you, I can scarcely promise myself that pleasure, my engagements are so very uncertain. I believe, in a short time, when things are more systematized, I shall be able to return to my post in India."

"Your post in India! your health is not fit for that. Your friends ought never to allow you."

"Its my livelihood, you must recollect."

There was a pause of some minutes. For a few moments Mrs. Manson bent her head over the work-frame, and appeared to be busily engaged in her work.

"Mr. Markham, I know you will not misunderstand me, but when you talk of leaving us and not coming again, I feel I must ask you, as a friend, to say—I know I should never forgive myself if I were silent. There is one person who will be very sorry when you go. How much, how little to say—I know I should never forgive myself if I were silent. There is one person who will be very sorry when you go. How much, how little soever my conversation between us, I give you my word of honor that I have better than words can tell—my sister loves you!"

Markham shuddered.

Circumstances, said he, "have certainly thrown us together; but I have never observed—"

"Ah! you must trust to us women; in these matters we are the best judges. Why, the simple fact of her mentioning your name so seldom in conversation; but, besides this, I have seen how much her character has altered since she went away—a girl, before, who had many excellent qualities, she was rather too fond of admiration and show; for I will be frank with you. But that, I am sure, is all changed. She has learned to care for love; she's half-spoiled my boys in this short time. I fear her marriage was not very happy—Colonel Thornton was a fine young man, but far older—and there must exist a sympathetic feeling, if I may call it so, to render marriage perfectly happy."

Markham's eyes were fixed on the ground, and he heard her voice falter at the last sentence.

"Pardon me, but she loves her sister, you! I know, years ago, when she used to laugh and joke about Markham being in love, I was, but, Ah, Pauline, with that fixed purpose of yours, when you really love it will be a matter of intensest joy or sorrow—"

"Mrs. Manson," said Markham, interrupting her, "this announcement is totally unexpected. Without questioning whether you have rightly interpreted your sister's feelings, it is proper for me to tell you at once that this affection, supposing it to exist, can never be returned."

"The fault will be mine," said Mrs. Manson, powerfully.

"Why so?"

"For speaking so prematurely; but what could I do when I found you were about to leave?" She rose from her chair, greatly agitated.

"Edward Markham, I have a right to speak to you—you owe me some duty. I transfer all that to my sister. If you loved her, I could forgive the past. Maybe it was prudent in you to give up that engagement with Lady Arden previously, but on the night of that fourteenth of June we had known so much another to be true, and well generally; and yet in three short months, Edward, I'm no matter now. I returned you your letters, all but one."

"You returned me all my letters," said Markham, his iron resolution tried to the very verge.

"No, not that last letter; I could not return it then."

By the utmost effort governing her trembling hands, she unlocked her desk and drew out a little pocket.

I read that letter twice, only twice, and then I sealed it up with this black wax. I have never read it since—no need; every word is stamped in my heart. They must have dragged me to the altar but for that."

She forced the packet into his hand.

"There, Edward, I can forgive it all, forget all these words, if you make her happy. I live very happily now—very happily."

Only a few words, and she would know the truth from one that he had been faithful to his pledge; but he stilled the words which were rising to his lips, and clenched his teeth hard.

He stopped for a short moment as he was about to leave the room; she had in some degree recovered her self-possession.

"Mr. Markham, I shall never speak on this subject again; but I bid you think well before you throw away a loving heart."

He was silent—silent when fate falls to the common lot of mortals. He must have yielded had the decision been made on him unawares; but before he left Calcutta he had resolved to see her once more, and through the long voyage, and in many a restless night, he had weighed the chances of their meeting, and armed himself at all points for resistance.

* * * * * *

"Markham, have you told her?"

"No, Pauline."

She could not speak for the moment; she could only clasp his hand.

"She is never to be told!"

"This is hardly beyond thought! Oh, Markham, I promise you I will strive to the utmost to atone for the past; anything in easy if I possess her love. Let your generosity—I can never repay that."

"Wait a while, Pauline. Weigh my words; she is never to be told."

"Yes, yes, I do weigh them: they seal that forgiveness which was freely given me at the hour of death."

"Pauline, I must leave it on your honor that you will never tell her."

"On my honor!" She repeated the words hastily, but was somewhat perplexed at his meaning, and looking in his face, she saw that same expression, as it were, the very cool flushing the countenance, which he remembered so vividly when she knelt at his feet in the hovel. "Never tell her, Markham?"

"Never!"

"Not if I were at the point of death?"

"Not even at that time. You are bound evermore to secrecy."

She had passed through the agonizing fear of death; she recollected her troubled prayers; she recollected the sudden ray of hope in her breast till he had forgiven her—then only she had found peace in the thought.

"Oh, Markham, do not bind me to this! Nay, let me speak out now; let me suffer any pain now, so that she forgives me at the last."

She would have left the room; he drew her back.

"I am not free yet; it is not to me you are bound. I dare say you went with a feeling of triumph to that grand wedding when your sister threw away her love for gold. How much, how awful words of the marriage service made no impression upon you at the time, and must ill you have never thought of them since: 'Let no man put asunder what God in his hereafter forever hold his peace.' You have often spoken then, but now those words bind you forever."

She listened to him with her head depressed, her hands convulsively clasped.

"When I found that your sister had been really true to me, my feeling toward her, which was that of utter contempt, turned back to old love, and resolved to see her once more. Believe in my good faith—only to see her, and part forever. I calculated upon your want of will. I thought I was very strong—let no man trust to his strength in such a case! I was not strong enough to leave you without the fire of temptation. Listen well to me, Pauline, and hear how strongly you have tempted me, that I may see that she was not happy; as to his love for her—"

Mr. Manson is very proud of her," interrupted Mrs. Vincent.

"Yes," he replied, bitterly, "and he is very proud of his fine horses. If he does not absolutely illtreat them, he is at least without sympathy or affection. I dare not tell you what I have felt; but I will say my resolution was so utterly weakened, that at one moment I was only the sight of how she clung to those children of hers—how all her happiness depended upon them—"

"I understand your meaning, Sir!" exclaimed Mrs. Vincent, proudly. "My sister would, under all circumstances, have realized her duty."

"It might indeed be as you say. Do you know this letter?"

Through the black seals, he placed the false letter in her hand. She gazed at it with a sort of fascination, and, in low tones, said, "I thought it was burned long before. You told me so, and I was not with the other letters she gave me to send back."

"You would have taken care of that," he replied, with a withering glance.

"Then did you receive it?"

"An hour ago. Your sister gave it to me, reproaching me for having broken my plighted faith."

"Am I to bring a curse on this house?" she cried in terror, falling at his feet. "God save us from the shame! Markham, I repent, I repent to your honor when I brought you here."

"You forget, Pauline, that I have already told you she does not know the cruel and shameful history of that letter. We will take it, as you say, at all costs she would have been faithful to her duty; but think of the terrible struggle—think of the long-suffering—if she ever does know the truth. Why should she suffer? She has done no wrong. We are bound to silence in mercy to her. Mark me well, Pauline: the evil and power rest on your hand, if you ever break that pledge of silence."

She made him no answer.

"You forgave me once," she murmured.

"God forbid I should retract those words! It is possible to forgive, but it is impossible to absolve you from the consequences of your guilt."

CHAPTER III.

Markham went back to India.

He had displayed great originality and skill in the construction of a certain railway-bridge across a rapid river, under circumstances of great difficulty. In addition to its engineering merits, the bridge appeared to form the link in the main line of railway communication which promised to be of the highest value in developing the resources of the country. All interests were deeply interested. There would be a grand ovation to the engineer on the opening of the bridge. The day appointed for the ceremony had arrived.

"Not ready to start, Markham. You'll be late," cried the assistant-engineer.

"I've written to say I can't be there."

"Bless me! it's one of the grandest days in your life."

"The fact is, I've just received a letter from England—"

"Not a less in your family, I hope?"

"No; but still containing very melancholy intelligence."

"Well, Markham, I think you ought to come, nevertheless; your services demand public recognition."

"You know me, old boy—I don't care two-pence for that sort of thing; and as for the bridge, I've got it up so well and so plain in my head as never to want it. Let them stick the barrel into your tureen. Off with you, or you'll get a wigging for being late."

Markham was alone all that day. It was from he had received his sister's letter to him. It was from a clergyman. The portion he read over oftenest ran thus:

"I was requested to see Mrs. Vincent at a time when no hope was entertained of her recovery. I can assure you I had to perform a very painful duty. She confessed to me that she had done a grievous wrong to a person still living, but that, under the peculiar circumstances in which she was placed, she could not repair the first great evil should arise. I strove with the best power that was granted me to afford her consolation. Ever since I became acquainted with Mrs. Vincent I had had occasion to admire the noble devotedness with which she performed among the poor of the parish, the heartsbounding greatly in works of piety and charity. I fear, however, that the disease had taken too much on it as a means of atoning for past transgressions. It was allotted in vain that I exerted myself for the immeasurable value of a 'saving faith' over the best human acts. 'What I have done lately,' she would say, 'I count as nothing; I have been a sinner from my youth up, and should die happy.' That idea of 'dying,' and the misery of dying unforgiven by the person she had wronged, were the thoughts that rendered her so miserable. Toward the end, when we were alone, she bade me to convey a letter to you, using these words: 'Tell him that I suffer now but not here ensured by him—it is the inevitable result of my sin. Tell him that I have been true to my pledge—that he has been terribly avenged.'"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

A TELEGRAM from New Orleans states that Sam Houston has retired from the Presidential contest. Mr. Houston, in a letter, writes a letter to say he has no intention of retiring. Mr. Douglas is stumping Virginia, and is speaking eloquently to large audiences. Governor H. Stephens announces his intention of stumping his State for Douglas. Governor Letcher, of Virginia, has also come out for him in a letter. The Radical Abolitionists of Massachusetts have nominated Governor Smith for President, and Samuel M'Farland, of Pennsylvania, for Vice-President. Everybody pretty much knows William Goodell, of New York. The New York American says that the Democratic party rely on the Southern General Scraggs and one party organizing one seeking, and the Republican leaders look to Governor Seward, who, for whom they pleased; while another party, the more conservative, under the leadership of Bell and Everett, indorsed the compromise lately effected at Syracuse. The Hon. Joseph R. Hawley, Democratic candidate for Governor, and opposed Senator Benjamin Wood, William D. Kelley, and J. L. Laird as a committee to wait upon and negotiate a fusion with the other opponents of Lincoln. The Hon. Mr. Hawley accepted the nomination for Governor, and consuls a union of the democracy. The Massachusetts Democratic State Committee have nominated John A. Andrew for Governor, and J. G. Goodrich for Lieutenant-Governor. The Republican State Committee has elected Simeon Draper Chairman, James Terwilliger Secretary, and Thurlow Weed Treasurer.

THE PRINCE OF WALES' BALL AT WASHINGTON.

The correspondent of the Tribune says: "As the Prince of Wales, like any other youth, is fond of dancing, it is understood he has determined to ask a ball to honor him in the East Room of the White House. Accordingly that apartment is undergoing the whitewashing and other repairs of the Presidential mansion, for the accommodation of the fair sex, and the distinguished guests of the suite. Under the directions of the President and Miss Lane, the ball-room will be a splendid affair. I am not acquainted with the courtesies and proprieties pertaining to royalty, but presume the ground-work of the affair is to accept as to the persons who may be invited to the ball in honor of the Prince. There will be a difficulty, however, in what between the desire for reasonable exclusiveness and the wish to extend the hospitality of the occasion, there will be abundant excuses for anxious consideration. Much the largest portion of the population even of Washington is far from being confined to the first families."

A LADY APPOINTED FIRST POSTMISTRESS.

At the Quarter Sessions at Philadelphia, on Tuesday, August 28, Lucretia Pickering Montgomery applied for a writ of mandamus for the release of Lina Conquest, a colored woman, from custody of W. J. Gowgill, a warden of the prisons, and now a resident of that city. After a hearing, the case was dismissed, and the prisoner refused of the bonds and her voluntary return to slavery.

MARTIN THE WHERRY-MAN.

We read in the Evening Bulletin: "Mr. Martin, who rowed a wherry from Boston to New York, and eats no meat, departed on Thursday afternoon. He was to pull his wherry up the Hudson as far as Yonkers the same night, farewell and charmed with the light of the full moon. The light would enable him to see to advantage the scenery, which he would like to see, his love of the works of nature being only equaled by his fondness of berries. Leaving the city during the beautiful afternoon—over rolling in its care to imbibe a whirlwhery, now to be lost in contemplation of the beauties of a moonlight night, and then again his task to make headway with Joshua Ward, the champion sculler, of Newburgh, and with the aid of the Libertarian folk to whom he has letters of introduction at other places by the way—this excellent boatman will at last stop at Albany. From Albany they are expected to be sent, out of its element, to Boston, the city of its master, which will render her inverted servitude and her expatriation mostly.

A YOUNG GIRL FASCINATED BY A SNAKE.

We read in the Rochester Union of August 28: "At 11 o'clock yesterday forenoon the little daughter of Mr. D. Davis, of this city, whose familiarity with a snake has been frequently noticed, died at the residence of her parents, on Prospect street. The child was about four years old, and when she was but a little over two years old Mr. Davis resided on Monroe Street, close to the residence of Mr. Jones, where a boa constrictor was employed, this little daughter—the boa constrictor—became acquainted with the snake, and they soon got very chummy and with a snake. How long these meetings had been held before the parents knew of them is not known. At all events, the mother one day found the child with the snake in its arms, and the child's gait was fondling it and calling it her baby. Subsequently the snake was seen in the yard, and was cured not to the child whenever she was permitted to go out. The child last night, after it had played away, was apparently tuckered and thought of this reptile. Her mother took her darling by the hand to put her to bed but was not allowed to object, but in vain. Under the advice of a physician who was called, the mother was not interfered with and continued his visits to the premises as visit, retreating to the field where any one but the child appeared. At length Mr. Davis moved into the city and took a house on Central Street, never but that the change would be advantageous to his child; and for a time she improved in health and took her food. Two weeks ago yesterday the child was taken ill, and continued to sink until yesterday, when she died. She was subject to convulsions or spasms, which were very violent, and at no time could she take food and retain it in her stomach. Her mother informs our reporter that she was attended by Dr. Fleming, who treated the child on the electrical principle, and she says that he found it a difficult case to treat, and was of the belief that the child had been taken the electricity from the system of the child. On the day previous to the child's decease it was said to have taken so seriously at a Mrs. Devlin, who occupies the House on Monroe Street, vacated by Mr. Davis, called at the house he saw occupies, and stated that a German named Conrad Schwartz, who had killed the snake, which had troubled the child, on the day previous—the Friday on which she was taken ill. The mother informs us that while the little girl heard the statement, she said, 'Mamma, it baby dead' by the snake's becoming warm. There is not much doubt about the statement made, as far as the facts are concerned. Both physicians and informants are quite positive on other thing. The snake killed by Kruchenbush was about five feet long, and that was dissolves but been seen by Mrs. Davis and her family repeatedly with her daughter. In which of the snakes at the time the child became ill may have been a coincidence—probably was. The child who two years and a half months old was a fine, and it was a very bright and interesting little girl. To what extent it may have influenced the disease of the child we say this we can not say. We only give such facts as we have been able to gather."

SARATOGA GAMBLERS.

A Saratoga correspondent of the Troy Times says that there has been the largest winning of the gambling season at the favorite watering-place referred to. One of them in a single early days of open gambling himself $ kept hotel in Albany, and failing in the business, in a fit of despondency, at the age of forty-five, took his own profession of a gambler. Fortune seemed to attend him at the table, and he left Saratoga with $10,000 in his pocket. He returned to his home and to his business. He has his servants in livery at the Springs, his fast horses, his Saratoga, and is identified with the best society. He appears a wealthy man of the world, polished and courteous in his manners, and a gentleman of abundant means, but come to recruit his health by a morning draught at the Congress, or to enjoy the season. He is not supposed to by the smartest and most lucky gambler in the country. Few would imagine that he is other than what he seems; yet he is only a type of a large class of persons who annually visit the Saratoga and pass for persons of the highest respectability.

PERSONAL.

The President met with a most enthusiastic reception at Cumberland, Maryland, on 28th ult., on his arrival from Washington. He addressed a large crowd assembled from the balcony of the Revere House, and his remarks were listened to with the greatest interest and satisfaction.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE CROP FAILURE.

The European Times of the 18th inst. says: "The fears about the harvest are every day becoming more real. The accounts from Ireland are despending, and the potato disease in districts is deepening and extending. The same cold damp weather which has so long prevailed on this side of the Channel appears to have set in with great general in the older country. Strange to say, Scotland and the north of the United Kingdom where the climate is most cheering. There they actually complain of a decided improvement in the yield of corn, coming from London a letter of the 15th, and through the Trent Valley, we find the whole country early or fairly in the state of the wheat. Barley is also now well take, and the tops of the cereal crops were about two feet high on the 15th. Things in the south of England is almost unprecedented. Still it would appear, from the state of the markets, and that the supply is exceptional, for the accounts from the more southern and western districts are comparatively favorable. No breadstuffs are arriving, and it is considered that the scarcity the arrivals which are daily coming in, but that we shall have to import largely can scarcely admit of a doubt."

FRANCE.

THE FIRE AT THE PALACE.

A Paris letter says: "I can give you some details of the fire in the Emperor's quarters—an accident which, no doubt, created a great sensation. The fire commenced in the pavilion, which on one side touches the residence of the Empress, and on the other that of the Prince Imperial. The room in which the conflagration took place was occupied by the women in the service of the Prince, and was occasioned by a fire being too near some woodwork. All the engines and alarms the Emperor's apartments in the Prince's room and carried him to his own apartments, but his calmness and bravery in carrying out the fire was happily extinguished in time to prevent it from reaching the adjacent compartments, which only were damaged. The Emperor is once distributed recompenses to the men, and wrote a letter expressing his thanks and the flames. Part of the wardrobe of the Prince was destroyed, and the furniture he had only the point of the fire. Since left. The government and the female servants have lost the greatest part of their clothing."

A LETTER FROM ABD-EL-KADER.

Some of the friends say that Abd-el-Kader has written a letter to the Emperor Napoleon, in which he says that Affairs—the government on him; but stating that when his did in Syria was owing to the pressure of the Druses and his Majesty for having, eleven years ago, released him from confinement in France.

A LADY IN A MONASTERY.

A letter from Paris says: "A tourist, just arrived from the Grand Chartreuse, tells me that he had Thursday week the monks were horribly scandalized by the fact of a lady having, contrary to all monastic custom, obtained admission to the monastery, and passed the night there. The fair intruder, an inhabitant of Grenoble, had evidently been in much affluence, and passed the night with a party of gentlemen. In the morning she rose at the instance of her curiosity by curse of her name and address in the door of the cell in which she slept. The Mother Superior was the heroine of a similar adventure some years ago, but there subject was a member of the London Times."

GERMANY.

THE ROYAL INTERVIEW AT TOPLITZ.

Le Nord states that nothing was signed at the interview at Toplitz, but the engagements entered into were consigned, at the solicitation of the Emperor of Austria, to a memorandum, which will be communicated to the Cabinets of Paris and London. It is understood that they bear together on the Eastern question, on the ground that they will not allow the Ottoman Empire to be any thing that affects the integrity of the Ottoman empire, and to which the two powers are resolved to adhere.

In the home question of Germany, Austria has made no more concessions than previously in the Italian question. She engages, moreover, to make no opposition to the just claims of Prussia, which will increase her power in the internal affairs of Germany.

With regard to Italian affairs, the Prince of Prussia recognizes that the possession of Venetia is of real importance to the Austrian monarchy, and that the engagements on this head as long as the Italian movement is confined to the Peninsula. Austria, on the other hand, a foreign Power takes part in it, the Prince Regent will be bound to act in accordance with the Federal forces.

Lastly, the Prince Regent undertakes to employ all his good offices and personal influence with the Emperor Napoleon, to bring about a reconciliation between Russia and Austria.

CATHOLIC BIGOTRY.

The Minister of War in Austria had just ordered that Protestant soldiers shall only be interred in cemeteries set apart exclusively for them, and forbidden to assist at funerals in the Austrian journals complain of this order as contrary to the spirit of the age, and only called forth by the requirements of the Concordat.

ITALY.

THE LANDING IN CALABRIA.

At latest dates we hear that large bodies of revolutionists had landed in Calabria, where they had been joined by numerous bands of insurgents. Many of these, it is said, they had retired temporarily to the mountains. The Neapolitan troops had been concentrated, and had by no means gone over to Garibaldi, whose forces on the main land were said to be small, and to consist of the scum of the army. Monsignor preparations for the defense of Naples continued to be made, and it was said that the city will be occupied by a Neapolitan garrison of 30,000 men on account of general dissatisfaction against the Government.

The Turin correspondent of the London Times publishes a dispatch, dated Naples, August 16, stating that the landing of the revolutionists in Calabria Ultra was unbounded. Up to the 11th instant only several insignificant skirmishes had occurred. The following are the exact points:"

"Paris, Friday, August 17, 1860.—The Patrie of this evening contains the following dispatch, dated Naples, the 15th inst.: 'The landing of Garibaldi in Calabria Ultra has failed in still economizing off the Neapolitan Limeal. Tranquility still prevails in Sicily, Naples and the Abruzzia.'

THE NEW IMBROGLIO.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The Neapolitan Government, having failed to obtain the intervention of the Powers, has at last determined to concentrate its troops in Calabria, and put Naples on the defensive. An order to that effect was issued on Friday. It appears that between Reino and Naples, and the troops of General Lanza, there is a force of about 30,000 men, all told. This will, of course, enable Garibaldi to pursue his advantage. The Neapolitan Government has issued a decree which gives power to the Minister of War to call out the Caterer but formally announced that Sardinia would not interfere in the present struggle. Garibaldi, it is said, is a most intriguing; but, to add to the chaos felt, in the last three days, the Neapolitan troops have deserted in all appearances, as soon as Naples is attacked. The Neapolitan Government, however, is resolved on a siege; it is evident she can but intend at all risks to open negotiations in Calabria."

Per contra, a later dispatch states that Austria has given instructions to her Consul to leave the city of Naples.

GARIBALDI'S POPULARITY AT NAPLES.

It would appear that Garibaldi's popularity in Naples is matter of the most extraordinary kind. The correspondent writes: "I can not describe the enthusiasm which the name of the liberator excites in the people. His portraits are at every street corner; hymns in his honor in every coffee-house; images of him in every shop for sale; epaulets, all declare the national sentiment, so much so that the Governor Neapolitan Government such as Mr. Simmons does the Governor of all things. In the capital we have a garrison of 12,000 men, and, as I have said, I am informed, there are from 30,000 to 40,000 men in arms. They have received regimental colors. The name of Garibaldi a fierce struggle is expected in the provinces, where there is an active revolutionary party, which must in proportion to those who are praying for the arrival of Garibaldi. Every day I see the enrollment of the regimental family, and of establishing order and securing regularity. Every day is constantly leaving with provisions and ammunition for the troops."

THE POPE'S TROOPS TO BE ALLOWED TO SACK THE PAPAL STATES.

The Opinione Nationale publishes, authentically, a statement of the number of troops which the Holy Father of the Holy See, declaring that their superior officers have adopted the most effective measures to check for the slightest relapse of the population which might occur of Perugia they would allow the troops to sack the town.

SYRIA.

THE LATEST FROM DAMASCUS.

Advices from Damascus to the 5th ult. state that Fuad Pasha had surrounded the Christian quarter, and threatened fire and sword if the Druse chiefs did not surrender. Fuad Pasha had received 5,000 Arab horse, and nearly 800 other important arrests had been made. A thousand camel loads of property had been found and recovered.

A BRIGHT EXCEPTION.

"In the whole war," writes Mr. Graham to Lord Dufferin, "there has been but one bright exception to the barbarity which has pervaded those wretched districts. A Christian woman had concealed before the massacre began, advised the Christians not to resist, but to go to the Government House, where the Pasha offered to shelter any who came into her house. Unanimously the Christians assembled within the house, and more crowded into her house; and when the murderers, pointing to the Government House, pointed out to the dogs of Christians, she said, 'Enter, if you dare, and you shall have to pass over my dead body.' Her courage did not have dared to violate the sanctity of the harem of the Pasha's Government House, and the Christians were saved. The poor creatures she carefully escorted hourly Mohammedan quarter, to the Government House, and brought off by our men-of-war and landed at Beyrout."

BEHAVIOR OF THE TURKISH OFFICERS.

An eye-witness writes: "As Damascus the riot began with a bold attack on the Christian quarter, many of whom were boys and women. The Governor, Achmed Pasha (now on his way to the Dardanelles and Kiel'), had 300 regular and 2000 irregular troops; 150 regulars were at first called out; they fired once, and the mob dispersed in every direction, leaving their plunder on the ground. The soldiers were then withdrawn into the castle, the mob took fresh courage, the Pasha did nothing, and the revolt went on. Even on the third day Abd-el-Kader went to the Pasha and offered to disperse the mob if he ordered Christians to be fired on. Achmed Pasha was the answer of the Pasha? Mark it well. 'I have no order to fire on the Moslems.'"

MEXICO.

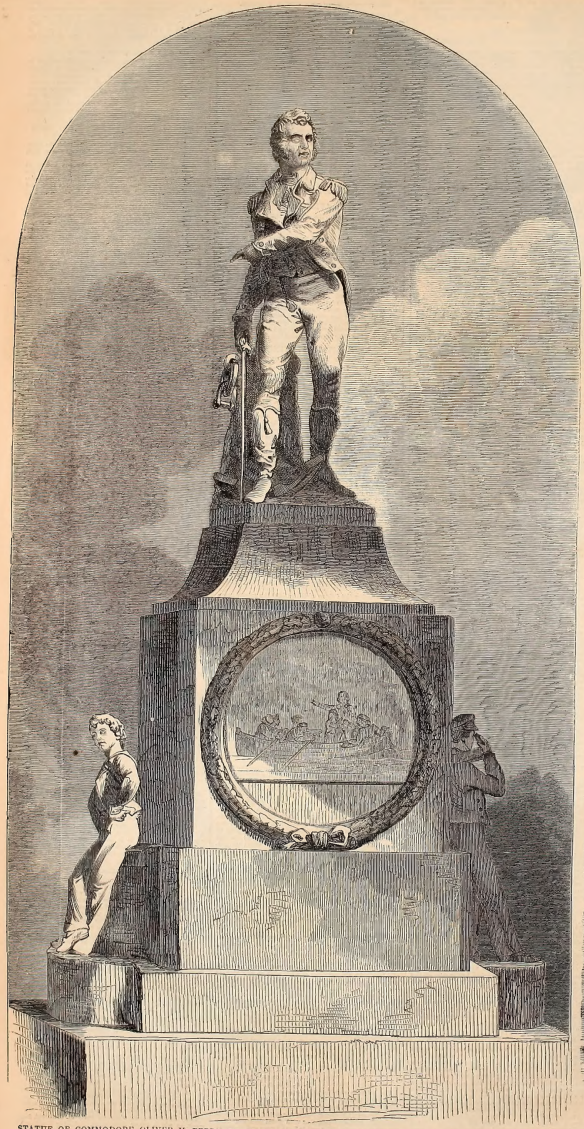
INTERVENTION OF THE GREAT POWERS.

The New York Times says: "We have the best authority for saying that the United States Government is in favor of intervention by several powers, for the purpose of being peremptorily settled by a decisive intervention of four of the Great European powers, deeply interested in the restoration of order throughout the dominions of their unfortunate neighbor. France, England, Spain and Prussia have signed a convention for the pacification of Mexico, to which they invite the adhesion of the United States, but which they propose to carry into effect whether we accept it or not. The terms of the convention are:

"The bans of toleration for all religious opinions, and of a perfect independence of the Roman Catholic Church, are understood to have been already accepted by the Constitutionalists, and will be put in force at once by the Clerical party under Miramon on the other. An armistice for the period of six months is to be declared between the respective leaders, and during this period the whole portion of the country which is not in the hands without dispute by the actual occupants, joint action between the forces of the contracting parties, the commissariat mess of the public administration and the maintenance of order. The whole of the ports of the Republic of Mexico are to be called open to elect between the principal leaders pledge themselves to resign all their authority and arms into the hands of the Commissioners to be appointed under the mention of the intervening Powers."

AFRICA.

A NUT FOR A SOCIOLOGIST.



The following extract is from the West African Herald of August 13:

"Formerly Badshahun, King of Dahomey, is about to make the 'grand custom' in honor of the late King Ghezo. Preparations are on foot, and former reports on the magnitude of the ceremonies to be performed on this occasion, fully justify the anticipation of the most sanguinary character. The celebration of the 'grand custom,' A grand festival at which it is customary to human blood enough to float a canoe. Two thousand persons will be sent along to the world of spirits. Messengers to Abbeokuta has been postponed, but the King has sent word that he will commence operations at the expiration of weaker tribes, and has succeeded in capturing many unfortunate victims. Among the number of these unhappy prisoners will be sold into slavery, and the old person will be killed to appease the manes of Ghezo."

THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

PROGRESS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

On Saturday, the 25th ult., the Prince of Wales inaugurated the Victoria Bridge at Montreal, of which we gave a full account in our last. The ceremony was followed by the crowds which followed him as he inspected the works. On the same day after the bridge was completed, and gave the toast of the "Governor-General and the Prince of Wales," which was received with great feeling, which the Prince was incognito. On Sunday he attended divine service at the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland, and received every lady. About one hundred American ears were present, and the Prince bowed to each audience and lunched; the New York Committee were his guests at the St. Lawrence Hall. On Monday evening, in the evening, and a grand ball was given in his honor, in the Victoria Square, which was published an extensive scale. It is said to have cost $40,000, and to have been the most splendid entertainment ever given in this country. On Tuesday the Prince went by railroad to the Province Line, and was received by the Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, and by the Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, and by the Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, and PERRY'S RESIDENCE.

PERRY'S MONUMENT.

THE PERRY CELEBRATION AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

WE devote a considerable portion of our space this week to the Perry Celebration at Cleveland, on 10th inst. We publish on the two preceding pages a portrait of Perry, a picture of his monument, another of the site where it will stand, several pictures commemorative of his career, and four portraits of survivors of the battle of Lake Erie.

PERRY.

OLIVER HAZARD PERRY was born at South Kingston, Rhode Island, on 23d August, 1785. His family had been American for six generations. His father, Captain Christopher R. Perry, was a distinguished sailor in the Revolutionary war, and experienced the horrors of the Jersey prison-ship. Thus inheriting a love for the sea, Oliver embarked as a midshipman on board the General Greene, a man-of-war commanded by Captain Talbot, April, 1799; was present at the attack on Jacmel; and subsequently, when the expedition against the Algerine pirates was dispatched, served at first as a midshipman on board the John Adams, and subsequently as a lieutenant under Captain Campbell, in the Constellation. His brother was then also actively employed. When, in 1805, he returned to Newport he was a capital sailor, and, according to the uniform testimony of his contemporaries, an agreeable, warm-hearted, and accomplished gentleman. Fond of ladies' society, of a full but luxuriant figure, he was nevertheless a strict disciplinarian, and worked his ship, they say, like an iron machine.

From 1805 till the declaration of the war of 1812 Perry was employed in building gun-boats and coast duty; it was a cruel mortification to him not to be on active service when hostilities really commenced. No one had felt more keenly than he the outrageous nature of the pretensions of the British. On one occasion, he was nearly bombing a British frigate, of four times the size of his craft, to resent one of the insults which were customary at the time. Still, no spark of envy at the better fortune of his comrades found room in his heart. When Master Commandant Jesse D. Elliott, Perry was promoted to a post-captaincy for the capture of the Guerriere, and all the officers in the service were furious at the affair, Perry remained calm. Perry hastened to the isthmus of this wounded officer, and congratulated him with a fervor which brought the blood to Elliott's cheek.

His reiterated appeals to be employed "where he could meet the enemies of his country" proved effectual in the end. In February, 1813, orders to proceed to Sackett's Harbor, and build a naval force that could command the waters of the southern coast of the lakes. It was in those days a serious journey to travel from Rhode Island to the lakes in winter, and the officers found themselves described as being practically further from New York than Canada was from England. Yet such energy was his, that by May three gunboats and two brigs were launched; and on the 23d of the same month Perry sailed one hundred miles in an open boat, through a heavy storm, to take the command of the naval force at the attack on Fort George, and in the latter arrangements another heroic valor contributed largely to the success of the day. He was "every where, under showers of musketry," encouraging his men.

Of the battle of Lake Erie we speak below. Shortly afterward Commodore Perry served as an aid to General Harrison in the pursuit of the British, and at the battle of the Thames "cheered and animated every breast." His return homeward was, of course, one continued ovation. Gold-encased addresses; balls were given in his honor; Congress presented him the medal struck on the previous year; all classes vied with each other in doing him honor. His satisfaction at this merited reward did not last long, however, speedily marred by the death of his infant son, who was born while he was on Lake Erie. His letters show that all his glory could not heal the wound in his heart.

The remainder of his life, though interesting, is not of historic importance. Appointed to the Java, he set sail from Newport before the war broke for sea, and in the Mediterranean he was likewise disappointed in his hope for a brush with Algerines. He had to encounter the usual troubles of successful officers. A dispute with Captain Hull, whom he relieved in the command of a squadron, caused him several years of annoyance; and a quarrel with Captain Heath of the marines, in which "passion overcame him," and he struck Captain Heath, led, after a long and acrimonious correspondence, to a duel, in which Perry received but wounded his antagonist severely. Let the letters of Perry and Heath on the subject be read by all fair-minded men, and they will see that Perry was the more generous of the two.

At the age of about his great desire to become a sailor, and his natural aversion to farming, induced him to leave his paternal home, and enter himself for the profession; which profession he successfully followed, gaining himself much reputation. At the age of 19 years, he found himself in command of a ship out of Boston.

At this period, on the 22d May, 1812, war about being declared with Great Britain, he was ordered to sailing-master in the navy by President Madison, and commissioned a gun-boat, and appointed to the lakes at Newport. On the Commodore being ordered to the lakes he commanded the Revenge, a vessel of 14 guns, and reported to Commodore Isaac Chauncey, then commanding on the lakes, at Sackett's Harbor, in 1813.

He was then ordered to join Commodore O. H. Perry on Lake Erie, who had been appointed to the command of the Scorpion, in which vessel, as will be perceived by reference to Mackenzie's Life of Perry, he took an active part in the battle of Lake Erie, on the 10th September, 1813, resulting in the victory so long sought by the order of the Commodore, and the last while in the pursuit of the enemy. Lieutenant Yarnall was added to capture and bring back to the squadron, at short notice, the Niagara, which vessel, after the victory, by direction he was presented by Congress with a sword.

Subsequently to the battle of Lake Erie, Lieutenant Yarnall is command of the Queen Charlotte and Detroit, the two prizes which were left in Put-in-Bay during the winter.

In the spring following he was appointed to the command of the Tigris, under Commodore Sinclair, and served under him during the summer, by whom he was left with Captain Tunnet to blockade the port of Mackinaw. In the performance of this duty he was taken by an overwhelming force of one hundred sailors and soldiers, and almost three hundred Indians, after a severe contest, and his command was taken prisoner. In this engagement he received a very severe wound in the thigh from a musket-shot, and was taken prisoner.

In 1815 he was appointed to the command of the Surprise, and ordered to proceed up the lake with Colonel Miller and Colonel Robertson, topographical engineers, who had been directed to examine the line between the United States and Canada, under the treaty of Ghent. Subsequent to this, he wound breaking out afresh, he had to submit to a very severe operation, which, however, did not effect the object in view, and he died in the most excruciating pain on the 23d of August, 1819, in the steamship Fulton, at New York, and was interred from the same vessel the next day.

In 1812 he had the command of the rendezvous in Buffalo, and was very successful in shipping seamen for the navy. After this, he was appointed, in August, 1813, by the Secretary of the Navy, to the command of the Lawrence, which vessel he had charge of about two and a half years. At the time the navy was disbanded, a few years since, he was in the reserve list, with full pay, and has remained so ever since.

DR. USHER PARSONS.

DR. USHER PARSONS was born in Alfred, York County, Maine, the youngest son of one of the pioneer settlers of that town. His early education was obtained at the neighboring schools and academy; and he finished his medical studies under the direction of Dr. John Warren, of Boston. He entered the navy as surgeon's mate, at the age of twenty-one, and was ordered to the frigate Java at Gibraltar in May, 1812, soon after the declaration of war in 1812. The officers and crew of that vessel volunteered for service on the lakes.

Dr. Parsons left Black Rock, where he was at first stationed, for Erie, with the vessels that had been armed and equipped, and joined that place about the 1st July, as soon as Perry's whole squadron were ready for service from there. On the 10th, Perry sickness prevailed on the fleet; the two senior medical officers were disabled, and the whole duty devolved upon Dr. Parsons.

In the battle which ensued, September 10, he was the medical officer of the vessel on an board the Lawrence, commanded by Perry, which bore the brunt of the fight. The scene of blood and death that received the wounded was at nearly the level of the water, and Dr. Parsons and his assistants were exposed to the fire of the battle, and two were killed after passing from his hands. The Lawrence was the vessel most injured by the commander on his professional services. Admiral Mackenzie, in his Life of Perry, writes:

"Of Dr. Usher Parsons, surgeon's mate, I can not say too much. In the absence of Surgeon Brownell, Dr. Parsons and Hornsby, the duties of operating, dressing, and attending upon the wounded, devolved upon him, and he performed entirely on him. I can only say, for that in the event of the battle, I should have considered myself a suicide myself peculiarly fortunate in having him with me on surgeon.

After the battle, the wounded from the other vessels were received on board the Lawrence, and sent to Erie, where the wounded were taken to a hospital. Dr. Parsons retaining charges of them. He was ordered to rank as and surgeon from the date of the battle, and received his commission as such the following April. He remained in charge of the hospital at Erie the following May, when he was ordered on board the Lawrence, which, with several other vessels, was then fitting out for the ocean service, but, to transport troops from Detroit destined to capture Fort Erie, Canada. This duty, it is done, lasted until the wicked Madison in August. The army was repulsed the heavy loss of the British, and Fort Erie, which was an important transporting troops of the Northwestern army from Detroit, was blown up by the British on the evacuation of the place, and the troops sent to Canada.

In November, 1814, Dr. Parsons, at the request of Commodore Perry, was ordered to the Naval Hospital, then by the new frigate Java, at Baltimore, as chief surgeon, and had under his charge, during the following April, and mited in January, 1816, for the Mediterranean. He returned in the Java to Boston, and in May, 1816, at the year's leave of absence he was ordered to the Guerriere, which sailed November 1 for Lisbon, and in July, 1818, he was ordered to the Mediterranean. He there obtained leave to travel in Europe, and in the autumn of 1818 passed the following winter in the hospitals and medical schools of Paris. He returned in the spring, and was stationed two years in Charlestown Navy Yard. During that time he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from Dartmouth College.

After a year's leave he settled in general practice in Providence, and was appointed Professor in Brown University. He held this position for two years, except a winter spent in Philadelphia as Professor in the Jefferson Medical College, and another in Paris and London. He resigned his commission in the navy in 1825, having made in most favorable cruises of the Mediterranean squadron, daughter of Rev. Abel Holmes, D.D., of Cambridge, Massachusetts, by whom he has had five children.

Dr. Parsons is author of several medical works, a volume on diseases of the navy, published in London in 1823, one on the art of making anatomical preparations, 1824, a volume on Yellow Fever, 1826, Yellow Fever, 1837. He also wrote the Life of Sir William Pepperell, Sketches of the Life of Commodore Perry, and various historical and several historical and medical pamphlets. He received the honorary degree of M.D. from Harvard and Brown, and was for three years President of the Rhode Island Medical Society, and in 1852 was elected First Vice-President of the American Medical Association.

DR. NATHANIEL EASTMAN.

DR. NATHANIEL EASTMAN, of Jericho, Medina County, Ohio, though not exactly a survivor of the battle, had so much to do with the closing events of those days that he naturally ranks with the survivors. He has kindly furnished us the following reminiscences:

"I was born June 17, 1793, at Fort Ann, Washington County, New York. I was a physician, practicing, and educated in Fairfield County, Connecticut. I commenced the study of medicine with my father, Dr. Ezra Eastman, then living in Geneseo County. In 1810 and 1811 I pursued my studies at the University of Dr. Cuyenoul Hospital of Buffalo. In January, 1812, I was licensed to practice physic and surgery by the Medical Society of Geneseo County. In February I entered on the practice of my profession in the town of Waterford, Erie County, Pennsylvania. In the winter and spring of 1813 an epidemic prevailed among the troops there, and many of the men were attacked fell before it. The volunteer militia stationed at Erie, Pa., and Black Rock, Buffalo, New York, were threatening daily, and February 5 was to receive the fire of the British batteries at Fort Erie, on the opposite side of the Niagara River. Soon after the first fire was to suit from the port of Erie, by the solicitation of Commodore Perry, I was ordered as assistant surgeon to the Marine Hospital, where a number of sailors and marines were laid up with the change of the climate. A few days after the battle the brig Lawrence, then commanded by Captain Brownell, came into the harbor of Erie with the wounded of the fleet. I assisted to get the wounded off the brig, and to the Marine Hospital or hospital, then occupied for a hospital. Dr. Parsons was principal surgeon of the fleet. Dr. Davis, and myself assisted in dressing wounds and in attending on the sick and wounded. On the 23d of October Commodore Perry came down from the upper lakes in the Ariel, and, if I remember right, the next day after Dr. Parsons left the hospital and went with Perry to the East. On the 24th of October, 1813, I received a letter from Elliott, then commander of the fleet, to go to Put-in-Bay with a detachment of the sick and wounded sailors and marines. I left Erie, in the Scorpion, on the 25th, and arrived at Put-in-Bay on the 26th. The party marched across the island to the prisoners' barracks, on the Canada side, and by reason of the bay, where they had been left in a crippled condition. I was stationed on board the Detroit, and performed the duties of surgeon for both ships until the 15th of April, 1814, when I was relieved by Dr. Roberts, who came up from Erie with Captain Elliot in the Ariel. I returned to the fleet, and was stationed on board the brig Niagara as acting surgeon's mate, until the last of June, when I received my discharge, and left the service. I have practiced medicine at no place where I now reside thirty-six years.

JOHN CHAPMAN.

JOHN CHAPMAN, the subject of the following narrative, left England in the transport Bostwick, No. 404, and landed in Quebec. He left Quebec May 17, 1812, and came to Fort George, at the head of Lake Ontario. After a stay of five weeks he was sent to assist in the erection of Fort Erie; but before that was concluded he received orders to proceed to the point opposite to Black Rock, and help in the erection of three batteries. He spent the year at various points along the lines, participating in the battle of Queenstown, and was pressed to receive Hull at his surrender. In August following he was put on board the schooner Lady Prevost, 14 guns, at Long Point, and sailed for Put-in-Bay, where he arrived about three weeks before the battle of Lake Erie, September 10, 1813. He underwent all the hardships of the fleet, and was severely wounded by a musket ball in the groin. He says:

"Perry was desirous to make an attack upon Fort Sandusky, with 400 regular troops. We advanced upon the fort in two columns. Shortly upon it, I fired a bullet. I then ran up a pike with his arm in a sky-rocket, directly over my head and took off that of the man. This was the only shot fired upon the American side. The fort was abandoned about sunset, and it was between one and two hours afterward that I was left for dead, and then was I taken up upon it except seven prisoners. Seeing my late companions all gone, I crept under the platform, and lay among the dead until I reached the end of it, where I came into full view, the moon shining brightly at the time. There was a short distance crossed between me and the woods. I ran with all my might to reach the shelter; but immediately I heard several shots, and found myself wounded in the left side of the groin. I fell, feigning death, and lay still attention was drawn off, when I crept cautiously to the wood. I was now obliged to make a circuit around the fort in the edge of the timber, and I came near the place where we had left two gun-boats below the fort. I gained them without difficulty, and found several other soldiers being collected. we returned to the lake, and thence back to Fort Madison.

"Upon our arrival in the fort I was ordered on board Queen Charlotte as a marine. My post was as gunner, stationed at number 3. My pay as gunner was at No. 1, 24 pounder. We weighed anchor at 10 o'clock in the 10th of September. Our command was to Long Point, for provisions for the upper forts, but thought it likely we should fall in with the enemy in that effect. At daybreak of the 10th the mast at the mast-head descried sails and reported to Put-in-Bay. We were then upon them. They, discovering our approach, weighed anchor, and stood off with a strong breeze.

"Between 10 and 11 o'clock I fired the first gun upon the Lawrence. We had two shots I fired, which were thrown through the main-mast, and the other between wind and water. The enemy kept up a heavy fire upon the station, except when I was obliged to bring cartridges for the big gun, when the enemy were killed where duty was to serve them. I had my clothes, whiskers, and hair badly singed by the wadding of the enemy's guns, but myself not suffered no further injury, notwithstanding I had a good opportunity to try hard at his fighting.

"The Lawrence being disabled, Commodore Perry took advantage of the smoke, and left the vessel in a small British fleet to go from her to the Niagara. We did not see him left the vessel perfectly effected. As proper time the wind causing the smoke to lift, I saw the boat, and small at about a half a mile astern of the fleet. I then saw Commodore Perry strip off his coat and plug the hole in his side. Having reached the ship, he was ordered to bring the schooners into action. Captain Finnis, of the Queen Charlotte, was killed in the early part of the action, but his design was frustrated by the falling off of the vessels which was keeping up the fleet. The cutting away of the dowsbank of one of the mast left her at the mercy of the enemy. Captain Cooksdon, and she ran foul of the Detroit and became entangled with her. The fire of the American schooners in action in the mean time, raked them fore and aft, carry away the main and fore-top-mast of the enemy's ship the Queen Charlotte, besides crippling her otherwise. The Detroit and Queen Charlotte then came down on all the vessels except the Little Belt and Lady Prevost, which were sailed for the west. The wind small craft and carried one under a spread of sail. The Little Belt tried to escape, but was soon brought to and made to surrender.

"Our vessels were unmolested, and the prisoners among who were not wounded were put on board the Niagara, otherwise landed on Middle Sister and Kelley Island to Chilicothe. The conduct of Commodore Perry was unparalleled, and his conduct being strange to the wounded and prisoners, and made a deep impression in his favor upon all as long as he remained, quite unexpectedly, to return to my quarters, when I learned that word had come that some Indians had committed cruelties that been taken in arms against the British, and were ordered to execution on shallow. Upon this I remained in my quarters, and when that twice the number of English prisoners should be taken to the Indians, and with a shorter fate if they were put to death. I free one of the fatal number, and was at the point of execution, when the news, arresting the result of the effect.

"I was then sent back to Fort Stephenson, and from thence to Cleveland, where I arrived about the 1st of January. I remained there about three days, then came to Hudson, and have lived here ever since.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC. ETC.

WALTER HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE CONCLUDED.

I.

WHEN I closed the last leaf of the Count's manuscript, the hour of midnight had long engaged to remain at Forest Road had expired. Monsieur Rabelle looked at his watch and wound it up, then considered, and left the agent in possession of the empty house. I never saw him again; I never heard more of him or of his wife. Out of the dark ways of villainy and deceit they had crawled across our path—into the same by-ways they crawled back secretly, and hid from us.

In a quarter of an hour after leaving Forest Road I was at home again.

But few words sufficed to tell Laura and Marian how my desperate venture had ended, and what the next event in our lives was likely to be. I left all details to be described later in the day, and hastened back to St. John's Wood to see the wife of whom Count Fosco had ordered the fly, when he went to meet Laura at the station.

The address in my possession led me to some

"livery stables," about a quarter of a mile distant from Forest Road. The proprietor proved to be a civil and respectable man. When I explained that an important family matter obliged me to ask him to refer to his books, for the purpose of ascertaining a date with which the record of his business transactions might supply me, he offered no objection to granting my request. The book was produced, and showed, under the date of "July 29, 1850," the order was entered in these words:

"Brougham to Count Fosco, 5 Forest Road. Two o'clock. (John Owen.)"

I found, on inquiry, that the name of "John Owen," attached to the entry, referred to a man who had been employed to drive the fly. He was then at work in the stable-yard, and was sent for to see me, at my request.

"Do you remember driving a gentleman, in the month of July last, from No. 5 Forest Road to the Waterloo Bridge Station?" I asked.

"Well, Sir," said the man, "I can't exactly say I do."

"Perhaps you remember the gentleman himself? Can you call to mind driving a foreigner, last summer—a tall gentleman, and remarkably fat?"

The man's face brightened directly—"I remember him, Sir!" The fattest gentleman I ever I see—and the heaviest customer as ever I drove. Yes, yes—I call him to mind, Sir. We did go to the station, and it was from Forest Road. There was a parrot, or summut like it, screeching in the window. The gentleman was in a mortal hurry when the lady's luggage; and he give me a handsome present for locking sharp and getting back."

Getting the boxes! I recollected immediately that Laura's own account of herself, on her arrival at Limmeridge, described her luggage as being collected for her by some person whom Count Fosco brought with him to the station. This was the man.

"Did you see the lady?" I asked. "What did she look like? Was she young or old?"

"Well, Sir, what with the hurry and the crowd of people pushing about, I can't rightly say what the lady looked like. I can't call to mind thing to mind about her that I know of—excepting her name."

"You remember her name?"

"Yes, Sir. Her name was Lady Glyde."

"How do you come to remember that, when you have forgotten what she looked like?"

The man smiled, and shifted his feet in some little embarrassment.

"Why, if you put the truth, Sir," he said, "I hadn't been long married at that time; and my wife's name being one she changed it for, was the same as the lady's—meaning the name of Glyde, Sir. The lady mentioned it herself. 'I've just been over boces, ma am,' she says to me. 'Yes,' says she, 'my name is on my luggage—it is Lady Glyde.' 'Come!' I says to myself, 'Sir: it might be ugly on a year's work or a night's. But I can swear to the stout gentleman, and to the lady's name."

There was no need that he should remember the time; the date was positively established by his master's order-book. I felt at once that the means were at last in my power of striking down the whole conspiracy at a blow with the irresistible weapon of plain fact. Without the gentleman's hesitation I took the proprietor of the livery-stables aside, and told him what the real importance was of the evidence of the entry in his book and the evidence of his driver. An arrangement to compensate him for the probable loss of the man's services was easily made; and a copy of the entry in the book was taken by myself, and certified as true by the proprietor's signature. I left the livery-stables, having settled that John Owen was to hold himself at my disposal for the next three days, or for a longer period, if necessity required it.

I now had in my possession all the papers that I wanted. The district registrar's own copy of the certificate of death, and Sir Percival's dated letter to Mr. Fairlie, being sent in my pocket-book. With this written evidence about me, and with the cochman's answers fresh in my memory, I hastened home, to make the first time since the beginning of all my inquiries, in the direction of Mr. Kyrle's office. One of my objects in paying him this visit was, I was necessarily, to tell him what I had done. The other was to ask him of my resolution to take my wife to Limmeridge the next morning, and to have her publicly received and recognized in her uncle's house. I left it to Mr. Kyrle to decide, under these circumstances, and in Mr. Gilmore's absence, whether he was or was not bound to ask the family solicitor to be present on that occasion in the family interests.

I will say nothing of Mr. Kyrle's amusement, or of the surprise which he expressed at the reunion of my conduct, from the first stage of the investigation to the last. It is only necessary to mention that no one decided on accompanying us to Cumberland.

We started the next morning by the early train. Laura, Marian, Mr. Kyrle, and myself in one carriage; and John Owen, with a clerk from Mr. Kyrle's office, occupying places in another. On reaching the Limmeridge station we went first to the farm-house at Todd's Corner. It was my firm determination that Laura should not enter her uncle's house till she appeared there publicly recognized as his niece. I left Marian to settle the question of accommodation with Mrs. Todd, as soon as the good woman had recovered from the bewilderment of hearing what our errand was in Cumberland; and I arranged with her husband that John Owen was to be committed to the ready hospitality of the farm servants. These preliminaries completed, Mr. Kyrle and I set forth together for Limmeridge House.

I can not write at any length of our interview with Mr. Fairlie, for I can not recall it to mind without feelings of impatience and contempt, which make the scene, even in remembrance only, utterly repulsive to me. I prefer to record simply that I carried my point. Mr. Fairlie consented to treat us on the footing I desired. He passed without notice his polite insolence to the outset of the interview. We heard without a word surprise the protestations with which he tried next to persuade us that the disclosure of the conspiracy had overwhelmed him. He abruptly refused to hear anything that I had in a fretful child. "How was he to know that his niece was alive, when he was told that she was dead? He would welcome Miss Halcombe with pleasure, if we would only allow him time to recover. And we had looked as if he wanted hurrying into his grave? No. Then why hurry him?" He reiterated these remonstrances at every fresh opportunity, until I checked them once for all, by placing him firmly between two inevitable alternatives. I gave him the choice between doing his niece justice on my terms, or facing the consequences of a public assertion of her identity in a court of law. Mr. Kyrle, who had agreed for that purpose, told him plainly that he must decide the question then and there. Characteristically choosing the alternative which involved present ease, he release him from all personal anxiety, he announced, with a sudden burst of energy, that he was not strong enough to bear any more bullying, and that we might do as we pleased.

Mr. Kyrle then sat down to write out the heirs, and agreed upon a form of letter which was to be sent round to the tenants who had attended the false funeral, summoning them to Mr. Fairlie's name, to assemble in Limmeridge House on the next day but one. An order, referring to the same date, was written, authorizing the stationary in Carlisle to send a man to Limmeridge charged with the necessary preparations for inscription—Mr. Kyrle, who had arranged to sleep in the house, undertaking that Mr. Fairlie should have no trouble thrust upon him, and should sign them with his own hand.

I occupied the interval-day as the farm in writing a plain narrative of the events which are in adding to it a statement of the practical conclusion which facts offered to the assertion of Laura's claims. On the morning when Mr. Kyrle before I read it, the next day, to the assembled tenants. My object was to have ready in which the evidence should be presented at the close of the reading. After these matters were settled, Mr. Kyrle left Limmeridge after a conversation next to Laura's affairs. Knowing, and desiring to know, nothing of those affairs, and doubting whether I was competent as a man of business, of my conduct in relation to my wife's life-interest in the legacy left to Madame Fosco, I begged Mr. Kyrle to excuse me if I abstained from discussing the subject. It was connected, as I could tell him, with painful events and troubles of the past which we never referred to among ourselves, and which I was instinctively shrunk from discussing with others.

My last labor, as the evening approached, was to obtain Mr. Fairlie's signature to the narrative," by taking a copy of the false inscription on the grave before it was erased.

The day came—the day when Laura once more entered the familiar breakfast-room at Limmeridge House. The tenants assembled and rose from their seats as Marian and I led her in. They expressed, not by words, but by a confused murmur of interest, ran through them at the sight of her face. Mr. Fairlie was present (by my express desire) at the head of the table. On his side sat Mr. Gilmore, who had arrived from Carlisle by the early train, and who had been specially retained to act as my legal adviser. Behind him with a smelling-bottle ready in one hand, and a white handkerchief, stood Mrs. Vesey, in full mourning, in full silence.

I opened the proceedings by publicly appealing to Mr. Fairlie to say whether I appeared there with his authority and under his express protection. His answer was given in a few words to Mr. Kyrle and to his valet; was by them assisted to stand on his legs; and then expressed himself in short and feeble terms to the effect that Mr. Hartright. I am as great an invalid as ever, and he is so very obliging as to speak for me. The tenants will therefore have the goodness. Please hear him; and don't make a noise!" With those words, he slowly sank back again into the chair, and took refuge in his vinaigrette bottle.

My disclosure of the conspiracy followed—after I had offered my preliminary explanation, first of all, in the fewest and the plainest words. It was there proved to the tenants that I had to declare, first, that my wife, then sitting by me, was the daughter of the late Mr. Philip Fairlie; secondly, to read the narrative of Anne Catherick's mental which they had attended in Limmeridge church-yard was the funeral of another woman; thirdly, to give them a plain account of how I had all happened. Without further preface, I began to read the narrative, from the beginning, describing it in clear outline, and dwelling only upon the pecuniary motive for it, in order to avoid complicating my statement by unnecessary reference to Sir Percival's secret. This done, I reminded my audience of the date of "Lady Glyde's" death, recorded on the inscription in the church-yard (the 28th of July); and confirmed its correctness by producing the doctor's certificate. I then read them Sir Percival's letter announcing his wife's intended journey from Hampshire to London on the 25th, and dated from Blackwater on the 28th—the very day when the certificate asserted her decease in St. Edwin's Vicar. I next referred briefly to what I actually taken that journey, by the personal testimony of the driver of the fly; and I proved that she had performed it on the day appointed in her husband's letter, by the evidence of the order-book at the livery-stables. Marian, at my request, next added her own statement of the meeting between Laura and herself at the middle-house, and of her sister's escape. After which I closed the proceedings by informing the persons present of Sir Percival's death, and of my marriage.

Mr. Kyrle rose, when I resumed my seat, and declared, as the legal master of the family, that my case was proved by the plainest evidence he had ever heard in his life. As he spoke those words, I put my hand round Laura, and kissed her so that she was plainly visible to every one in the room. "Are you all of the same opinion?" I asked, without looking toward them a few steps and pointing to my wife.

The effect of that question was electrical. For down at the lower end of the room one of the oldest tenants on the estate started to his feet, and led the cry with him in an instant. I see the man now, with his honest brown face and his iron-gray hair, mounted on the window-seat, swinging his heavy sticks triumphantly over his head, and leading the cheers. "There she is, alive and hearty—God bless her! Gi' it tongue, lads! Gi' it tongue!" In a moment that answered him, reiterated again and again, was the sweetest music I ever heard. The laborers in the village, and the boys from the school assembled on the lawn, caught up the cheering and echoed it back as I led my wife down the room round Laura, and struggled which should be first to shake hands with her, and to implore her, with the honest words in their own rude phrases, to bear up bravely, and not to cry. She was so completely overwhelmed that I was obliged to take her from me, and carry her to the door. There I gave her into Marian's care—Marian, who had never failed us yet, whose courageous self-control did not fail us now. Left by myself at the door, I invited all the persons present (after thanking them in Laura's name and mine) to follow me to the church-yard, and see the false inscription struck off the tombstone with their own eyes.

They all left the house, and all joined the throng of villagers collected round the grave, where the workman from Carlisle was waiting for us. In a breathless silence the first sharp stroke of the steel sounded on the marble. Not a voice spoke, not a head moved till those two little words, "Laura, Lady Glyde," had vanished from sight. Then there was a great burst of relief among the crowd, as if they felt that the last fetters of the conspiracy had been struck off Laura herself, when the assembly slowly dispersed. It was late in the day before the whole inscription was erased. One line only was afterward engraved in its place: "Anne Catherick, July 28, 1850."

I returned to Limmeridge House early enough in the afternoon to write to Walter Hartright, and his clerk, and the driver of the fly, went back to London by the night-train. In their departure an insolent message was delivered to me from Mr. Fairlie—who had been carried home in his chair—to the effect that, considering the first outbreak of cheering answered my appeal to the tenantry. The message conveyed to me "Mr. Fairlie's compliments," and requested to know whether "we contemplated stopping in the house." I sent back word that that only object in which I was interested—the doors was accomplished; that I contemplated stopping in no man's house but my own; and that Mr. Fairlie need not entertain the slightest apprehension of ever seeing us, or hearing from us, again. Having sent this word to our friend's farm to rest that night; and the next morning —escorted to the station, with the heartiest enthusiasm and goodwill, by the whole village, and by all the farmers in the neighborhood—we returned to London.

As we rode of the Cumberland hills faded in the distance I thought of the first disheartening circumstances under which the long struggle that was now over had been gloriously ended. It was strange to look back and to see, now, that the prospect was as dark as ever, and the help of assistance had been the indirect means of our success, by forcing me to act for myself. If we had been left to the help of others, to what would have been the result? The gain (on Mr. Kyrle's own showing) would have been more than doubtful—judging by the event—on plain test of events as they had really happened —certain. The Law would never have moved a step for my wife and Mrs. Catherick. The Law would never have made Fosco the means of forcing a confession from the Count.

Two more events remain to be added to the chain before it reaches fairly from the outset of the story to the close.

While one sense of freedom from the long oppression of the past was still strange to us, I was sent for by the friend who had given me my first employment in the wood engraving to receive from him a fresh testimony of his regard for me in the shape of a request from certain of his employers to go to Paris, and to examine for them a French discovery in the art of wood engraving. I do not know what it was which they were anxious to ascertain. His own engagements had not allowed him leisure time to undertake the errand, and he had most kindly suggested that it should be transferred to me. I could have no hesitation in thankfully accepting the offer; for if I acquitted myself of my commission as I hoped I should, the result would be a permanent engagement on the illustrated newspaper to which I was now only occasionally attended.

I received my instructions, and packed up for the journey the next day. On leaving Laura I once more (under what changed circumstances!) in her sister's care, a serious consideration recurred to me, which had more than once crossed my wife's mind, as well as my own, already —I mean the consideration of Marian's future. Had we any right to let our selfish affection accept the sacrifice of all that generous life? Was it not our duty, our best expression of gratitude, to forget ourselves, and to think only of her? I tried to say these words when we were alone for a moment, before I went away. She took my hand, and silenced me with a look and a word.

"After all that we three have suffered together," she said, "there can be no parting between us till the last day of all. It is the condition of my happiness. Walter, are with Laura and you. With a little, till there are children's voices at your fireside. I will teach them to speak for me in their language; and the first lesson they shall learn from their aunt and mother shall be, 'We can't spare our aunt?'"

My journey to Paris was not undertaken alone. At the eleventh hour Pesca decided that he would accompany me. He had not recovered all his customary cheerfulness since the night at the Opera, and he determined to try what a week's holiday would do to raise his spirits.

I performed the errand intrusted to me, and drew out the necessary report, on the fourth day from our arrival in Paris. The fifth day I arranged to devote to sight-seeing and amusement in Pesca's company.

Our lodgings had been too full to accommodate us both on the same floor. My room was on the second story, and Pesca's was above me, on the third. At the morning of the fifth day I went up stairs to see if the Professor was ready to go out. Just before I reached the landing I saw his door open, and from that point, in a long, delicate, nervous hand (not my friend's hand certainly) held it ajar. At the same time I heard Pesca's voice speaking rapidly in his house, and in his own language: "I remember the name. But I don't know the name. I was not at the Opera, he was so changed that I could not recognize him. I will forward the report—I can do no more than that." "No more time?" answered a second voice. The door opened wide, and the light-haired man with the scar on his cheek—the man I had seen following Count Fosco's cab a week before—came out. He bowed as I drew aside to let him pass; his face was flushed and pale, and he left the top by the bolsters as he descended the stairs.

I pushed open the door and entered Pesca's room. He rose to crouched up, in the strangest manner, in a corner of the sofa. He seemed to think I had come to thrash him, when I approached him.

"Am I disturbing you?" I asked. "I did not know you had a friend with you till I saw him come out."

"No friend," said Pesca, eagerly. "I see him to-day for the first time and the last."

"I am afraid he his brought you bad news?"

"Horrible news, Walter! Let us go back to London; I don't want to stop here. I am sorry I ever came. The mysteriousness of my youth are very hard upon me," he said, turning his face to the wall; "very hard upon me in my later time. I try to forget them, and they will not forget me?"

"We can't return, I am afraid, before the afternoon," I replied. "Would you like to come out with me, and try to forget it?"

"No, my friend; I will wait here. But let us go back to-day—pray let us go back."

I left him with the assurance that he should leave Paris that afternoon. We had arranged, by correspondence, to meet at the Luxembourg at Notre-Dame, with Victor Hugo's noble romance for our guide. There was nothing in the French capital that I was more anxious to see, and I departed by myself for the church.

Approaching Notre-Dame by the river-side, I passed, on my way, the northern quay-side of Paris—the Morgue. A great crowd clamored and heaved round the door. There was evidently something to see which excited the strongest curiosity, and fed the popular appetite for horror.

I stretched across the walked on as I left it the conversation of two men and a woman on the outskirts of the crowd had not caught my ear. They had given me some out-lines of the sight in the Morgue; and the account they were giving of the dead body to their neighbors described it as the corpse of a man—a tall man—of gigantic size, with a strange mark on his left arm.

The moment I heard the words could not stopped, and took my place with the crowd going in. Some dim foreshadowing of the truth seemed to rise in my mind when I heard Pesca's voice through the open door, and when I saw the stranger's face as he passed me on the stairs of the house. But the truth itself was revealed to me—revealed in the chance words that had just reached my ears. Other vengeance than mine had fallen upon fatal man from the theatre to his own door; from his own door to his refuge in Paris. Other vengeance than mine had called him to the day of reckoning, and had exacted from him the penalty of his life. The moment when I had painted him over Pesca at the theatre, in the hearing of that stranger by our side, who was looking for him too, was the moment that he had died his doom. I reproached the struggle in my own heart when he and I stood face to face—the struggle before I could let him escape me—and shuddered as I recalled it.

Slowly, inch by inch, I pressed in with the crowd, moving nearer and nearer to the great glass screen that parts the dead from the living at the Morgue—nearer and nearer, till I was close behind the front row of spectators, and could look in.

There he lay, unowned, unknown—exposed to the flippant curiosity of a French mob—there was the dreadful end of that long life of degraded ability and heartless crime! Hushed in the sublime repose of death, the broad, firm, massive face and head fronted us so grandly that the chattering Frenchwomen about me lifted their hands in admiration, and cried, in shrill cheeres, "Ah, what a handsome man!" The wound that had killed him had been struck with a knife or dagger exactly over his heart. No other traces of violence appeared about the body, except on the left arm; and there, exactly in the place where I had seen the brand on Pesce's arm, were two deep cuts in the shape of the letter T, which entirely obliterated the mark of the Brotherhood. His clothes hung above him, showed that he had been himself conscious of his danger—they were clothes that had disguised him as a French artisan. For a few moments, but not for longer, I forced myself to see these things through the glass screen. I can write of them at no greater length, for I saw no more.

The few facts in connection with his death, which I subsequently ascertained (partly from Pesce and partly from other sources), may be stated here, before the subject is dismissed from these pages.

His body was taken out of the Seine, in the disguise which I have described; nothing being found on him which revealed his name, his rank, or his place of abode. The hand that struck him was never traced, and the circumstances under which he was killed were never discovered. I leave others to draw their own conclusions in reference to the secret of the assassination, as I have drawn mine. When I have intimated that the foreigner with the scar was a Member of the Brotherhood (admitted in Italy, after Pesce's departure from his native country), and when I have further added that the two cuts, in the form of a T, on the left arm of the dead man, signified the Italian word "Traditore," and showed that justice had been done by the Brotherhood on a Traitor, I have contributed all that I know toward elucidating the mystery of Count Fosco's death.

The body was identified the day after I had seen it by means of an anonymous letter addressed to his wife. He was buried by Madame Fosco, in the cemetery of Père la Chaise. Fresh funeral wreaths continue to this day to be hung on the ornamental bronze railings round the tomb by the Countess's own hand. She lives in the strictest retirement at Versailles. Not long since she published a Biography of her deceased husband. The work throws no light whatever on the name that was really his own, or on the secret history of his life; it is almost entirely devoted to the praise of his domestic virtues, the assertion of his rare abilities, and the enumeration of the honors conferred on him. The circumstances attending his death are very briefly noticed; and are summed up on the last page in this sentence: "His life was one long assertion of the rights of the aristocracy, and the sacred principles of Order—and he died a Martyr to his cause."

III.

The summer and autumn passed, after my return from Paris, and brought no changes with them which need be noticed here. We lived so simply and quietly that the income which I was now steadily earning sufficed for all our wants.

In the February of the new year our first child was born—a son. My mother and sister and Mrs. Vesey were our guests at the little christening party, and Mrs. Clements was present to assist my wife on the same occasion. Marian was our boy's godmother, and Pesce and Mr. Gilmore (the latter acting by proxy) were his godfathers. I may add here, that, when Mr. Gilmore returned to us, a year later, he assisted the design of these pages, at my request, by writing the Narrative which appears early in the story under his name, and which, though the first in order of precedence, was thus, in order of time, the last that I received.

The only event in our lives which now remains to be recorded occurred when our little Walter was six months old.

At that time I was sent to Ireland to make sketches for certain forthcoming illustrations in the newspaper to which I was attached. I was away for nearly a fortnight, corresponding regularly with my wife and Marian, except during the last three days of my absence, when my movements were too uncertain to enable me to receive letters. I performed the latter part of my journey back at night, and when I reached home in the morning, to my utter astonishment, there was no one to receive me. Laura and Marian and the child had left the house on the day before my return.

A note from my wife, which was given to me by the servant, only increased my surprise, by informing me that they had gone to Limmeridge House. Marian had prohibited any attempt at written explanations—I was entreated to follow them the moment I came back—complete enlightenment awaited me on my arrival in Cumberland—and I was forbidden to feel the slightest anxiety in the mean time. There the note ended.

It was still early enough to catch the morning train. I reached Limmeridge House the same afternoon.

My wife and Marian were both up stairs. They had established themselves (by way of completing my amazement) in the little room which had been once assigned to me for a studio when I was employed on Mr. Fairlie's drawings. On the very chair which I used to occupy when I was at work Marian was sitting now, with the child industriously sucking his coral upon her lap; while Laura was standing by the well-remembered drawing-table which I had so often used, with the little album that I had filled for her in past times open under her hand.

"What in the name of Heaven has brought you here?" I asked. "Does Mr. Fairlie know—?"

Marian suspended the question on my lips by telling me that Mr. Fairlie was dead. He had been struck by paralysis, and had never rallied after the shock. Mr. Kyrle had informed them of his death, and had advised them to proceed immediately to Limmeridge House.

Some dim perception of a great change dawned on my mind. Laura spoke before I had quite realized it. She stole close to me to enjoy the surprise which was still expressed in my face.

"My darling Walter," she said, "must we really account for our boldness in coming here? I am afraid, love, I can only explain it by breaking through our rule and referring to the past."

"There is not the least necessity for doing any thing of the kind," said Marian. "We can be just as explicit, and much more interesting, by referring to the future." She rose, and held up the child, kicking and crowing in her arms. "Do you know who this is, Walter?" she asked, with bright tears of happiness gathering in her eyes.

"Even my bewilderment has its limits," I replied. "I think I can still answer for knowing my own child."

"Child!" she exclaimed, with all her easy gayety of old times. "Do you talk in that familiar manner of one of the landed gentry of England? Are you aware, when I present this august baby to your notice, in whose presence you stand? Evidently not! Let me make two eminent personages known to one another: Mr. Walter Hartright—the Heir of Limmeridge.

So she spoke. In writing those last words I have written all. The pen falters in my hand; the long, happy labor of many months is over! Marian was the good angel of our lives—let Marian end our Story.

THE END.

THE RACE-HORSE "BOURBON."

BOURBON, the subject of the accompanying illustration, is a very promising three-year-old, and the winner of the two-mile race on Fashion Course, Long Island, June 22, 1860.

He is the property of T. Puryear, Esq., of Charleston, South Carolina, who has great confidence in his future career on the turf. Like Nickalas, he was sired by Obscot, out of Fleur-de-lis; and possesses all the requisite points of a racer in an eminent degree. His color is dark-brown, with black legs, mane, and tail; his form tall, strong, and race-looking. In the two-mile race on the Fashion Course his opponent, Irona, though well-ridden, had neither the stride nor the bottom of this magnificent colt, who won easily in 3 minutes 34½ seconds.

THE RACE-HORSE "BOURBON."—[DRAWN FROM LIFE BY T. C. CARPENDALE, ESQ.]

THE VIRGIN.

EVERY reader of medieval history has heard of the instrument of torture called the Virgin. An English curiosity-hunter, Mr. Pearsall, has lately discovered one of these ancient Virgins, and publishes an engraving of it, which we copy on page 573. Mr. Pearsall says of it:

"From the engraving, which represents the interior, it is evident that the front of the figure opened like folding-doors, the two halves of the front part being connected by hinges with the back part. On the inside of the right breast are thirteen quadrangular projections; on the left breast there are eight of these weapons, and two more project from the inside of the head. These look very much like the nails of a horse's shoe. These last were intended, it is supposed, to pierce the eyes of the victim, who, from this circumstance, is conjectured to have entered the machine backward, and in this position not known exactly how is what way the engine operated, the mechanism being so long detached, but there can be little doubt that it was similar in the same way as a similar figure called Mater Dolorosa—said to have been found in the Inquisition at Madrid—performed its ghastly offices. This latter instrument, in its ordinary appearance, was that of a female with her arms crossed on her bosom; but by mechanism the instant the arms were expanded, and then the inside of them was seen to be studded with small dirks. The person to be executed was placed opposite to her, breast to breast; then her arms, being clasped round his back by means of some powerful screwing implement, were made to grasp him tightly. While she held him thus a trap-door opened beneath his feet, and he was held suspended screaming and writhing gulf. In this situation he was importuned to confess his guilt until the increasing pressure of the machine had squeezed the life from his body, which was then released, and fell through the aperture into an oubliette."

THE AMERICAN PRISONER AT NAPLES.

SOME excitement was lately caused by the discovery, in the prison of San Francisco, at Naples, of a prisoner who at first could give no account of himself, and of whom no mention was made in the prison registers. It was currently reported that he was a second edition of the Man with the Iron Mask, who was imprisoned on account of his birth. Other accounts stated that he was an American. We give on page 573 a portrait of the poor fellow. He had been imprisoned four years at Rome and Naples: no charge had ever been brought against him: he had been starved, and his clothes had rotted off his back. When he was taken to the house of a benevolent Neapolitan he could hardly walk, was almost blind, and cried, in his bewilderment and confusion, "Where am I?"

His story was published in No. 189 of Harper's Weekly, dated July 28, page 503.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

ONE life at the Rosary—for it was our life now of which I have to speak—was one of unbroken enjoyment. On fine days we fished—that is, Crofton did—and I loitered along some river's bank till I found a quiet spot to plant my rod and stretch myself on the grass, now reading, oftener dreaming, such glorious dreams as only come in the leafy shading of summer time to a mind enraptured with all around it. The lovely scenery and the perfect solitude of the spot ministered well to my fanciful mood, and left me free to weave the most glittering web of incident for my future. So utterly was all the past blotted from my memory that I recalled nothing of existence more remote than my first evening at the cottage. If for a passing instant a thought of by-gones would obtrude, I hastened to escape from it as from a gloomy reminiscence. I turned away, as would a dreamer who dreaded to awaken out of some delicious vision, and who would not face the dull aspect of reality. Three weeks thus glided by of such happiness as I can scarcely yet recall without emotion! The Croftons had come to treat me like a brother; they spoke of family events in all freedom before me; talked of the most confidential things in my presence; and discussed their future plans and their means as freely in my hearing as though I had been kith and kin with them. I learned that they were orphans, educated and brought up by a rich, eccentric uncle, who lived in a sort of costly reclusion in one of the Cumberland dales: Edward, who had served in the army, and been wounded in an Indian campaign, had given up the service in a fit of impatience at being passed over in promotion. His uncle resented the rash step by withdrawing the liberal allowances he had usually made him, and they quarreled. Mary Crofton, espousing her brother's side, quitted her guardian's roof to join his, and thus had they rambled about the world for two or three years, on means scanty enough, but still sufficient to provide for those who neither sought to enter society nor partake of its pleasures.

As I advanced in the intimacy I became depository of the secrets of each. Edward's was the sorrow he felt for having involved his sister in his own ruin, and been the means of separating her from one so well able and willing to befriend her. He was the more bitter thought that their narrow means should prejudice her brother's chances of recovery, for his chest had shown symptoms of dangerous disease, requiring all that climate and consummate care might do to counteract. Preyed on incessantly by this reflection—unable to banish it, equally unable to resist its force—she took the first and only step in life she had ventured without his knowledge, and written to her uncle a long letter of explanations and entreaty.

I saw the letter; I read it and approved it. It was all that sisterly love and affection could dictate, accompanied by a sense of dignity, that if her appeal should be unsuccessful, no further should be passed upon her brother, who was unaware of the step that had been taken. To express this sufficiently, she was driven to the acknowledgment that Edward would never have himself stooped to the appeal; and so careful was she of his honor in this respect, that she repeated—with what appeared to me unnecessary insistence—that the request was entirely hers, and not as hers, and hers only. In fact, this was the uppermost sentiment in the whole epistle. I ventured to say as much, and endeavored to induce her to moderate in some degree the amount of this protestation; but she resisted firmly and decidedly. Now I have recorded this circumstance here—less for itself than to mention how by its means a little controversy led to a great intimacy between us, producing us, while defending our separate views, to discuss each other's motives, and even characters, with the widest freedom. I called her enthusiast, and in return she styled me worldly and calculating; and, indeed, I think we were so, and fortified my opinions by prudential maxims and severe reflection. I should have been sorely indisposed to adopt in my own case. I believe she saw all this.

I am sure she read me aright, and perceived that I was arguing against my own convictions. At all events, day after day went over, and no answer came to the letter. I used to go each morning to the post in the village to inquire, but always returned with the same disheartening tidings, "Nothing today!"

One of these mornings it was that I was returning disconsolately from the village, Crofton, whom I believed at the time miles away on the mountains, overtook me; he came up from behind, and passing his arm within mine, walked on for some minutes without speaking. I saw plainly there was something on his mind which he found difficult to open, and I half dreaded lest he might have discovered his sister's secret, and have disapproved of my share in her procedure.

"Algy," said he, calling me by my Christian name, which he very rarely did, "I have something to say to you if I only knew how to approach it. Can I be quite certain that you'll take my frankness in good part?"

"You can," said I, with a great effort to seem calm and assured.

"You give me your word upon it?"

"I do," said I, trying to appear bold; "and my hand be witness of it."

"Well," resumed he, drawing a long breath, "here it is: I have remarked that for above a week back you have never waited for the post-boy's return to the cottage, but always have come down to the village yourself."

I nodded assent, but said nothing.

"I have remarked besides," said he, "that when old Ivat at the office there was no letter for you, you came away sad-looking and fretted, scarcely spoke for some time, and seemed altogether downcast and depressed."

"I don't deny it," said I, calmly.

"Well," continued he, "some old experiences of mine have taught me that this sort of anxiety has generally but one source with fellows of our age, and which simply means that the remittance we have counted upon as certain has been, from some cause or other, delayed. Isn't that the truth?"

"No," said I, joyfully, for I was greatly relieved by his words; "no, on my honor, nothing of the kind."

"I may not have hit the thing exactly," said he, hurriedly, "but I'll be sworn it is a money matter, and if a couple of hundred pounds be of the least service—"

"My dear, kind-hearted fellow," broke I in, "I can't endure this longer; it is no question of money; it is nothing that affects my means, though I half wish it were, to show you how cheerfully I could owe you my escape from a difficulty—not, indeed, that I need another tie to bind me to you—" But I could say no more, for my eyes were swimming over, and my lips trembling.

"There," cried he, "I have only to ask pardon for thus obtruding upon your confidence. You'll forgive me, I hope."

I was too full of emotion to do more than squeeze his hand affectionately, and thus we walked along, side by side, neither uttering a word. At last, and, as it were, with an effort, by a bold transition to carry our thoughts into another and very different channel, he said, "Here's a letter from old Dyke, our landlord. The worthy father has been enjoying himself in a tour of English watering-places, and has now started for a few weeks up the Rhine. His account of his holiday, as he calls it, is amusing; nor less so is the financial accident to which he owes the excursion. Take it and read it," added he, giving me the epistle. "If the style be the man, his reverence is not difficult to decipher."

I bestowed little attention on this speech, uttered, as I perceived, rather from the impulse of starting a new topic than any thing else, and taking the letter half mechanically, I thrust it in my pocket. One or two efforts we made at conversation were equally failures, and it was a relief to me when Crofton, suddenly remembering some night-lines he had laid in a mountain lake a few miles off, hastily shook my hand, and said, "Good-by till dinner-time."

When I reached the cottage, instead of entering I strolled into the garden, and sought out a little summer-house of sweet-brier and honey-suckle, on the edge of the river. Some strange, vague impression was on me that I needed time and place to commune with myself and be alone; that a large unsettled account lay between me and my conscience, which could not be longer deferred, but of what nature, how originating, and how tending, I know nothing whatever.

I resolved, however, to submit myself to a regular interrogatory, by a close and searching examination, to ascertain what I might about myself. In my favorite German authors I had frequently read that men's failures in life were chiefly owing to neglect of this habit of self-investigation; that though we calculate well the dangers and difficulties of an enterprise, we omit the more important estimate of what may be our own capacity to effect an object, what are our resources, wherein our deficiencies.

"Now for it," thought I, as I entered the little arbor—"now for it, Potts; kiss the book, and tell the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

As I said this I took off my hat and bowed respectfully around to the members of an imaginary court. "My name," said I, in a clear and respectful voice, "is Algernon Sydney Potts. If I be pushed to the avowal, I am sorry it is Potts! Algernon Sydney do a deal, but they can't do every thing—not to say that captains folk see a certain bathos in the collocation with my surname. Can a man hope to make such a name illustrious? Can he aspire to the notion of a time when people will allude to the great Potts, the celebrated Potts, the immortal Potts?' I grew very red, I felt my cheek on fire as I uttered this, and I suddenly bethought me of Mr. Fitt, and I said aloud, "And if Fitt, why not Potts?" That was a most healing recollection. I revelled in it for a long time. "How true is it," said I, "that the halo of greatness illumines all within its circle, and the man is merged in the grandeur of his achievements! The men who start in life with high-sounding designations have but to fulfill a foregone pledge to pay the bill that Fortune has indorsed. Not so was our case, Pitt. To us is it to lay every foundation-stone of our future greatness. How much more thinking in your surname to foretell you would be a Minister of State at one-and-thirty—there is no letter in mine to indicate that I should be. But what is it that I am to be? Is it Poet, Philosopher, Politician, Soldier, or Discoverer? Am I to be great in Art, or illustrious in Letters? Is there to be an ice tract of Behring's Straits called Potts's Point, or a planet styled Portman Sidus? And when centuries have rolled over, will historians have their difficulty about the first Potts, and what his opinions were on this subject or that?"

Then came a low soft sound of half-suppressed laughter, and then the rustle of a muslin dress hastily brushing through the trees. I rushed out from my retreat and hurried down the walk. No one to be seen—not a soul, not a sound, either, to be heard.

"No use hiding, Mary," I called out, "I saw you all the time; my mock confession was got up merely to amuse you. Come out boldly and laugh at me to your will." No answer to the refusal amazed me. It was like a disbelief in my assertion. "Come, come!" I cried, "you can't intend to think I was serious in all that vainglorious nonsense. Come, Mary,—

We enjoy the light, it together."

I shall be angry. I'll take it ill—very ill."

Still no reply. Could I, then, have been deceived? Was it a mere delusion? Had I but heard the low laugh, and the rustle of the dress, and the quick tread upon the gravel, too plainly for my mistake, and so I returned to the cottage in chagrin and ill-temper. As I passed the open windows of the little drawing-room I saw Mary seated at her work, with, as was her custom, an open book on a little table beside her. Absorbed as she was, she did not lift her head nor notice my approach till I entered the room.

"You have no letter for me?" cried she, in a voice of sorrowful meaning.

"None," said I, scrutinizing her closely, and sorely puzzled what to make of her self-command. "Have you been out in the garden this morning?" asked I, abruptly.

"No," said she, frankly.

"Not quitted the house at all?"

"No. Why do you ask?" cried she, in some surprise.

"I'll tell you," said I, sitting down at her side, and speaking in a low and confidential tone, "a strange thing has just happened to me. And with that I narrated the incident, glossing over, as best I might, the absurdity of my self-quizing, and the nature of the self-examination I was engaged in. Without waiting for me to finish, she broke in suddenly with a low laugh, and said,

"It must have been Rose."

"And what is Rose?" asked I, half sternly.

"A cousin of ours, a mere school-girl, who has just arrived. She came by the mail this morning when you were out. But here she is, coming up the walk. Just step behind that screen, and you shall have your revenge. I'll make her tell every thing."

I had barely time to conceal myself in my ambush when, with a merry laugh, a fresh, girlish voice called out, "I've seen him! I've seen him, Mary! I was sitting on the rock beside the river when he came into the summer-house, and, evidently fancying himself alone and unseen, proceeded to make his confession to himself."

"His confession! How do you mean? or of what?"

"Well, I don't exactly know whether that be the proper name for it, but it was a sort of self-examination, not very painful, certainly, inasmuch as it was rather flattering than otherwise."

"I really can not understand you, Rose."

"I'm not surprised," said she, laughing again. "It was some time before I could satisfy myself that he was not talking to somebody else, or reading out of a book, and when, peeping through the leaves, I perceived he was quite alone, I almost screamed out with laughing."

"But why, child? What was the absurdity that amused you?"

"Fancy the creature. I need not describe him, Molly. You know him well, with his great blazing lignum eyes, and his wild yellow hair. Imagine his walking madly to and fro, tossing his long arms about in uncouth gestures, while he asked himself seriously whether he wouldn't be Shakspeare, or Milton, or Michael Angelo, or Nelson. Fancy his gravely inquiring of himself what remarkable qualities predominated in his nature: was he more of a sculptor, or a politician, or had fate destined him to discover new worlds, or to conquer the old ones! If I hadn't been actually listening to the creature, and occasionally looking at him, too, I'd have doubted my senses. Oh dear! shall I ever forget the earnest gravity of his manner as he said something about the 'immortal Potts.'"

The utterance was too much for her, for she threw herself on a sofa, and laughed immoderately. As for me, unable to endure more, and fearful that Mary might finish by discovering me, I stole from the room and rushed out into the wood.

What is it that renders ridicule more insupportable than vituperation? Why is the virulence of passion itself more easy to endure than the sting of sarcastic satire? What weak spot in our nature does this peculiar passion assail? And again, why are all the noble aspirations of high-hearted enthusiasm, the grand self-reliance of daring minds, ever to be made the theme of such scoffings? Have the sconners never read of Wolfe, of Murat, or of Nelson? Has not a more familiar instance reached them of one who foretold to an unwilling senate the time when they would hang in expectancy on his words, and treasure them as wisdom? Cool, narrow-minded, and unjust world, with whom nothing succeeds except success!

The man who contracts a debt is never called cheat till his inability to discharge it has been proclaimed clearly and beyond a doubt; but he who enters into an engagement with his own heart to gain a certain prize, or reach a certain goal, is made a mockery and a scorn if he will waive own humble faculties represent such striving as impossible. From thoughts like these I went on to speculate whether I should ever be able, in the zenith of my great success, to forgive those captious and disparaging critics who had once endeavored to damp my ardor and bar my career. I own I found it exceedingly difficult to be generous, and in particular to that young minx of sixteen who had dared to make a jest of my pretensions.

I wandered along thus for hours. Many a grassy path of even sward led through the forest, and taking one of those which skirted the stream, I strolled along, unconscious alike of time and space. Out of the purely personal interests which occupied my mind I felt others, and I found myself one with a grim satisfaction of the severe lesson Mary must have ere this read from my pale and haggard face and flippancy, telling her, in stern accents, how behind that screen the man was standing she had dared to make the subject of her ridicule. Oh, how she blushes! what flush of crimson shame spreads over her face, her temples, and her neck! what tears overflow her eyes, and fall along her cheeks! I actually pity her suffering, and am pained at her grief.

"Sorry, dear Mary!" I cry out; "after all, she is but a child. Why blame her that she can not measure greatness, as philosophers measure mountains, by the shadow?"

Egotism, in every one of its moods and tenses, must have a strong fascination. At least, I walked on for many a mile while thus thinking, without the slightest sense of weariness, or any craving for food. The forenoon had worn away, the hot noon was passed, and the day was sobering down into the more solemn tints of evening, ere, while thus I had strayed, or lay in the tall grass, still deep in my musings.

In taking my handkerchief from my pocket I accidentally drew forth the priest's letter, and in a sort of half-indolent curiosity proceeded to read it. The writing was a remarkably neat one, what rugged one, the writing of a man to whom the manual part of correspondence is a heavy task, and one which generally evinces such labor as rarely as is possible. As for the composition, it had all the charm of ease, and was as unstudied as need be, the writer being evidently one who cared little for the graces of style, satisfied to discuss his subject in the familiar terms of his ordinary conversation.

Although I do not mean to impose more than an extract from it on my readers, I must reserve even that much for my next chapter.

FATE AND A HEART.

It was midnight when I listened,
And I heard two voices speak;
One was harsh, and stern, and cruel,
And the other soft and weak:
Yet I saw no visior mine,
And I heard no steps depart
Of this Tyrant and his Captive—
Fate it might be and a Heart.

Thus the stern voice spoke in triumph:
"I have shut you from the light
From the radiant world of nature
And the perfumed light of day.
You, who loved to steep your spirit
In the charm of beauty's delight,
See no glory of the day-time,
And no sweetness of the night."

But the soft voice answered calmly:
"Nay; for when the March winds bring
Just a whisper to my heart
I can dream the rest of spring;
And to-day I saw a swallow
Flitting past my prison bars,
And my cell has just one corner
Whence at night I see the stars."

But its bitter taunt repeating,
Cried the harsh voice: "Where are they—
All the friends of former hours
Who forget your name to-day?
All the links of love are shattered,
Which you thought so strong before,
And your life is doubly lonely
And alone, since loved no more."

But the low voice spake still lower:
"Nay! I know the golden chain
Of my love is purer, stronger,
For the cruel fire of pain:
They remember me no longer,
But I, grieving here alone,
Bind their souls to me forever,
By the love within my own."

But the one cried: "Once, remember,
You devoted soul and mind
To the welfare of your brethren,
To the service of your kind:
Now, while sorrow wrings you comfort,
You, who lie in helpless pain,
With an impotent compassion,
Fretting out your life in vain?"

"Nay;" and then the gentle answer
Rose more loud and full and clear:
"For the sake of all my brethren,
I thank God that I am here!
Poor had been my life's best efforts,
Now I waste no thought or breath;
For the prayer of those who suffer
Has the strength of love and death."

Gift Book House.

Gifts Gifts Gifts to all who buy Books at Evans's Gift Book Store, 677 Broadway, New York. Established in 1854. Sixth year of the Enterprise. Agents will take Notice as to our Terms. A Gift worth from 50 cents to $100. Every one sure of the full value of their outlay, and many often receive a hundred-fold in the form of a rich Gift. Send for a Catalogue. It costs nothing. Mailed free to all.

Our Descriptive Catalogue gives a full list of all useful, scientific, and entertaining works in print, with description of size, binding, and price. Is invaluable as a guide in the selection of reading matter, or in the formation of a Library.

It is mailed free to any address, on application. It contains a full explanation of our business, our terms to Agents, and directions how to send for books and receive them without delay in transmission of money or books to their destination.

We would take occasion to state, that our facilities for business are unsurpassed by any house in the country. Having established our business in 1854, we have now entered the sixth year of the enterprise, with capital and experience to conduct our trade with greater facility than ever heretofore.

Agents are particularly requested to examine our inducements for the Fall and Winter Trade of 1860-61, confident they are unprecedented by any previous offers; and would request the attention of book agents generally, as heavier subscriptions can be made than by any other mode of selling books.

Any person can act as Agent by soliciting subscriptions among friends or acquaintances, and forming a club; and by economising leisure moments any person may lay the foundation for a valuable Library, obtain an elegant Watch, or some other article valuable for a lifetime.

Health of American Women.
The Graefenberg Company was organized under an Act of Legislature fifteen years ago, and it has become one of the most widely known and firmly established medical institutions in the country, and in its reputation for skill, integrity, and confidence, it challenges comparison with any other medical organization in the world.
Some years ago the following testimony from high authority in the literary and religious community was received:

My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Graefenberg Company justifies me in expressing the opinion that the medicines are worthy of confidence.
FRANCIS HALL,
Editor and Proprietor N. York Commercial Advertiser.

I hereby certify that I have examined a number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they present evidences of genuineness, and are entitled to the confidence and favor of the public. N. BANGS, D.D., of the Methodist Church.

Since then, one of the leading Graefenberg medicines has been re-
MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.
This valuable remedy positively invariably cures all those torturing, perplexing, and debilitating symptoms commonly known as female disease, weakness, irregularities, local derangements and their constitutional sympathies, which weary and render unhappy so many women between the ages of 15 and 50, for which the usual prescription seeks in vain for a remedy, and from which wealth, position, family, and influence offer no exemption.

The New American Watch.

IN ORDER TO MEET THE REQUIREMENTS OF gentlemen who prefer a thinner watch than those usually made by us, we have lately issued a new style of watch on the three-quarter plate model, especially designed for this purpose.

In establishing this new series, it has also been our design to produce a watch in every way superior to the best and highest priced products of the most reputable of English and Swiss watch manufacturers; and no labor or expense has been spared to this end.

In all respects of fine and durable material, of external and internal finish, of accurate compensation and adjustment, of mathematically just proportions, and of practical results, our new three-quarter plate watch challenges comparison with any in the world.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IV.—NO. 194.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"AND I GUESS IT ISN'T EV'RY DAY YOU HAVE A CHANCE TO SEE, IN YOUR LITTLE ISLAND OVER THERE, A FINER BIRD THAN ME."

"THEY'RE AWFUL SAVAGE CRITTERS, 'N MAYBE JEST TO BE PERLITE, HE'LL CHUCK A NIGGER IN THE CAGE, AND LET YOU SEE 'M FIGHT."

The American Eagle to the Prince.

GOD bless your little Highness, I'm tremendous glad you've come;
And how's your sovereign mother and all the folks to hum?
'Twas a mighty putty notion that of openin' Windsor gates,
And sendin' you a visitin' to these United States.
'Tain't ev'ry day we run across a real genuine scion
Of that fine old honest friend of mine, the Royal British Lion;
And I guess it isn't ev'ry day you have a chance to see,
In your little island over there, a finer bird than me.

We're mighty independent folks, and I think it's like enough
You'll find the Yankee manners maybe just a trifle rough;
And perhaps your princely eyes may see some rather curious things,
(For we haven't had of late years much to do, you know, with kings),
And perhaps your princely hand may get a mite too hard a squeeze,
It's the way we're apt to worry gents that come across the seas;
But don't be backward, Albert, you'll agree before we part,
That the coarsest humspun jacket often holds the warmest heart.

I expect that you'll be apt to be most awfully amazed,
To hear the States ere bigger than the land where you was raised;
And maybe you wouldn't believe that a man would have to go
Two thousand miles from Maine to reach the Gulf of Mexico;
And that Missouri water runs down the Western plain,
Out of the land of sunset, more'n twice as fur again.
I know a Mister Boz, who's a regular London swell,
Wrote in a book about the yarns Amerikins love tu tell,
But your Royal Highness needn't depend upon that sort of teachin',
For every word I'm sayin' tu you is jest as true as preachin'.
We've lots of things to show you that a Britisher 'll admire,
From a Massachusetts dough-nut to a prairie afire;
And we'll take you out a gunnin', it mought be sumthin' new
To tell your ma as how you bagged a buffalo or two.
But the nicest show is Washington—that celebrated den
In Uncle Sam's menagerie, where he keeps his roarin' men.
They're awful savage critters, 'n maybe jest to be perlite,
He'll chuck a nigger in the cage, and let you see 'm fight.
I guess they ain't so much fer brains, but if it came to muscle,
They could knock your little Palmerston right slap through Johnny Russell;
I wish they'd gét a hóld on Brougham, fer really I must say,
'Twas a real scurvy trick he cum on Dallas t'other day;
And I guess, you will allow, 'twasn't quite the handsome thing
To make a friendly minister a butt fer sich a fling.
But don't let's talk about it, fer it's no use blamin' you,
Fer all the spiteful meannesses your stuck-up servants do;

"AND PERHAPS YOUR PRINCELY HAND MAY GET A MITE TOO HARD A SQUEEZE."

"BUT BE AMAZIN' CAREFUL, FER THERE'S LOTS OF CUSSIN' GIRLS."

But jest you tell his lordship, as a piece of good advice,
That this 'ere Eagle's not the bird to take an insult twice;
And that this 'ere Eagle's not the bird to stop with bolts and bars
When he sees a feller sneerin' at the Yankee stripes and stars.
Then make yerself to hum, sonny, and go upon the plan
Of getting all your money's worth and seein' all you can.
But be amazin' careful, fer there's lots of cunnin' girls,
With the softest eyes, the sweetest lips, and sunniest kind of curls,
That'll tangle a feller up so quick, it isn't a bit of use,
Even allowin' he wants to, of strugglin' to git loose.

And when you git to England, to her Majesty the Queen,
Give my very best regards to her, and tell her what you've seen,
And how glad we were to see you, and if she'll cum over tew,
Till make a speech to welcum her like this I've made to yew.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1860.

WHAT WE ARE DOING FOR THE WORLD.

WITH his usual sagacity the Emperor of the French has suspended the operation of the French tariff, so that American grain now enters France duty free. The French harvest has proved a failure; but the admission of American wheat and corn free of duty will prevent prices rising to the famine level, and will guarantee the empire against a general scarcity of food.

England not only took the same step, but made it a part of the permanent laws of the realm fourteen years ago. In the year 1846 the ports of England were thrown open to foreign grain at a mere nominal rate of duty; and, in consequence, though there have been several short harvests in England since then, there has never been a famine; and this year, especially, the wheat crop seems to have failed utterly without raising the price of food beyond what used to be called a fair average.

Upon this country the effect of the crop failure in Europe must be very marked. It happens that for three years our great food-producing States have had short crops. This year, for the first time since 1856, we have enough and to spare. No man can tell how many bushels of wheat and corn will be produced in the United States in 1860. We may raise 300,000,000 or 600,000,000 of wheat, and 700,000,000 or 900,000,000 of corn; but it is quite certain that we shall raise enough not only to feed our own people and leave a surplus for next year, but likewise enough to supply the deficiency in Europe, so that prices in England and France shall rise no higher than they would have done had the crop been an average. This is real usefulness.

The figures of the grain movement in this country this year are surprising. We are now shipping to foreign ports from this port alone less less than a million dollars' worth of gold every week, and this is exclusive of corn which has not yet begun to go forward. But the actual figures tell the tale in the clearest manner, and we give them accordingly:

"GRAIN MOVEMENT.

	1859.	1860.
Shipments of Wheat from New York since January 1,.....	$38,250	$5,519,442
Shipments of Flour from New York since January 1,.....	2,341,057	5,419,100
Shipments of Corn from New York since January 1,.....	146,07	1,181,164
Grain received at Chicago since January 1,..... bushels	9,000,000	20,000,000
Grain Shipped at Chicago since January 1,..... bushels	6,000,000	17,000,000

The details of the movement seem almost incredible. Farmers who had sown wheat in the Western States and expected a crop, under favorable circumstances, of 20,000 bushels, have harvested 60,000 and 40,000. The Illinois Central Railroad carried, between 1st January and 1st July, 1860, more than twice as much grain as it carried in the whole year 1859. In 1859 the owners of shipping on the lakes were almost ruined; in 1860 every craft on the lakes is fully employed, and the want of tonnage is so grievous that wheat and flour are being shipped westward, in September, by rail. It seems pretty certain that we shall ship but little more corn to foreign parts than we ever shipped before, and that we shall do so without paying the usual penalty—that is to say, without raising the price of bread upon ourselves.

The cotton year terminated last week. We are now able to state that the crop of 1859 yielded 4,670,000 bales—that is to say, 670,000 bales more than the crop of 1858—which was the largest crop ever gathered. If we assume the bales to have averaged 450 pounds each, the cotton culture yielded in 1859–60 839,725,000 more than the enormous crop of 1858, and fully $65,000,000 more than the previous average. In the fiscal year 1858–9 our revenue from our export of cotton was so large that, notwithstanding the heavy importations of foreign goods, the national balance-sheet for the year showed a balance in our favor equal to about $20,000,000. The fiscal year 1859–60 will necessarily show a much larger balance in favor of this country; and notwithstanding the stories of drought which are circulated, there is reason to believe that the cotton crop this year will be large, and that the exports of our grain shipments will bring the aggregate of the exports of 1860–'61 up to the previous year's average.

No one can contemplate these figures without a feeling of exultation. These United States, which foreign statesmen are so fond of decrying, are actually feeding and clothing the world. Our politicians are covering each other with dirt; infamous Japanese swindles succeed shameful jobs at Washington; threats of disunion hurtle in the air; blind critics, looking on the scene from a distance, calmly predict universal ruin and chaos; and meanwhile the country goes on, yielding its millions of pounds of flour and cotton and grain and gold, and other necessaries of life, become itself steadily richer year by year, and saves England from famine and France from revolution. This is surely no mean destiny for a country.

THE PRINCE'S TROUBLES IN UPPER CANADA.

AT Canada is in an uproar because the Prince of Wales, following the example of the British Government in Ireland, refuses to recognize the Orange Societies. The Roman Catholics are triumphant, the Protestants furious, and there is every prospect of a bloody riot in some Canadian city.

On the face of it the Prince—or the Duke of Newcastle, who manages him—has the law and the right on his side. The Orangemen are a large Society, resting on the simple basis of loyalty to Popery. The Irish Island and in Canada they have made themselves conspicuous by destructive, not constructive tendencies. Since the Battle of the Boyne Orangemen have done very little but mischief in this world. They are peculiarly a sectarian and partisan body. Had the Prince recognized them, he could not consistently have refused to receive the Liberals, Conservatives, and Clear Grits, each in their puny political character, and the Protestant Society for converting the Papists, and the Jesuit Society for converting the Protestants. Evidently the wisest course was to ignore all these party parties and sectarian bodies, and to recognize no distinctions save those known to the law.

At the same time, before we denounce the Orangemen of Upper Canada, we must take into consideration the circumstances which give vitality to their organization.

Canada is ruled by a priest—a man of great tact, shrewdness, and knowledge, who is the Secretary of the Roman Catholic Archbishop. He rules the Assembly by the votes of those of the Catholic members of Parliament, who would as soon think of insulting the Host as disobeying their spiritual chief. He succeeded in bringing in a compact body, and knowing and caring little about political questions which do not affect their faith, control the Canadian Legislature. This is notorious in Canada; one can readily fancy how the Protestants of Upper Canada chafe under such a domination, and how they yield at last in order to avoid to avoid themselves in Orange Societies. This, however, is not all, nor is it the worst.

When the Pope persuaded the King of France, two hundred years ago, at the time of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, to issue another Edict forbidding Huguenots to settle in Canada, they took the first of a long series of extremely sagacious measures which were designed to render the province the absolute dominion of the Papal Church. From that day to this they have never wavered in their purpose. Knowing well that power, sooner or later, always follows property, they saved, and they proceeded—as they had done in England, France, Spain, and Italy—to acquire land. They required a fifth of the produce of land in sorts of ways. Large estates were given to various religious bodies by the French Crown on the consideration that the priests and nuns would convert the Indians. Others were presented to the Church by rich men with bad consciences; enormous amounts of property were acquired by device. In no country in the world was the doctrine more firmly settled than in Canada that a rich man could not better secure admission to the Kingdom of Heaven than by leaving a farm, or at least a potato patch, to the Church. Meanwhile the various communities of monks, nuns, friars, and brothers being extremely frugal and often self-supporting, the revenues of these lands accumulated year by year, and were reinvested in land. By the law of Canada—the old feudal custom of Paris, which is in force to this day—real estate owned by the Church is in mainmorte; it is literally in the grasp of death; it can not be sold. Thus ever acquiring, and never selling or wasting, the Roman Catholic Church of Lower Canada has come, after 200 years of unremitting execution, to own, directly or indirectly, an enormous proportion of all the productive real estate in the Province. The visitor to Montreal and Quebec is amazed to find that the choicest parts of both cities are walled gardens; these are for the priests and nuns to take the air in; everything they will be leased—not sold—for building lots. He would be still more amazed if he could inspect the land registers, and see how block after block, house after house, street after street, and ward after ward, are owned by the Church, and how small a proportion of the improved real estate in these cities is free from some irredeemable mortgage or perpetual rent or due to nuns, or friars, or bishops. It is the same in the country districts. A large proportion of the finest seigniories have been acquired by religious bodies; and of those which are owned by individuals, very many, if not the bulk, pay certain dues to the Church. At the time Charles the Third expelled the Jesuits from Spain, it was stated by Count Aranda that they owned one-third of the whole productive real estate in the kingdom: the statement was held by the civilized world to justify the harsh measure of the King. It probably is as true in fact that the archbishop, bishops, priests, monks, nuns, presbyteries, seminaries, and the other Catholic bodies of Lower Canada hold, among them, considerably more than a third of all the productive property in that Province.

All this must be borne in mind when we see the the excessive irritation of the Orangemen. It must be very provoking indeed, to see the progress of their country retarded and civilization retarded by the power of a Church which not only rules but owns most of the Province. If Catholic Spain was justified in expelling the Jesuits, and Italian Catholics in trying to beheads on the shore of Sardinia and Corsica, because their power and their wealth were inconsistent with the well-being of the country, surely Protestant Upper Canada may find some excuse for keeping up symbols and usages which the overthrow of Papal dominion has rendered odious elsewhere.

The Roman Catholic Priests will discover, sooner or later, that the world does move. They have been stripped in Spain and in Sardinia. They made a virtue of necessity, and gave up their property in France. The titles to their land in Rome and Naples are not precisely what they used to be considered quite. They are uncommonly shaky in Mexico. Canada is not going to be an exception to the general rule, and this Province may prove an epoch in the history of the end.

THE PROGRESS OF FASHION.

MOST of our lady readers, we suppose, have smiled over the pictures of the first French Empire; of the high-bred dames of Napoleon's court in plain white muslin, head-dresses, and waists under their armpits, short clinging skirts, and elaborately-wrought stockings. Few of them, perhaps, are aware that they are seemingly plain dresses of this very costume before they are many years older.

Fashion moves in a circle: the past always returns after a certain lapse of time to its own dimension. The indications of a return of the fashions of 1850–'10 at the present time are too decided to admit of any doubt, and we have informed that the shrewdest tailors and milliners are already on the chase of old engravings of the period.

There is no disputing about tastes or fashions, says the proverb. Custom is, in nine cases out of ten, the guide of all of us: that which is fashionable is the universal rule, and is new and original we consider grotesque. When hoops first came in all the world decreed them ugly. Then crinoline became quite shocking; now we laugh at any one who doesn't wear them. So it will be with the "Empire" fashion. They look outrageous now, those high waists, and scant draperies, and monstrous hats and helmets, and shoulder-of-mutton sleeves—how long will it take to make us think them pretty? short of these monstrous? Let the fashion purveyors answer. In the time of Madame Recamier and Madame Tallien—in the days of the Republic—before a belle of 1800 would have seemed as preposterous as a South Sea Islander dressed in a string of beads: yet art and letters prove that at bottom taste was as pure then as now.

We therefore advise our lady friends to lay in no great store of hoops, and long skirts, and close-fitting jackets—for who will have them when we are all à l'Empire? The world moves, and we must move with it. Modern fashion has even established two bad divisions for her dainty toes—and on each toe she wore one or more rings—it was then distingué for a lady to shuffle off her slippers in society, and pass the carpet or the floor with her pretty little feet. Let our belles look to it, those who can not afford to follow Madame Tallien's example must relinquish all hopes of social distinction.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CITY OF OTTAWA.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

MONTREAL, C. E., August 29, 1860.

IN your issue of the 18th September an article appears in relation to Ottawa which is likely to mislead a large number of those who know no better; and as your journal has an extended circulation, I tender the following correction:

When the last census was taken, Ottawa contained between 11,000 and 12,000, which was in 1855. It now contains over 15,000, without a doubt. I have the Mayor as authority for this last assertion. The lumber is not immediately surrounding the place, as you would lead your readers to surpose, but is floated every year for from 50 to 150 miles—this being the point where the money is mostly paid out and supplies bought in—but a good agricultural country immediately surrounds the city.

The Welsh family settled across the Ottawa River, at a place called Hull, where they still remain; but Ottawa commenced to build in 1837, when Colonel By commenced his work under Government, on the Rideau Canal. The place was selected by the Home Government, and approved by the Queen, with the express view of its remaining the permanent seat of Government for the United Provinces, including the Red River country as a colony; and the leading English statesmen say so. The present visit of his Royal Highness and Prince of Wales will essentially harden the consolidation, as the Duke of Newcastle remarks that his previous views are more than ever cemented in regard to their British American empire. W. H. M.

THE LOUNGER.

WHO SHALL DANCE WITH HIM?

TOM town is returning. Gross grows no longer in Broadway, and the pavement is washed away from the steps of the churches. The sound of carriage wheels is heard once more in the streets of the Avenue begins to bloom like the rose. Familiar faces lighten the lobby of the Academy, and Parquet and Parquette little heaving view of its surrounding the city.

WHO SHALL DANCE WITH HIM?

TOM town is returning. Gross grows no longer in Broadway, and the pavement is washed away from the steps of the churches. The sound of carriage wheels is heard once more in the streets of the Avenue begins to bloom like the rose. Familiar faces lighten the lobby of the Academy, and Parquet and Parquette little heaving view of its hands as they leave their offices in the afternoon. The hotels at Saratoga are thinned. The breezes of the sea murmur of the Belles who by which a month ago were proudly pacing the Rhode Island beach. As a Manhattanese of Manhattanese, he is grieved in soul as he surveys them and reflects that the glory of the six-in-hand at Newport belongs this year to Boston. Well, Boston and with two pestilitions was good, but it was not glorious. How charming the society in which Boston will be the star!

The town is hastening home, for the Prince is coming. If he escape the Orangemen, the fair New Yorkese will devour him with kindness. Not those of palpable sugar only—but those that drop from the soft and fatal eye—sweeter than are hidden elusive in the graceful tournure, New York will do for the Prince the best it can do. He will see the fall in its best season, and it is to be hoped he will see the roses which the summer has planted there. When his Royal Highness dances, it will be with the prettiest dancers in the world. All the great and thrilling point—how shall we approach it?—who will be chosen as his first partner, "it must go to pass."

How is she to be selected? Shall it be by a majority vote of the whole town? Shall it be decided by the two-thirds rule prevail? If it were an official reception the matter would be simpler. It is the President of the United States who here and he had a daughter, we could see light breaking in. But with a theatre full of young and beautiful women, and a ball to be given upon this occasion, beautifully dressed, and all upon the same social plane—all "first families"—how is the choice to be made? Shall he choose by beauty? Shall it be the tallest? the shortest; the fat—that is to say, the more luxuriant of proportion, or the less? Shall it be the best dancer? But all are best. Shall it be the youngest? But none are old.

There is but one way for the Prince to offer itself as a simple solution of the difficulty. Yet it is a way not agreeable to diplomacy, because it involves none; yet pleasant to pride, because it does not consult it: quite beyond precedent, because natural. Let the Prince do as every other gentleman does—select his own partner. That will satisfy her—of course it will equally please all the others.

THE EIGHTH COMMANDMENT.

WHOEVER has read "Love me little, Love me long," or "Christie Johnstone," or "Peg Woffington," knows that Mr. Charles Reade is one of the most brilliant and sparkling of living writers. His style is the most piquant French style Englished. Unhappily for his own comfort and for the curiosity of the world, Mr. Charles Reade is always in hot water. The critics are always firing at him, and he is constantly blazing at the critics. He has now written a book explanatory of his controversy. It involves the question of copyright, but especially of dramatic copyright between France and England, and is certainly the most grotesque, violent, erudite, and "smart" book that has been of late published.

Mr. Reade's doctrine is, that "talent follows the market." That is to say, a country has precisely such a belles-lettres literature as it chooses to pay for. Jacksaxes, says Mr. Charles Reade, think that France is a more essentially dramatic nation than England. Nobody but a Newgate-thief-and-his-Jane-Eliza idiot would ever dream of such an absurdity. It all depends upon Paris. When Paris chooses, it makes dramatists she has a drama. When she trampies and spits on them she hasn't. At present, dramatic writing, Reade says, is only a lumbarous French province. That is the style of the book. In support of his general theory Mr. Reade summons a great deal of evidence from English and French literary history, and has made a most peculiarly interesting to the literary profession, and very entertaining to the general reader.

But what he says of some American matters is the immediate occasion of this review of the book. Having shown that we are superior to the English in inventive genius, as proved by the patent statistics, he says: "From the cradle to the grave American invention accompanies an English man. Singer clothes his body, and Hoe gives his mind the news of his epoch an hour or two quicker than he could have it otherwise. Meantime American electric wire recording, as it stands now, is a waste of time and its progress to the grave. The what? That is an antique invention, and worn out. Here is Mr. Conner, ready to record your hiv in a glass coffin: pumps out the air, seals him up hermetically, and puts him respectfully out of people's way for a visit. There for centuries he can be inspected through the glass case, and so can the books he has written—and so can a monthly post! Don't be insulted, Miss! We are not to be buried now, only shelved."

He believes in American literary genius, but thinks you must look for it in the newspapers. "Read the American papers. You revel in a world of new truths, new theories, and glorious romance! Let Mr. Jenkins take heart. "In Great Britain there are 580 newspapers; in America there are 4000; and so he has buried, for the present, many an immortal genius—buried, but to use not hidden. I can see their fitful gleams in reading those papers."

How beautiful is truth! What a perspicacious writer is Mr. Charles Reade! By Mr. Jenkins?

I am glad to quote some of his final words, because they tell a truth which is not often told. "There is a great deal of pain in print against the class 'publishers,' in their dealing with authors. My personal experience and my researches into history have not confirmed this view. I have found some slippery tricks, but quite as often on the author's side as the publisher; and as the whole I have found the human beings struggling so fairly and liberally with authors as the publishers. I have come to hold this latter opinion before the public. At present I confine myself to a single observation. The English and American publishers have, with relation to American and English authors, much as the English managers do with respect to French dramatists. But what American publisher offers? The Philadelphia publishers in the United States, and particularly Messrs. Appleton, Messrs. Harper, Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, publishers (where liberal sums—but what?—for early sheets, a mere start of a week or two in advance of the pirates. Messrs. Carey, Bentley, Sampson Low, and, I hope, others in England, are equally just and liberal to American authors."

IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS, CORNER OF CAPITOL, 1860.

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—Augustus was reading to us, last evening, a newspaper letter from Newport, in which American parties were described, lasting from one or two in the afternoon until evening (an' very sensible too, I think; don't you, Sir?). The writer says that by means of such parties, "and, above all, as giving the separated women a chance to meet," &c. These are his very words, dear Mr. Lounger, you who know every thing, and are such a favorite with us girls in the country, won't you please answer the question we have asked? For he stopped and repeated the words slowly, and turned to me, and said, "What on earth does he mean?" I answered, "Augustus! Was that right, do you think, dearest Mr. Lounger? Did the writer mean to imply that the women who went to the evening parties in Newport were mostly squaws? Augustus says, if he did, that he intended with Count Joseph, in the last week's chapter of "The Woman in White," "Pass me here one exclamation in parenthesis. How interesting!"

Dear Mr. Lounger, is it squaws?

Yours till death,

MARGARET MARIGOLD.

The Lounger begs to present his compliments to Miss Margaret Marigold, and to thank her for her polite letter. He also begs to submit this reply to her exceedingly natural question. The evening parties at a certain place are to be praised because they give the unpainted woman a chance, does unfortunately that evening parties are the same place are frequented by polished women. And the language is profoundly apt to remark to Miss Marigold that a good many female fairs of the present epoch are popularly believed to be painted. A remarkable fact, which the Lounger tells its own tale—and immediately its object is defeated, for what avails the whitening of the sepulchre?

Miss Margaret Marigold must not be surprised if she should find herself wearing patches, in obedience to fashion, before she is ten years older. Patches are not a droller fashion than hoops, and paint is the most effective fashion of all—except the above. But paint is like perfume. As a person addicted to the use of the latter grows more and more hardened, so that instead of diffusing an aroma he drenches himself until a sweet stench exhales from his person, so one who paints her cheeks frequently loses the delicacy of her eye, and at length plasters her face with rouge. As it is better to be odorless than to smell of musk, so it is to be desirly pale than to show an unchanging cheek. Rouge may be only a fashion, like the outlaw of the hair and the cut of the dress—but it is sure to beget suspicion. Every man feels that a woman who is hypocritical in her cheek, which is visible, may be and dangerously double in the heart, which is invisible.
